

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE. THIRD NIGHT.]

VOL. CCXCV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [3rd March]. "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair"
(for Committee on the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill.

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. WARTON said, he regarded the discussion up to that moment as little more than an explanation of the hon.
Member for Liskeard's (Mr. Courtney's) retirement from the Government and his proportional representation scheme.
He thought the House would agree with him that the course of their proceedings in reference to the Bill had been somewhat unsatisfactory. On the day fixed for the second reading they had no opportunity for a full debate on the principle of the measure; but it was stated by at least one Minister that, in consideration of the debate being then somewhat hurried or slurred over, the discussion on the principle of the Bill would be taken on the Motion for going into Committee. Altogether the course of proceeding with respect to the Bill had been singularly unfortunate. The hon. Member for the Haddington Burghs (Mr. Craig-Sellar) gave Notice prior to the second reading of his intention to move his Scottish Amendment. The Speaker ruled that the hon. Gentleman was not entitled to give Notice at that time of such an Amendment; but somehow or other the hon. Gentleman secured the object he had in view and got the start of those who waited until the Bill had been read a second time before they handed in their Amendments. It was a regrettable circumstance that, instead of having an important debate on the Bill in the first instance, the question was narrowed by the hon. Member for Haddington's Amendment. He was sorry there had been a division on that Amendment, for it was clear that not many Members of that House would wish, after the bargain entered into by the two great Parties in the State, to support any Amendment, good or bad, with the object of defeating the Bill. The ridiculous figure which the advocates of proportional representation cut in the division showed the real feeling and temper of the House. Amendments might be supported by small numbers of devotees and fanatics; but the good sense of both sides of the House was determined to carry out fairly and fully the bargain come to by the two great Parties in the State. No one ought to violate that understanding and that compact. He earnestly hoped that there was something in the character of the English nation that made us better than every other nation in the world; but if we escaped the results brought about in every other country where power had slipped from the hands of those who were fit to exercise it into the hands of those who were not, it would be a special dispensation of Providence. There was in the Bill the principle of democracy. That principle had always been one of counting noses, irrespective of position, wealth, or intelligence. Even the Prime Minister, a short time ago, did not venture to go further than this, that the measure was mainly based on the principle of population. Instead, however, of being mainly based on that principle, it seemed to him to be wholly based upon it, and he would have preferred to have seen in it a more distinct recognition of the principle of property. No doubt, as far as Scotland was concerned, the principle adopted by the Government carried justice with it; but that was not the case with regard to England and Ireland. The population of Scotland had increased steadily since 1881, and he quite admitted that the country was entitled to an additional 12 Members. During the same period England had been going up and Ireland down. England had always returned a Conservative majority, Scotland a Liberal one, and Ireland now returned a majority of Liberals and Nationalists, and the Prime Minister, conscious of these facts, was seeking to increase the representation of Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, rather than give justice to the great population of England. If they took the Registrar-General's Returns and worked them out, they would find that, according to them, England was entitled to 505½ Members, Scotland to 72 Members, and Ireland to 92½ Members. Those figures showed the startling effect of the decrease of population in Ireland, and the increase in England, because in 1881 Ireland, according to the basis of population, was entitled to very nearly 100 Members. Wales had not been treated in the Bill as a nation. If it had been so dealt with it would have lost five Members. He observed, however, that in a Petition which was sent from the Principality to the Prime Minister, it was stated that if the Government reduced the number of Welsh Members it would be regarded as a national affront. Wales was, therefore, a nation for the purpose of keeping Members which it was not entitled to as such. It appeared that Swansea was to be extended 10 or 20 miles, so as to secure a population of over 100,000, which would entitle it to two Members; whereas Wigan, with a population of 57,000, was to have one of its Members cut off. Such was the notion of justice which the Government entertained. If the population of each of the Three Kingdoms remained stationary the injustice would not be so great; but when the rate of decrease in Ireland and of increase in England was so steady, any man deserving the name of a statesman would have taken notice of that tendency, and would not have drawn up a Bill which exaggerated the existing disproportion. When Mr. Pitt made his arrangement at the time of the Union, the system of representation was not based upon population merely, because, if it were, Ireland would have been entitled to 215 or 220 Members. Mr. Pitt's principle was to take population and property, and strike a mean between the two. The population of Ireland was now about one-seventh of the aggregate population of the Three Kingdoms; its property was only one-fourteenth; and, by striking a mean between the two, Ireland would be entitled to something less than one-ninth of the number of Members of which the House was to be composed. But, instead of proceeding on the principle of population and property combined, Her Majesty's Government had taken the basis of population alone. That was the principle of democracy, and if the principle of democracy were to be carried out we should find that those who did not pay taxes would have the voting of the taxes, and would be able to say who should pay them. The Bill would give the Liberal Party a tremendous advantage in many parts of the country; and when a Party had an opportunity of obtaining a Party advantage like this, they should be honest enough to say so. He deplored very much that the Bill was based on the principle of population; but he was glad for the sake of public peace and public decency that an agreement had been come to between the Leaders of the two great Parties in the State, and that arrangement must be honestly carried out. It was, therefore, the duty of Members to support the Bill.

SIR FARDLEY WILMOT said, he wished to take this opportunity of making a few observations upon the Bill. For many years as a Constitutional lawyer he had devoted a good deal of time and attention to our representative system, and he had always been in favour of the extension of the franchise. He supported the Bill for carrying household suffrage into the counties of the United Kingdom with the greater confidence because he believed it would be accompanied by a Redistribution Bill, based on the old lines of our Constitution, which every Conservative Member might feel not unwilling to support. But, having gone into the provisions of this Bill, he could not say that it was at all such as to answer the expectations entertained by the Party to which he had the honour to belong. The provisions of the Bill were based entirely on the numerical principle. He had long been taught to believe that the great beauty, harmony, and symmetry of the Constitution of this country arose from the different interests, qualifications, and parties represented in the country, and that in that way anything like the preponderance of a particular party or interest was avoided. He could not help saying that in this Bill Her Majesty's Ministers might have followed a different course from that which they had pursued. Household suffrage would have been a much safer principle of the Bill than population. It would have been a durable, substantial, and easily recognizable principle, which could be readily adapted to our wants. In 1858, having himself put forward a scheme of electoral suffrage, and supposing that the principle of the Reform Bill of 1832 had been based on population, he received a letter from Lord John Russell informing him that he was mistaken, and that the lines of the Bill proceeded on two principles—household suffrage and the payment of taxes. But in this Bill these principles had been totally ignored, and the population principle had been allowed to reign paramount. That was very different from the view of Pitt, Burke, Fox, and notably Mackintosh, who held that the safety, harmony, and symmetry of our Constitution depended on the combination of different principles. Mr. Pitt, on the 26th of May, 1797, said—

“It is not the harsh uniformity of principles, each pushed to its extreme, but the general complexion arising out of the various shades, which forms the harmony of the representation and the practical excellence of the Constitution capable of improving itself consistently with its fundamental principles. Who will say that this beautiful variety may not have contributed to the advantage of the whole? That system was practical, and experience has confirmed the excellence of it; but the present plan goes the whole length of destroying all the existing representation, with the exception only of the county Members, and bringing all to one system. Are the Gentlemen who propose this system aware of the benefits resulting from a varied state of representation, and are they ready at once to resign them?”—(Parl. Hist. [33] 680.)

But this Bill entirely ignored what had hitherto been considered the excellence of our Constitution, and carried the numerical principle to an extent that had never been thought of in the Reform Bills of 1797, 1832, and 1868; and he must express his great regret that the Bill had been prepared in the spirit in which it had been, leaving out the interests and influences of property. As to the First Schedule of the Bill, he thought that the number of boroughs doomed to decapitation, as he would term it, would have to undergo capital punishment without trial. But the number was considerably larger than the exigency of the times really required, as there had been no great demand in the country for this summary execution. Of the 79 boroughs which it was proposed to decapitate, many were totally undeserving of such punishment; they were not decaying, but were places of commercial prosperity. He was surprised to find that during the late Recess they were not in any way eager to assert their own claims. The Second Schedule contained a list of those boroughs that were to undergo partial disfranchisement; and in that list he was sorry to find many ancient and historic boroughs, some of them being the capitals of the counties, as Gloucester, Worcester, and Stafford, and also an ancient and important city in his own county—namely, Coventry. He would also point out that of the 32 boroughs contained in that list there were no less than 15 county towns possessing considerable weight and importance. That, he contended, was not at all required. He did not complain so much of the next Schedule, which proposed to give additional Members to the larger cities—for instance, Liverpool—though he considered the increase in their numbers excessive. One of the principal reasons for his objection to the Bill was that it transferred the electoral power from the Southern and Midland districts and the counties to the great manufacturing districts of the North, and, consequently, there would not be so large a representation of all those conflicting interests which the Constitution had hitherto provided for. Then there would be the great transfer to the Metropolis, to which, with its suburbs, there were actually no less than 61 Members apportioned, and he considered that was bestowing an inordinate degree of power on one district. It had been said that the overgrown power and influence of the capital of a country were often a danger to the State and to the safety of the people. That was notably so in the capital of France. He thought it was extremely unwise to deprive the City of London, which was the centre of the great commercial and mercantile interests of the Metropolis, of two seats in order to confer the right of representation upon such districts as Bethnal Green, St. George's-in-the-East, or the Strand. They had taken this Bill for granted and had put great confidence in the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke); but, of course, the right hon. Gentleman's object was to make the representative system as democratic as possible. As to the portion of the Bill relating to Scotland and Ireland, he was glad to support it. He thought Scotland was highly deserving of the 12 additional Members proposed to be conferred upon her; but, at the same time, he strongly opposed the mode by which it was proposed to be effected—namely, by adding 12 to the already large numbers of the House; in fact, he should prefer, if possible, that the numbers of the House should be reduced to 600. With reference to Ireland, he congratulated the Government upon the wise policy which had influenced them in the matter, in not yielding to the cry of those who thought that numerical principles should be rigidly observed with regard to Ireland, but in looking to the real wants of that country. On the whole, he could only regret that the compromise by means of which this Bill had been produced had been of such a character as, he was sure, would endanger the interests of the Conservative Party. It had been wisely said by Burke that compromises might be good as Party tactics, but were always bad as statesmanship. It had been said that the last Bill of Mr. Disraeli was a leap in the dark; but he could not help thinking that the present Bill was a leap in the dark—a leap in the dark, over a precipice, so far as the Conservative Party were concerned.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he wished to make a few observations from a Scotch point of view. He could not help thinking the Scotch Members had reason to complain at being coerced into voting for an increase in the number of Members in the House. He did not like the increase; but from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles

Sir Eardley Milnes

W. Dilke), he understood that it was the only way in which Scotland would get their 12 additional Members. That was what they called in Scotland being "concussed" into voting. From what he gathered from the Leader of the Opposition also, they had no assurance that this part of the Bill would be maintained, or that, so far as the right hon. Gentleman was concerned, Scotland would get the additional number. He protested, however, against it being said that these 12 Members were given to Scotland. They were only what Scotland was absolutely entitled to according to her population, and they were not given to Scotland, but were proposed in order to give Ireland and Wales more than their proportion according to population. It might be, as had been said, that at one time Ireland had too few, and it was to be made up by giving her too many; but if that was to be done, they ought to be told by the Government that it was so. He protested against it being supposed that this Bill treated all parts of the country equally, as the claims of Ireland and Scotland had not been dealt with upon an equal footing. The same rule had not been applied to all parts—the same rule of disfranchisement had been, but not of enfranchisement. It was evident, if they compared Glamorgan-shire or Armagh with Lanarkshire. He supposed that Scotland must be content to get bare justice; but he did hope that Her Majesty's Government would honestly admit that they were doing more than justice to Ireland, and much more than justice to Wales, and that they were really giving these 12 additional Members to Ireland and Wales and not to Scotland.

Mr. HEALY said, that by the Forms of the House he was precluded from moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice. With regard to the alleged over-generosity of the Government to Ireland, he would say that the Irish Members did not regard it as anything of the kind. They considered that the Bill, as a whole, was a fair one, and was honestly intended by the Government. With regard to the proposed reduction in the number of Irish Members, surely the Government, after having depopulated their country for half-a-century, and refused it when it had 8,000,000 the 150 Members to which it was entitled, were not now going to cut down the number of Irish Representatives. Now, when the Irish Parliament had been destroyed, and the Irish Army had disappeared, were the Government going to take advantage of them? He must say the English generally did that sort of thing; but it appeared to him it was a thing they could hardly do now in the face of the public. The Irish were not particularly anxious to retain the 103 Members; they would be satisfied with 100, and would present two—the Members for Trinity College—with a blessing to the Scotch. If by means of the white fiend of jerrymandering they wanted those two flowers, they could put them as a bouquet in the button-hole of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). They had heard from the Ulster Members—from the noble Lord the Member for Fermanagh (Viscount Crichton) and those who acted with him, and who had been vainly attempting to form an independent Party—that the Loyalists of Ireland were very much ill-treated by this Bill. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) had said that under this Bill the Whigs would be completely wiped out in Ireland. Well, that remained to be seen, and would depend a good deal upon the Nationalists. Wherever the Nationalists could not return a Member of their own colour they could hold the scales between the two Parties, and he could promise that the scales would be held with the utmost impartiality. The Loyalists of Ulster would get 20 Members—that was one-fifth of the representation—yet they were not a tenth of the population. Really he believed that the two Members for Trinity College and the four Members for Belfast represented them adequately enough. This was proved by what occurred in Ulster last year. Before the passing of the Franchise Act the conduct of the Loyalists was remarkable. They said that upon the soil of their Imperial and Loyal Province the foot of a single Nationalist should not enter. The Nationalists, to quote the expression of the noble Lord, must be prevented from "invading" Ulster, and if the Government did not prevent them the Loyalists would "take the law into their own hands" and prevent them. It used to be represented that the Parnellites were just like a travelling circus going to

Ulster once in a twelvemonth to tumble. But suddenly a change came over the spirit of their dream. After the passing of the Franchise Act, when the Parnellites had got Ulster in their hands, the case of these Gentlemen was that by this Bill the Government had entirely prevented them from getting an adequate representation. What were the facts? The Whig and Tory Party, as the Bill at present stood, would have about 23 seats. As the Bill originally stood they would have had about 18; but the Marquess of Salisbury's very significant letter of comfort to the Ulster Orangemen had been taken to heart by the Boundary Commissioners. The Marquess of Salisbury wrote a very notable letter when appealed to by the Orangemen to save them from destruction. He wrote—

"The protection of the Loyalist minority in Ireland depends upon the spirit in which the Boundary Commissioners carry out their instructions."

Consequently five seats, and perhaps six, which would under the original plans of division have gone to the National side, had been jerrymandered in the Conservative interest. Lord Spencer, as they believed in Ireland, issued secret instructions to the Boundary Commissioners that they would take the spirit, as it was called, of Lord Salisbury's hint into their consideration, and so where the original schemes were fair, Englishmen, if they took the trouble to look at the maps, which of course they would not, would see that the new schemes were absurd. He attacked the single-seat system because the single-seat system in Ireland had simply been turned into a machine for giving the Loyalists seats where they had no business to have them, and of preventing the Nationalists from having seats where they had the majority. In looking into the matter he found it necessary in Ulster to have regard to the religious opinions of the people, because the distinction between Protestants and Catholics was made by the Loyalists, who were constantly appealing to the people by the bloody shrouds of Aughrim and the Boyne and the fires of Smithfield to support the cause of Protestantism, and he forgot what other tags were generally added on to the peroration. The Boundary Commissioners had treated the question as one of Protestant v. Catholic or of Pope v. King William. Thus, in Ulster, the Commissioners made seven changes on the original schemes, one being made in Belfast; in the rest of Ireland only three changes were made—in Dublin, Mayo, and Kerry. The right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board said nine. Well, there were minor and unimportant changes as to names, but only three actual changes; and even supposing the right hon. Baronet's figures to be correct, nine changes out of 23 was a very different proportion from seven changes out of nine. Was it not a very suspicious circumstance that out of the nine Ulster counties where the popular Party were satisfied with the existing plan changes were made in six of them? The popular Party would thereby lose seats in Armagh, Donegal, Tyrone, and Derry, and possibly also outside Ulster one seat in Dublin County and in Dublin City. Contrast the treatment Ulster Loyalists had received with the treatment the Nationalists had received. In the counties where the Catholics were in a majority shameful jerrymandering had gone on with the object of giving the Protestants seats to which they were not entitled, while in those parts in which the Protestants were in a majority things had been so managed that the Catholics would have no chance of returning a single Member. Take the county of Antrim, for instance. Out of a population of 200,000, roughly speaking, the Catholics numbered 60,000. Clearly they would be entitled to one seat, but they would not get it. The Catholics would not be able to return a single Member in Belfast, although they were entitled, according to population, to return one Member. So that, out of 400,000 in Antrim and Belfast, 100,000 Catholics would be mute and voiceless under this scheme. What had been done elsewhere? In Donegal the Catholics were in a huge and preponderating majority of five to one. The Protestant minority would, he admitted, be entitled to one seat; but it was given to them by jerrymandering, and if a seat was to be jerrymandered for the Protestants in Donegal, a seat should also be jerrymandered in Antrim and in Belfast for the Catholics. Take the case of Tyrone; the Catholics were in a preponderating majority, yet a Protestant could be returned. [Mr. MACARTNEY: No.] The hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) said "No," and shook his head;

Mr. Healy

but they would find the hon. Member was not so hopeless as he pretended, and that he would at the next Election call upon the electors to return him at the head of the poll. The case of Derry was a most notable and shameful case, and the most suspicious thing about it was that it was represented in this House by the Solicitor General for Ireland—a Member of Her Majesty's Government. Of course, his hon. and learned Friend would get up in this House and say he had nothing whatever to do with it, and so long as he (Mr. Healy) was in the House he would give him full credence; but when he passed beyond the door he would resume his liberty of appreciation, and would be, perhaps, inclined to say that the charges made in Derry were only explicable in one way. The Southern portion of Derry was a Catholic barony, and the Catholics were in a vast majority. The Solicitor General put his friends in motion. Very curiously, the original advertisements of the scheme for Derry were the last but one of those published. For weeks and weeks the public had been hungering to get a sight of the proposed boundary scheme for Derry; but the Commissioners took no heed, and made no signs in the matter. The boundary scheme was at length published, and it was found that the barony in the South had been joined on to two baronies in the North, the reason being that a mountain chain ran across the country, and that this was the natural division. The result of the division was that, out of 69,000 of the population, the Catholics numbered 27,000 in Derry. The Solicitor General instructed one of his friends, Dr. Todd, B.L., to appear before the Boundary Commissioners, and Dr. Todd announced that he appeared under the instructions of Her Majesty's Solicitor General for Ireland. Sudden panic and awe fell upon the Boundary Commissioners. Fancy this way of intimidating the Commissioners by saying that Her Majesty's Solicitor General entirely disapproved of the scheme! For a Gentleman like his hon. and learned Friend to instruct counsel to go down and intimate to his own Boundary Commissioners that he was entirely opposed to the scheme was wholly unjustifiable conduct. He would not have cared had the words used been more harmless, empty words; but the

Commissioners took them to heart, and made a change in the scheme that would prevent the Catholic party from returning a single Member. Whereas the Catholics were 37,000 to 67,000 of the population in the original scheme, by the amended one they would only be 34,000 to 70,000. That was a scandalous thing. In Central Armagh the same course had been pursued. In this case an error was undoubtedly originally made, and would have to be corrected in any case; but what was done? In Southern Armagh the National Party were in a vast majority; in Northern Armagh the Orange Party were in a vast majority; and as the county was to have three seats, it was as to Central Armagh that the struggle took place. The Commissioners accordingly threw into the Southern district, where they were not wanted, Catholics from the Central district, and took into the Central district the Orangemen from the Northern district, where they were not wanted. It was all very well to make complaints about the matter, but their complaints would fall on just as deaf ears as the complaints of the Loyal minority. An arrangement had been made by the two Front Benches, and, like the two blades of a pair of scissors, would cut everything coming between them. But, at the same time, it would be a most unfortunate thing in Parliamentary tactics if independent Members allowed these schemes to go by without a protest. The last case he would allude to in Ulster was the case of Down. In that case also there was a blot in the original scheme, for the Commissioners had forgotten to include the boundaries of Belfast. It was admitted that the Nationalists could carry Southern Down through with some difficulty. Now, under the scheme of the Commissioners, it was a dead certainty. Yet they claimed that the boundaries of Down had not been fairly managed, because in the Ards district Lower Ards was joined to the top of the county instead of to the Downpatrick division, and the reason given for this was that they declined to cross Strangford Lough. It was delightful to hear how the Government declined to cross Strangford Lough when one looked at the way they had jumped across Lough Swilly in Donegal. There was a division in Donegal called the Inishowen division separated by 40 miles of sea from the Kilnachrennan division. The Conservative Party objected to the original scheme of the Commissioners, and for jerrymandering purposes their objections were heard, with the result that two portions of Donegal, which were as far asunder as a portion of Donegal was from Scotland, were united. They might just as well unite Kingstown and Holyhead for electoral purposes. Now he would come to the case of the county of Dublin, which was the strangest he had ever seen. At the Boundary Inquiry he was instructed by the popular Party to have the existing boundaries retained; but a well-known firm of Emergency Association solicitors in Ireland—Messrs. Dudgeon and Emerson—in the interests of the Conservatives of Rathmines, put forward a scheme which he was inclined to consider in the light of a good joke. What was his horror to find that the Commissioners had adopted the scheme en bloc. It was as good as a play. If they looked at the map they would find a little bit about the size of an inch marked red. That was one division, and all the rest of the county—100 miles—was the other division. If that was not jerrymandering Mr. Jeremiah Manders had lived in vain. It was remarkable that the Commissioners in their Report admitted that they had departed from their instructions, which were to have regard to the compactness of districts and the pursuits of the population, and they said they had followed the population where it was of the same character. Character was a very beautiful word if they only knew what it meant; but whether the people of one division were of better character than those in the other division he hardly thought the Commissioners were entitled to inquire. Take the City of Dublin. It had been similarly worked by these ingenious gentlemen, and they should contrast the way in which it had been treated compared with Belfast. Belfast, under the little arrangement made in Downing Street with the Prime Minister over walnuts and wine, was to have four Members by the adoption of the boundaries of the Exham Royal Commission of 1881. This Commission recommended that Belfast, Dublin, Drogheda, and other towns should have extended areas. The recommendation of this Commission was followed in the case of Belfast, and not followed in the case of Dublin and Drogheda, even though Drogheda was only 300 short of the 15,000 entitling it to a Member. If the recommendations of the Exham Commission were followed in the case of Dublin, it would be entitled to six Members; yet they would be satisfied with four Members if the boundaries were extended. He called the attention of the right hon. Baronet to the fact that by crossing a bridge a man could have a vote for his house in Dublin and another vote for his residence across the bridge. The township of Pembroke was included within the city boundary, although Rathmines, which was nearer Dublin, and the other townships were excluded. He regarded this as most unfair. These inconsistencies appeared to him to be the chief blots in the scheme as proposed for Ireland; and to show that his views were not the views simply of a mere politician, arguing for political purposes, he might quote the opinion of the Bishop of Athlone, who, though he had never before taken part in any political or contentious matter, felt constrained to write an indignant public letter protesting against the scheme adopted by the Commissioners. The Bishop, who described the scheme as appalling, wrote that, when he first read the paragraph in The Derry Sentinel setting forth the final decision of the Boundary Commissioners as to Donegal, he thought there must be some mistake. It was hard to believe that a number of gentlemen, placed in a position of great trust and delicacy, could make so light of their character for justice and fair play as to lend themselves to a piece of sharp practice, and he went on to say that their scheme was the Conservative scheme very much improved in the Conservative interest. The right hon. Gentleman had not treated the House fairly in this matter, for, in his opinion, Members were entitled to have before them for the purpose of the debate the original schemes put forward by the Commissioners, the same evidence, and the same view of the schemes proposed by each party, in order that they might see which political Party had been favoured or otherwise in the divisions adopted. But the right hon. Gentleman said—"If I do that for Ireland I must do it for England also." Well, and why not? The Queen's Printer could cope with the work, and the Public Exchequer was not so deficient of funds that there was not sufficient money to enable a slight operation of this sort to be carried on. He hoped the Government would assure the House that his suggestion should be carried out. So far as jerrymandering had been possible in Ireland, it had been carried out, and he defied anyone by any scheme of proportional representation, or any other dodge, to jerrymander another seat for the Loyalists. Every trick and device that it had been possible to resort to had been indulged in. The cases of Ulster had been the result of arrangements between the Marquess of Salisbury, Earl Spencer, and the Boundary Commissioners. It would have been impossible for them to have arranged any more seats for the Loyalists, and he regarded the attack which the Ulster Party were making on the Government as a species of masked battery in order to hold the divisions already made in their favour. The case of Drogheda he thought was a very hard one. It was an old historic town, having its own Corporation and Sheriff, and it was in his opinion a great hardship that a town of that character should be deprived of its representation in Parliament because it was 200 or 300 short of the required number. Of course he would be asked where would he get the Member for Drogheda, to which he would at once answer, Trinity College. Trinity College by the Act of Union got one Member, and it got another by the Act of 1832. Now he, for one, could not understand why gentlemen who kept certain terms in Trinity College, and passed certain examinations which not one of them would be able to pass again six months after they had got their degree, should be entitled to return to that House two Members of Parliament. It appeared to him that the whole scheme of University representation required to be looked after. To begin with, the polls he believed were kept open for more than one day. Then there was the system of proxy voting, and in addition he believed it was Masters of Arts, not Bachelors of Arts, who had the votes. Why Masters of Arts should have votes, and Bachelors of Arts should not, he confessed passed his comprehension. Moreover, if this was to be a learned franchise, and if persons of superior intelligence were to have votes, though they could not forget Sydney Smith's saying that he never knew a Senior Wrangler who was not a fool, if learning was, as it was said, to be represented, why then should not doctors and solicitors and barristers and engineers and other persons who took out degrees have votes in institutions of that character? For his part, he contended that University representation was altogether indefensible. But if there were two University seats in Ireland he did not see why one of the seats for Trinity College should not be merged in the Royal University. The Royal University of Ireland had more graduates than the London University, and if two University seats were to be given to Ireland he really did not see why the Royal University should not be merged in Trinity College for purposes of this sort. Finally, his advice to the "Loyal" minority would be to rest and be thankful. They had come very well out of this business. The Marquess of Salisbury's secret compact had been attended to. He said that it was evident the success of the Bill would depend on the spirit of the Boundary Commissioners, and no more favourable spirit for the Loyal minority could be distilled.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he thought that some of the observations made upon the Bill, before the speech of the hon. Member for Monaghan, showed that there were some hon. Members who had not made themselves acquainted with the details of the measure, or even the principles upon which it proceeded. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Warwickshire (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had complained that power was to be taken away from the South of England and transferred to the North; but the hon. Baronet had given no reason for the continuance of power in the hands of a minority in the Southern counties. Even the hon. Baronet had complained that the number of Members for the Metropolis was too large. As against that he thought he might put the complaint made last night by another Conservative Member, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), who had complained bitterly that London was too poorly represented. In his opinion, there was not any greater anomaly in this case than must necessarily exist in other instances. The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had begun his able speech by making an attack upon the Boundary Commissioners. The Boundary Commissioners were gentlemen whose work as regarded England and Scotland had been generally satisfactory to those concerned. In England their decisions had been received with almost universal satisfaction, with only a few isolated exceptions in very special cases, in which dissatisfaction had proceeded from a section of one political Party. In Scotland objections had been taken to one or two of their schemes by the Liberal Party—objections which he thought they would hardly be able to maintain. It was a curious fact that in Ireland practically the same gentlemen, acting on the same principles, had been bitterly attacked. Sir John Lambert and Sir Francis Sandford, who had acted as Commissioners in England, had had complete knowledge of the schemes relating to Ireland. The Irish Commissioners met in London under the supervision of Sir John Lambert. The Irish Assistant Commissioners also came to London; and the whole of the Irish Commission met again in London after the local inquiries had been held, when the whole of the schemes settled by the Commissioners were gone into in the utmost detail by the Commissioners, who had before them all the newspaper reports of what had passed at the local inquiries, and after sitting in London for several days consecutively they came to a unanimous decision on the whole of the schemes, and Sir John Lambert and Sir Francis Sandford were just as responsible for those schemes as they were for those relating to England or Scotland. Sir John Lambert was an official of immense experience, and one whose retirement from the Public Service almost amounted to a national calamity. In spite of the extreme delicacy of his health, Sir John Lambert had thrown himself in the most gallant way into that labour as a volunteer, and his services in connection with that Commission deserved to be recognized by the strongest and warmest appreciation of the House. Sir Francis Sandford, an official of great experience, had likewise worked as a volunteer on that inquiry; he had given to it an enormous amount of time and labour, and was entitled to the sincere thanks of the House for his valuable services. It was remarked that the Commission for Ireland was an after thought. And why was it an after thought? The fact was that the Government were so much afraid that, through the strength of Party feeling in Ireland, it would be hopeless to secure the Commission which would command the confidence of all Parties, and, therefore, it was desirable to leave the preliminary inquiries to be conducted by the Boundary Department of the Royal Engineers, under the general supervision of Sir John Lambert and Sir Francis Sandford. This, however, was objected to in Parliament, and in the Irish Press; and the Government thereupon felt themselves bound to appoint a Commission for Ireland, as in the case of England and Scotland. The question of Catholic and Protestant unfortunately entered into that question of boundaries, and he might mention the fact that two of the Commissioners were Catholics. The hon. Member alleged that Lord Spencer had issued secret instructions to the Commission. He did not know whether the hon. Member made that statement as a rhetorical flourish, or whether he really believed it. [Mr. HEALY said, that he believed it.] Well, Lord Spencer had exactly followed in the instructions given to the Irish Commissioners the terms of the instructions which he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had issued to the English Commissioners; and he was certain that Lord Spencer had not issued further instructions in any way altering or varying the instructions which were before the House. He was sure that Lord Spencer would not have issued further instructions to the Commissioners without consulting him. Now, he had already said that the Commissioners were unanimous in the whole of their recommendations. He went further. He had seen some of the attacks which had been made in the Irish newspapers and in that House against the Irish schemes; and having gone through the whole of those schemes himself with Sir John Lambert, he was bound to say, speaking as far as he could do without intimate local knowledge, that he was prepared fully to support and to justify the decisions which had been come to by the Boundary Commissioners. The hon. Member had paid a high compliment to the original schemes of the Commissioners. Those original schemes were merely a tentative division of the counties made here in London, without very intimate local knowledge, and made to be thrown on the table for discussion at a local inquiry. It suited the hon. Member, now that they had been altered in a way which he disapproved, to say that he greatly regretted that the original schemes were not adopted. That was not the view that was taken when they first came out, for then violent attacks were made on those schemes in the newspapers which represented the opinions held by the hon. Member. The Freeman's Journal, for instance, said that they were prepared in ignorance. Now, he was not disposed to dispute that criticism. He believed that they were schemes prepared in ignorance. In some cases they omitted to show such important factors with regard to the division of counties as ranges of mountains across those counties. Generally speaking, moreover, the original schemes followed the baronies. The hon. Member had complained that a larger proportion of the schemes had been altered in Ulster than in the rest of Ireland. Now, as he had stated in the House before, the number of the schemes that had been altered in the rest of Ireland was nine as against seven in Ulster. The schemes altered were those for the county of Dublin—to which the hon. Member objected)—County Meath, Queen's County, County Westmeath, borough of Dublin, County Clare, County Cork, County Kerry, and county Mayo. Whether there was a greater or a less disproportion between the numbers altered in Ulster and in the rest of Ireland, he thought the reason for that must be obvious to the House. The Party to which the hon. Member belonged was in such undisputed possession of the counties in the rest of Ireland generally that there the matter was not fought at the local inquiries, and the schemes were not so thoroughly thrashed out as they were in the case of the Ulster counties. The hon. Member referred to the case of Antrim. Now, without single-Member districts, the Party to which the hon. Member belonged could not carry a single seat in that county.

MR. HEALY: But we could carry Donegal and Tyrone.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The hon. Member said that under the single-Member system the Catholics in Belfast would be voiceless, and that four Members on the other side would be returned. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) thought that was very doubtful; and, at any rate, he felt sure that within the next few months the hon. Member would not be quite so ready to proclaim that opinion. The hon. Member had made an attack on the Solicitor General for Ireland in regard to the division of the county of Kerry, apparently thinking that his hon. and learned Friend was in favour of the scheme which the Commissioners had adopted; but the scheme which they had adopted was not his hon. and learned Friend's scheme at all, and, in fact, nothing but his position as a Member of the Government would have induced his hon. and learned Friend to support the scheme for Derry which was now before the House.

MR. HEALY asked what was the Solicitor General's scheme?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE replied, that, even if he were able, he did not think it would be right for him to explain that. His hon. and learned Friend came to him long ago and stated in the strongest possible terms his objections to the scheme which the Government adopted and were now prepared to support. The hon. Member had attacked, county by county, the work done by the Commissioners. The House would have an opportunity of discussing those matters with more care when they were reached in Committee. But, being prepared to make himself responsible for those schemes, he thought it right to say a few words in regard to those of them which had been most strongly assailed. The hon. Member also objected to the division of Donegal, which, he said, crossed the lough; but it had to be remembered that the populations on both sides of the lough were engaged in the fishing industry, and spoke the Irish language, and the lough referred to was crossed by a very good ferry.

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that it is 30 miles wide, and 15 miles in length?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he was informed that it was only three miles wide at the ferry.

MR. HEALY: But where is the ferry?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he did not know where the ferry was; but the hon. Member did not inform the House of a fact worth mentioning, that in County Down the Nationalist Party themselves proposed a scheme which would have crossed Lough Strangford at a point much wider than in the case of Donegal.

MR. HEALY explained that in that case the people were so put together already for Petty Sessions and Poor Law purposes.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that everything which had been laid before him up to the present time confirmed him in his intention to support the scheme as proposed. The hon. Member next complained of the division of County Dublin. This case, however, was governed by precedents which they had created in England. The division of County Dublin consisted of a very large division and a very small division of equal populations, the large division being sparsely populated, and the small division being more densely populated. That was a plan which had been followed in districts where there was a large urban population and a large agricultural population in the same county. He considered this to be a wise plan to follow. He might cite some of the English county divisions as examples. For instance, there were the Jarrow and Tyne divisions. Most of the divisions of the county of Middlesex were very small; but the Uxbridge division, being mainly agricultural, comprised almost half the county. The case of County Dublin, therefore, would not have been a startling instance to the hon. Member if he had looked through the English maps and had observed similar cases in the English counties. The hon. Member also complained of the extension of the boundaries of Belfast, when a similar extension of boundaries had been denied to Dublin. In this matter, however, they had followed no equal course in England and Scotland as compared with Ireland. They had followed various courses in dealing with this question of suburbs as seemed best for the convenience of local cases, and of course that part of the scheme was open, like everything else, to full discussion. In regard to the schemes of the Boundary Commission, the hon. Member asked why the Government could not lay before the House full information, accompanied by maps, showing the difference between the original schemes prepared by the Commission and those which the House was asked to sanction. If such a course was assented to in the case of Ireland, it must also be assented to in the cases of England and Scotland. The documents were of enormous bulk, and their opinion was that they did not believe it would tend to produce a unanimous or general consensus of opinion in the House were they to produce a large number of maps for the same county, showing how it was divided in different ways. The House would get into an interminable discussion, and would never reach a conclusion at all. He also declined to produce the voluminous mass of facts and arguments which were laid before the Commissioners in the local inquiries.

MR. HEALY: Will you give them to us in the contentious cases?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE replied, that all cases were contentious more or less. Where the main principles of the scheme were uncontested there was, perhaps, a dispute with regard to one or two parishes. The hon. Gentleman must remember that the notes of evidence were of enormous bulk, that the number of inquiries held was very large, and that the subjects of discussion at the inquiries were debated with reference to maps which could not now be found, and which could not be placed before the House in a satisfactory manner. The matter, indeed, was one of extraordinary difficulty; but he pointed out to the hon. Member that in most cases the newspaper reports were full and ample. The hon. Member next raised the question of University representation, and referred to it as a means by which the Scotch representation might be increased—generously proposing to take away the representation of Trinity College, Dublin, and to hand it over to the Scotch Members. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had informed the House the previous evening that, although he was strongly opposed to University representation, and although he felt himself free to vote any day for a separate Bill or a Resolution proposing to disfranchise the Universities of the Three Kingdoms, still he could not support a proposal to deal with it in the present Redistribution Bill. It had to be remembered that the present Bill was received as a compromise of opinions of various kinds, and as a compromise he intended to support it, and to vote against the proposal to strike the University representation out of the Bill. With respect to the other point raised with respect to the representation of the Royal Universities of Ireland, and the suggestion that they should either have separate representation or be thrown into Trinity College, that was a matter that would be fully discussed in Committee, and he would, therefore, not enter into the question at present.

MR. SEXTON said, that it appeared from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that the Solicitor General for Ireland was undergoing an agonizing struggle in this matter; but as he saw through good and evil fortune the hon. and learned Gentleman had maintained a stern fidelity to the Government, he did not think he would be removed from his fealty by the division of the county of Derry. The Solicitor General, he suspected, was a man more fascinated by the atmosphere of the Four Courts than Westminster; and if he should not succeed in being returned at the next Election, he was one of the Members of the House who would least regret the result. With reference to the question under discussion, he would impress upon the attention of the House the fact that at the time of the Union Ireland had half the population of Great Britain. In 1846 it contained a third of the population. The decrease in the population of Ireland was due to the Imperial policy which had delayed and denied agrarian reform. If the English Government had passed 40 years ago the Land Act of 1870 or of 1881, the population of Ireland at the present time would not have been such as to entitle hon. Members to argue for a decrease in the number of Irish Members. If those Acts had been passed thus early, the Irish population would not have diminished as it had done, and a reason would then have existed entitling Ireland to claim a great increase in its representation. If the Government placed any confidence in the Land Act of 1881, they ought to look forward to an increase of the population of Ireland, and as a matter of fact the emigration which in 1883 amounted to 105,000, fell last year to 72,000. During 1884 the population of Ireland remained about stationary. He believed that the Irish Members had an unanswerable claim to have the evidence and the maps in the Office of the right hon. Gentleman laid before them. The right hon. Gentleman had refused to furnish the facts upon which the Commissioners formed their conclusions, whilst he himself was admittedly unable to answer legal questions.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I will answer them later on.

MR. SEXTON said, it was said by the right hon. Baronet that Lord Spencer did not issue any secret instructions to the Boundary Commissioners. However that might be, his public instructions were materially different in one particular to those issued to the English Commissioners; for whereas the English Commissioners had power to inquire when it was desirable to extend the boundaries of any borough, the Irish Commissioners were only to inquire into the desirability of extending the boundaries of those boroughs which were "proposed to be divided by the Bill." This was an unjustifiable departure from the instructions given to the English Commissioners.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that in England the Commissioners were instructed not to alter the boundaries of boroughs or cities such as Dublin, where the extension would alter the number of Members allocated.

MR. SEXTON said, that the right hon. Baronet had spoken of the propriety of including Kingstown in the City of Dublin; but he would remind him that Kingstown was seven miles away from the City of Dublin, while very large districts, such as Rathmines, were contiguous to it. What Lord Spencer did in Ireland was to alter the sense, meaning, and direction of the words of the instructions; and instead of allowing the Commissioners to recommend the extension of borough boundaries where they thought fit, and where it was desirable, his instructions were a most arbitrary and unjustifiable departure from the instructions given by the right hon. Baronet. The effect of these instructions was to shut out the cases of Dublin, Drogheda, and Limerick. In regard to the case of the City of Limerick, a very strong case could be made out. A slight extension of the boundaries would enable that ancient city to retain its present proportion of two Members. If a line were drawn from Derry to the County Cork, it would divide the Island into two almost equal parts. The House would be surprised to hear that the Western moiety would, under this scheme, have only three borough Members. The population of Limerick was almost equal to that which would entitle it to an additional Member; and he believed that if boundaries were so extended as to include a couple of streets, which were actually physically a part of the existing city, this would be accomplished. Lord Spencer's instructions had shut out the case of Drogheda, precluding any alteration of the existing boundary. This was a contrast to the course which had been followed in the case of the town of Warwick, in England, a borough which Mr. Speaker represented in that House. Warwick had a population of only 8,000 persons, and in order to secure the seat for the Speaker, the Government had added to it the town of Leamington, which was another place altogether, and five or six miles distant from Warwick. And yet the Commissioners in Ireland refused to add one street to the town of Drogheda. He believed that it was essential that the evidence which had been taken with regard to these contested schemes should not be withheld from the House. The contentious schemes which the Irish Members intended to oppose in the House were only seven in number, and he did not believe that the production of the evidence in these cases would involve any extraordinary bulk of material. They would not prove at all an intolerable demand upon the resources of the Queen's Printing Office. The right hon. Baronet stated that he knew from the first that the decisions of the Commissioners would be attacked. Would any Member of the Government explain the curious fact that in the schemes which were not contested on account of jerrymandering, the Commissioners had not made any material change in the original schemes? But they had been altered where political and Party objects were to be served. Lord Salisbury, in reply to a Memorial from Ulster, had stated that the effect of the work of the Boundary Commissioners upon the Irish Tory Party would depend upon the spirit in which the Boundary Commissioners performed their work. He would ask, however, what business had these gentlemen to show any spirit at all in a work calling only for common sense and impartiality? It was entirely a question of maps, Census Returns, and physical division of the country, and also a question of compactness of area. There was no occasion for the display of any spirit at all. Well, these gentlemen had responded to the appeal, and did show spirit. Wherever the people's agents accepted the original scheme, and it was objected to by either of the two anti-popular factions, the result was that the Commissioners, in spite of the support of the people to the original scheme, altered it at the wish of the anti-popular Parties. In any case in which the popular Party objected to the schemes, they, on the contrary, were allowed to remain unaltered. The instructions to the Commissioners were such that it was possible for them to discharge their duty without regard to political motives; and therefore the Irish Members wished to see the original schemes and maps, to compare them with the final maps, and to trace the processes by which the changes were arrived at. If this were not done every arrangement proposed would be strenuously resisted. In Dublin County the divisions had been adopted which were proposed by the Orange Emergency Association, and they did not accord in any way with the instructions given to the Commissioners. Regard was not paid to compactness or the pursuits of the population. It was said that the divisions had been made respectively urban and rural. He wanted to know why Rathmines, Booterstown, Blackrock, Monkstown, and the other Southern districts were so arranged as to go together, and exclude all the other urban districts to the North of Dublin, such as Howth, Clontarf, and Malahide, which were just as much of an urban character as the others? Simply because the former were expected to give a Tory vote and the latter to vote on the popular side. Dublin City had been treated differently from Belfast for the sake of depriving Dublin of a sixth Member. It was time the representation of the Universities should cease; the state of things which had made it necessary had passed away. University Members had no special qualification, and graduates had votes as occupiers or owners. The Irish Members contested seven cases, and, unless maps and documents were produced, it would be their duty to occupy time in raising discussions upon all these cases.

MR. KENNY said, it was lamentable that the borough representation of Ireland should be practically wiped out. The proposal of the Government would reduce the borough representation of the counties of Limerick and Clare to one Member. The Government scheme only retained Members for 15 Irish boroughs. It was not calculated to improve the condition of the Irish boroughs to deprive them of Parliamentary representation. He was the more desirous of stating the case of Limerick City in the House, because the instructions to the Boundary Commissioners made it impossible for the case to be presented in the Court. The Corporation of Limerick had forwarded to him a series of statements in support of their claim that their representation should remain unchanged. It was an ancient city, and had been the seat of several Parliaments. Its manufactures, trade, and commerce entitled it to retain its present representation. Many inconsistent arrangements had been made, apparently with no other object than that of distributing the strength of the Nationalist Party; and it was only natural that the strongest protests should be made against the undisguised jerry-mandering of which the Commissioners had been made the instruments. The course taken by the Commissioners in Donegal was an audacious piece of jerry-mandering. In that county districts were to be brought together which were practically as far apart as Scotland and Ireland. The Commissioners had actually joined in one constituency two districts which were separated by Lough Swilly. As to the Universities, whatever were the original motives for giving them representation, these motives had long since disappeared. The original intention was that learned men might be sent to Parliament to assist in promoting education; but that had ceased to be necessary now for a long time. He found that for the last 85 years the Representatives of Dublin University had been lawyers. As to Armagh, the county had been divided quite regardless of the instructions to the Commissioners, and at the instigation of local Tories for party purposes, and more inconvenient and absurd divisions could not have been devised. The case of Londonderry was an extraordinary one. It had been stated that the Solicitor General for Ireland sent a gentleman to represent him when the Commissioners held a Court for the purpose of considering the divisions of the county. He believed the hon. and learned Gentleman objected to the present scheme, which savoured of jerry-mandering. The hon. and learned Gentleman ought in that case to use his great influence with the Government in order to get a just and equal division of the county which he represented. He hoped the Solicitor General for Ireland would state his views upon the subject.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that as the hon. Member had referred to him he would state what he knew of the matter. Derry was undoubtedly not the last case which the Boundary Commissioners considered, although, being one of the counties to the extreme North, it was among the last. What advantage any division, or portion of a division, could attain by being last considered, he could not conceive. The original scheme for the division of the county of Derry was manifestly framed from the maps of the Ordnance Department, and without local knowledge. The county of Londonderry, amongst other baronies, comprised three which were parallel with each other, and included within this area was a large proportion of the Roman Catholic element of the county. The proposed division of the county divided the three baronies. Further, it divided three parishes. It left a mountain range between one portion and another, and left totally out of view similarity of constituency. That division was opposed, and in the speech of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), which was more amusing than accurate, it was said that he gave instructions to someone to attend on his behalf. That was not the case; but on boundaries coming to be fixed, three parties attended—one representing the Nationalists, another the Liberal, and another the Conservative Association. It was perfectly clear that both these Associations objected to the proposed division of the county of Derry upon obvious grounds—the want of geographical compactness, the fact that a mountain range ran through it, and the want of similarity. The proposal made by the Liberal Association was not adopted, but that put forward by the Conservative Association was followed. The Commissioners had adhered to the rule laid down for the Commissioners; they observed geographical compactness; they did not divide parishes as in the proposed scheme; and they observed regularity. They left the mountain range as a division between two districts, and they had passing through each division a central line of railway connecting the particular division with one centre. Objections were made as to other divisions which he did not intend to enter upon; but, as regarded Donegal, he was forced to the conclusion that hon. Members below the Gangway, when the result was against them upon one ground, used the same ground in another case in an opposite direction. For his own part, he honestly believed that in the schemes which had been approved the Commissioners had observed the condition of geographical compactness, had acted up to their instructions, and had not been influenced by Party or political relations.

MR. EWART said, he would not occupy the attention of the House more than a few seconds. Indeed, the debate had come on him by surprise, and the long speeches which they had heard seemed to him as only suited to the Committee stage of the Bill. He would not have intervened at that time; but the case of Belfast had been so pointedly referred to by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), and noticed by the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill and others, that he felt it incumbent on him to correct some inaccuracies in the speech of the hon. Member. The Solicitor General had characterized that speech as "more amusing than accurate." He would designate it as one of singular exaggeration. The hon. Member, in his effort to sustain the charge against the Boundary Commission of partizanship, had made the astounding statement that, whereas Belfast was entitled to only two Members, the Commissioners had so enlarged the boundaries as to entitle it to four Members. Now, the House would be enabled to form their opinion as to the value of the statement. The Redistribution Bill, as the House knew, gave Belfast four Members, and indicated a boundary with sufficient population for that purpose.

The Solicitor General for Ireland

Now, if he were disposed to make a charge of partizanship against the Commissioners, he thought he had some ground for it, because, though the Redistribution Bill fixed a boundary and gave Belfast four Members, yet the Commissioners had needlessly extended the boundaries, taking from the County Antrim many thousands and from the County Down a considerable number, thereby, as his friends alleged, weakening the Conservative interest in both counties; but though he had their complaint and others about the counties, yet he would be slow to assume or make the charge of partizanship against the Commissioners. He would not follow the hon. Member for Monaghan into the subject of the respective numbers of the Nationalists and Loyalists that would be returned under the new law. The hon. Member had by far overstated the number of Loyalists that would be returned. He (Mr. Ewart) repeated that though by numbers they were entitled to one-third of the representation—that was a simple question of arithmetic—yet it would be impossible for them to return even one-sixth. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had referred to a letter of Lord Salisbury in which he spoke of the spirit in which the Boundary Commissioners should proceed in their work. Well, the only construction that could be put on that was that it meant a spirit of favouritism. [Laughter by Home Rulers.] Hon. Members laughed; but all the noble Lord meant by the words was that the duty of the Commissioners ought to be conducted in a spirit of fairness. For himself and the Party with which he acted he totally disclaimed any desire that the duty should be discharged in any other spirit.

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT said, there had been a great deal of discussion this afternoon on the subject of redistribution in Ireland. He would not venture on that dangerous ground; but before Mr. Speaker left the Chair, he would like to say a few words with reference to what had happened with regard to the scheme of redistribution of seats in Scotland. As the House might be aware, a certain amount of dissatisfaction was caused by the inefficient way in which redistribution, and especially the grouping of boroughs, was dealt with by the Bill. It was felt by all

Scotch Liberals that the system of grouping of boroughs was altogether out of date, and not calculated to answer the requirements that were now necessary in Scotland. Some time ago the President of the Local Government Board gave out in the House to the Scotch Members that if they would consider amongst themselves what would be desirable and right in the matter of redistribution, and more especially with regard to the grouping of Scotch boroughs, and making the principle more satisfactory than at present, the Government would be willing to take the matter into their consideration. With that view the Scottish Members had got into relation with the Lord Advocate, who, at once responding to their desires, had done his best to frame an improved scheme. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had gone into the subject very elaborately, and produced a scheme which he (Mr. A. Elliot) thought an immense improvement upon the scheme proposed by the Bill. The Lord Advocate had then asked the Scottish Members to meet him in a private room in this House, and talk over the scheme which he had prepared. That scheme contained very considerable changes from the scheme of the Bill, and it was gone into clause by clause and word by word by the Scottish Members together. He might say that, although the Scottish Members did not approve of all the Lord Advocate's suggestions, still they accepted and thoroughly approved of nine-tenths of them; and he thought those changes would be adopted nomine contradicente by the Scottish Members. At all events, the Government was now in possession, not only of the draft scheme of the Lord Advocate, but of that scheme with the views of the Scottish Members upon it. One of the proposals which he, for one, supported very heartily was to put the villages which had hitherto been put out of the counties back into the counties. He said "villages," because the small burghs with which the Lord Advocate proposed to deal were towns with less than 1,000 inhabitants, and the Lord Advocate thought it desirable that they should go back into the counties of which they formed a part. He should not have taken up the time of the House by bringing this matter before it if he had found that Amendments had been put down by the Lord Advocate or some other Member of the Government to carry out the recommendations of the Lord Advocate, endorsed by the great majority of the Scottish Members. There were some matters which required to be taken into consideration with other matters, one being the inclusion of Portobello and Musselburgh in the City of Edinburgh. What could be simpler than for the Lord Advocate to have put down the proposal to deal with Portobello—and, so far as he knew, there was no opposition to it—that Portobello and Musselburgh should be grouped with Edinburgh? He hoped he was not asking too much of the Government when he asked them to tell the House what they proposed to do to carry out the proposals of their own Lord Advocate, approved by the majority of Scottish Members. If, as he did not doubt, they intended to give effect to these recommendations, he hoped they would put their Amendments on the Paper at the earliest moment, so that they might know what they had to deal with.

Mr. DAWSON complained that the towns in Ireland and the industrial interests connected with them had been almost entirely sacrificed to the counties. In future only 15 towns in Ireland would be represented; and how, under such circumstances, were the voices of trade and industry to make themselves heard. He could not refer to this matter without expressing his gratification at the deep interest which the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) took in the prosperity and progress of Irish industry; and he could assure the hon. Baronet that his efforts in that direction had been highly appreciated in Ireland. He only wished that Englishmen of that character could be multiplied. He especially pleaded for a reconsideration of the case of the City of Limerick, to which another Member ought to be given. The population of the city amounted to 145,000, or 45,000 beyond the sum which entitled it to the two Members which it now enjoyed. Indeed, by a reasonable extension of the boundary of the city it would be easy to procure the requisite number of additional inhabitants to entitle the borough to a third Member. In the interests of commerce and industry, it was very desirable that the representation of Limerick should be thus increased. Its sentimental claims to consideration were also very great. Its Charter was only less ancient than that of the City of London, and it had ever been famous in peace and war. As the legend on the Civic banner said—

"Urbs antiqua fuit, studiisque asperrima belli." He contended, therefore, in consideration both of the historical claims of Limerick, and of its agricultural claims, and of its commercial claims, that the representation of that ancient borough should not be reduced.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he would express the hope that the House would consent to go into Committee on the Bill that afternoon. That was the anxious wish of the Government, and the moderate length at which hon. Members spoke was an indication, he thought, of their desire in the same direction. He thought the Question which had been asked by the hon. Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. Elliot) was a very reasonable one indeed. The Government had most carefully examined the scheme prepared by the Lord Advocate in the light which had been thrown upon it by the observations and expressions of opinion of the Scottish Members; and they had come to this conclusion—that the difference of opinion that existed on one or two of the points contained in that scheme would almost certainly be fatal to those points; and the impossibility of carrying out those points would very seriously endanger the others. In endeavouring to revise the scheme, it was brought at every moment before the notice of the Government; and the more the House examined the scheme the more it would be brought before the notice of the House, for the scheme was a very carefully constructed map—he might almost call it a puzzle, but it would not be a puzzle if it were carefully examined—and it would be seen that it was almost impossible to displace any one piece of it without displacing the others. Still, the Government was desirous to meet the suggestions and criticisms of Scottish Members, and embody, as far as possible, the results of their deliberations in Amendments. Notably, they earnestly hoped to meet the case of the burgh of Leith, which was, perhaps, the strongest case of the many which had been put forward by the Lord Advocate and viewed favourably by the Scottish Members. He would respond to the appeal of his hon. Friend by saying that they would have a consultation with the Lord Advocate, and at the very earliest opportunity determine what Amendments might be placed upon the Paper. Coming to other speeches that had been made, he had to express his surprise that the scheme before the House should have been attacked from below the Gangway opposite, for he had not imagined that the scheme could be seriously distasteful to the Irish Members. In fact, it would, in his opinion, be difficult for any Member, even one sharing the sympathies of the hon. Gentlemen to whom he was referring, to frame a scheme which should favour those sympathies to a greater degree, and, at the same time, have the slightest chance before the House. The Bill had been framed upon certain broad lines and just principles, which favoured Nationalist views just as much as they ought to be favoured, and no less. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), alluding to the action of the Boundary Commissioners, complained that Kingstown and other suburbs had not been added to Dublin in the same way that outlying suburbs had been added to the borough of Belfast; and the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny) spoke in a passionless way of what he called the shameful system of jerrymandering that had been carried out in the County Donegal. It was sufficient to reply that the character of the Commissioners was so high that such an epithet as shameful could not possibly be applied to their conduct. The hon. Member for Ennis and others complained that the Irish urban representation had been too greatly reduced; that too little regard had been had to the claim to representation of the commerce and industry of Ireland. It was curious that the hon. Members below the Gangway opposite were not the only people who raised an objection of that kind. Those who thought that the National Party would gain too much advantage by the Bill had been at great pains to devise some method by which that result could be mitigated; and their original plan of having recourse to proportional or minority representation having fallen to the ground, they now wished to gain their ends by diminishing the rural representation of Ireland and increasing the number of borough Members, their idea being that small boroughs could be grouped together as in Scotland. He was not going to argue against that proposal; but he only referred to it to show that hon. Members below the Gangway on the other side, when they complained of the small amount of representation given to the urban element in Ireland, ought to be careful what they were doing, because they were opening a door and letting out a stream of water which, under certain circumstances, might become a serious flood. The towns of Drogheda and Limerick had been specially mentioned in the course of the debate. With reference to the first of these, he thought it would be at once seen that no exceptional favour could be shown it. Because the inhabitants of a town were only a little below 15,000 in number, it could not be excepted from the general slaughter. He knew of a town in England which was supposed to have come within Schedule I. of the Bill, because at the time of the Census a larger number than usual of its inhabitants were pursuing the avocation of deep-sea fishing, the weather at the time favouring that pursuit. If they were once to make any exceptions from the operation of Schedule I., they would never know where to stop. The hon. Member for Carlow Mr. Dawson had pleaded that Limerick should retain her second seat, because she had been famous in peace and in war. Canterbury and Durham had also been famous in these respects; and why should Limerick be treated differently from these places, each of which would lose a seat? The City of London, like the City of Limerick, would lose half of her representation. Then the hon. Member referred to the City of London, and said that it was treated differently from Limerick. Now, how had Limerick been treated? One Member had been taken away from Limerick, but two Members had been taken away from London. The Government had treated Limerick exactly as they had treated London. He had referred to this question of the Irish boroughs, because it had not been dealt with previously from the Treasury Bench. He would not go back to the question of the counties, because that had been discussed by two of his Colleagues. The hon. Member for Ennis, however, had referred especially to the way in which the Boundary Commissioners had dealt with the county of Armagh. The reason why the Commissioners had altered their original scheme with regard to that county was, if he might be permitted to say so, because they had made a mistake in the division of the county in the first instance, and they were compelled to rectify it. Each of the divisions of Armagh averaged 51,000, 52,000, and 53,000; but it was found that North Armagh contained fewer than these, and in order to bring that division up to the requisite number, a portion of South Armagh was cut off and added to it, because the latter was a mountainous district. The map of Armagh was one which carried conviction with it, and he earnestly wished, as a justification for the policy of the Commissioners, that the House would look at the map of Armagh, and see exactly how the mountainous district, with its particular agricultural industry, was separated from the flat country, with its agricultural industry. Then, the hon. Member had referred to Dublin. In that case, the course pursued by the Commissioners was unusual, because the position of the county of Dublin was extremely unusual. It was one of those very rare counties in Ireland which resembled a good many English counties. There were three sorts of population—the population which lived in the city, the population which lived in the country, and the population which lived largely and thickly in the suburbs. The county had to be divided in two. Divided by the population, it was necessary to make a large division where the population was scanty, and a small division where the population was close; while each division had been made as compact as possible. If the Irish Members would look at the maps of Northumberland and Durham on the Tyne side, they would see that the new divisions in those counties corresponded exactly to the divisions in Dublin County. In conclusion, he earnestly trusted that hon. Members would view this question of Ireland as a whole, and would try, as far as possible, to put out of their minds any idea that any conscious effort had been made not to give fair play to any party in Ireland. He hoped, also, that they would see the advantage of settling these questions at a period when political passions connected with elections had been lulled by the passing of the Franchise Bill, and would not wait until such a time that they could not be dealt with justly, calmly, and fairly.

MR. W. J. CORBET said, that the original instructions issued to the Boundary Commissioners had been very favourably received in Ireland. But how had those instructions been carried out? In the instructions given to the Commissioners, they found it stated they were—

“To hear any objections to the proposed constitution of the divisions, and receive proposals for their alteration. It will be convenient that the substance of such objections and proposals should be handed in to the Commissioner or Assistant Commissioner in writing.”

In accordance with that invitation, some of the most influential gentlemen, clergymen and others, appeared before Mr. Commissioner White, at Wicklow, on the part of the popular side, and laid their views before him in favour of dividing the county into North and South instead of East and West. He intimated that such was the original view of the Boundary Commissioners, and asked to have the alternative scheme of the objections put in writing, assuring them it would receive due consideration. The proposal was handed in, but did not appear to have been taken the least notice of, and was not even mentioned in the Commissioners' Report. In the recommendations of the Commissioners it was proposed to give three baronies to East Wicklow, with an area of 165,389 acres, valuation £151,123, population 34,599; to West Wicklow five baronies, area 334,788 acres, population 35,787. That practically gave two-thirds of the county to West, and one-third, with the whole of the coast line, to East Wicklow. In the County Louth the seaboard had been almost equally divided between the North and South Divisions of Dundalk and Drogheda. The proposal laid before the Commissioners on behalf of the people of Wicklow was to divide the county into North and South, giving four baronies to each, which left for North Wicklow an area of 252,329 acres, valuation £134,861, population 35,416; to South Wicklow an area of 247,848 acres, valuation £137,519, population 34,970. The question of compactness had been much dwelt on by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) in his speech awhile ago, and there could be no doubt on which side the compactness lay in the two proposals. As for keeping all the fishing and seafaring interests together, there was no reason for departing, in the division of Wicklow, from the course adopted in County Louth. In Committee he would oppose the scheme of the Commissioners to the utmost of his power.

MR. BUCHANAN said, he had heard with great disappointment the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; because, so far as he understood that statement, it seemed to imply that very little was to be done to carry out the Lord Advocate's scheme. He wished to point out that the proposals in the scheme were of three kinds. There was the proposal to merge certain of the small burghs in the counties, the proposal to re-group certain districts of burghs, and the proposal to constitute certain new constituencies. The last might give rise to differences of opinion; but in regard to the other two proposals, he had a note of the results of the meeting of the Scottish Members with the Lord Advocate, and he would state the result in answer to his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who said that there was a great difference of opinion in regard to the proposals. The result was that in the one for the amalgamation of Bute and Argyll the minority was only eight, and the other proposal of the same description—namely, for the creation of a new county constituency of the Hebrides, was carried unanimously. In regard to the other parts of the scheme, some of the Scottish Members did not think they went far enough; but they were willing to consider them on their merits, and they had all been looking forward to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate placing his Amendments on the Paper. It had been a matter of great disappointment that nothing of this sort had been done, and he gathered from the speech of his right hon. Friend that nothing of the sort was to be proposed. The right hon. Gentleman had also adduced the argument, which he thought a very strange one, that this Bill was a kind of puzzle in which no piece could be displaced. He was surprised that the Government had not used this argument last night when they were pressing for increased representation; and he hoped that when the question of increasing the number of Scottish Representatives was again raised the Government would make use of his right hon. Friend's argument, and insist equally strongly that that part of the Bill should not be interfered with. The right hon. Gentleman had further said that there would be a final consultation as to what Amendments might be placed upon the Paper. For his part, he would much rather the right hon. Gentleman had said what Amendments would be put upon the Paper. In reality it came to this—that they could not get any definite promise out of the Government to fulfil the expectations which they had held out to the Scottish Members. It came to this—that the Amendments which the vast majority of the Scottish Members desired would depend, not upon the opinion of the majority of the Scottish Members who sat on this side of the House, but on the small minority of Scottish Members who sat opposite. This whole question showed the difficulty that attached to the consideration of the Bill owing to the peculiar nature of its inception, and to the fact of the Government being bound by pledges to right hon. Gentlemen opposite. He would firmly urge upon the Government that they should endeavour to redeem the expectations they held out to the Scottish Members. The proposals laid before the Lord Advocate were of a most moderate character; and it was exceedingly disappointing that, after all, nothing whatever was to be done. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman would see that very great dissatisfaction and disappointment would be occasioned in Scotland if this matter were neglected.

MR. LEWIS said, he thought that the attention of the House should be directed to the monstrous anomalies in the representation of the Metropolis under the new scheme. The Bill, he understood, was introduced for the purpose of correcting anomalies, and yet he found that there were really more anomalies in the construction of the new Metropolitan constituencies than ever existed before. A Return had recently been issued giving the population in the new boroughs proposed to be created in the Metropolis. Under the new scheme Chelsea was to have a population of 88,000 inhabitants, with one Member; while its next door neighbour, Fulham, with a population of 42,000, was to have the same representation. Then he would take the case of the two St. George's, one poor, the other rich. St. George's-in-the-East, with 47,000, was to be made equal to St. George's Hanover Square, with 89,000 inhabitants. Hampstead, with a population of 45,462, and Lewisham, with a population of 86,150, were each to have one Member. The like anomaly appeared in the case of neighbouring boroughs; Holborn and Finsbury were next door neighbours, yet Holborn had a population of 82,000 and Finsbury of only 46,000. Taking various cases together, the result was that sometimes 86,000 persons returned a Member, and sometimes only 40,000. So far as the new constituencies went, therefore, the same anomalies appeared in them as existed at present. How was it if the old constituencies were compared with the new? Westminster, with 229,000 inhabitants, had been divided into three one-Member boroughs. St. Pancras, with a population of 236,000, had received four Members; and more monstrous still, Kensington and Marylebone, with 318,061, were to have four Members together; while Mile End and Paddington, with 320,681, were to have six Members. These anomalies were altogether unaccountable, and bore the trace of the cloven foot. He thought that the anomalies which were to exist under the new system in the representation of London were a discredit to anyone who had had the drawing up of the details of the Bill; they were clearly opposed to propriety, fair play, and common sense; and he thought the House was entitled to some explanation from the Government on the subject. London itself was satisfied with its increased representation, and therefore did not object so much to these anomalies; but those who were to have their representation lopped off were entitled to question the fairness of such arrangements. Another point to which he wished to call attention was the case of towns which might, by a small extension into their suburbs, have retained their representation. This had been done in the case of Warwick, which had only 11,800 of population, whereas Wigan had lost one of its Members, although it was only just below the necessary number. In fact no other case than that of Warwick could be shown in which the limits of a borough had been extended for the express purpose of saving its dual representation; and he considered that some reason ought to be given for the exceptional course which had been taken in that matter.

MR. RAIKES said, he did not intend to enter into a discussion of the points raised by the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Lewis), because he had placed Amendments on the Paper which would be considered in Committee, with the object of dealing with London in a different way from that proposed by the Bill. His proposal was to retain the existing boroughs instead of creating the numerous new constituencies proposed, and to apportion to each that fair share of representation to which it might be entitled. They would then be sub-divided into wards, exactly as Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, and other large places were divided, which would be much more equal in population than anything which would be insured by the Government scheme. He rose, however, to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would have two maps made and hung in the Library of the House, the one showing the proposed divisions of London under the scheme as embodied in the Bill, and the other showing the representation of London as at present existing?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that he was afraid that it would be difficult to manage such a map, as the scale on which the maps were drawn was very large. He would be glad, however, to give any information in his power upon the subject.

MR. BIGGAR said, he must express his disappointment that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had not given his promised explanation as to the grounds on which Warwick was treated differently from other parts of the Kingdom. Hon. Gentlemen from Ireland had urged the claims of Limerick and Drogheda; and it would have been only reasonable for the right hon. Gentleman to state why those places were to suffer, in the one total disfranchisement, and in the other partial disfranchisement, while Warwick was to retain separate representation.

Mr. Lewis

The Scotch Members were consulted as to the rearrangement of the seats in Scotland; and, therefore, he thought it would have been but fair that the Irish Members should have had an opportunity of expressing their views upon the arrangement of the electoral districts in their country. Reference had been made to the fact that Belfast was the only borough in Ireland in the case of which instructions were given to the Boundary Commissioners. If additions had been made to other boroughs—to Limerick and Drogheda, for instance—they would not have been disfranchised, as was now proposed by the Bill. In his opinion, the two boroughs he mentioned had been very hardly treated; and if anything could be done by which they would retain their present representation, it was well it should be done. As to the County Cavan, he could not complain of the decision of the Commissioners. The original scheme proposed by the Boundary Commissioners was one with which he had no fault to find. His hon. Colleague did not take the trouble to attend before the Commissioners as he (Mr. Biggar) did; but he wrote a note to the Commissioners complaining of their scheme, and intimating that he would bring the matter before the House of Commons. By the scheme of the Commissioners Cavan was divided into two divisions, East and West, by a line running almost due North and South. His hon. Colleague proposed that the county should be divided into North and South by a line running from East to West. He (Mr. Biggar) could not see that, had his hon. Colleague's suggestion been adopted, any difference would have been made in the representation of the county. The Loyalist Party in Ireland, he also observed, sought to exaggerate the amount of power which the Nationalists would obtain under that Bill. Now, he believed that in the county of Antrim not a single Nationalist Member would be elected under the provisions of the Bill; and in other places, also, the measure would operate very unfairly towards that Party. He thought that under a system of proportional representation, or by the cumulative vote, the result in many English constituencies would be that the Irish Nationalists would be able to return a Member of their way of thinking; and that would be quite as beneficial for their interest as the Bill now before the House would be. However, as the Bill had been accepted by the Leaders of the two great Parties in the House, there was no chance of success for the advocates of any other measure at present. But as to the details of the proposed redistribution in different constituencies, he maintained that there was very great cause of complaint. In the county of Londonderry, for instance, they had altered the original scheme, and in the boundary scheme which they now recommended they paid no attention to community of interest in the populations which they had grouped together. They had cut into two a large Catholic population, which were most intimately connected, intermarrying with each other, attending the same fairs and markets, and having the same interests, and managed so to draw the line of division as to weaken the Catholic and National Party in each division, and prevent them from electing a Member in either. In the face of that decision of the Boundary Commission, he asserted that if the evidence which had been laid before the Commissioners could be brought before that House, it would be seen that it was proved to demonstration that the Commissioners had gone absolutely against the weight of evidence.

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked, What Business was to be taken to-morrow, and also whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer meant to go on with Supply on Monday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, the Government proposed to take Supply to-morrow — the Naval Supplementary Estimates first, then the remaining Civil Service Supplementary Estimates. The Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill would be taken after Supply to-morrow. It was also proposed to take Supply on Monday.

In answer to further Questions,

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the Government would bring on the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill at any opportunity they could get to-morrow. It was their desire to get the Speaker out of the Chair; but the clauses would not be proceeded with at an hour inconvenient to the House.

TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN (PERPETUITY GRANTS) BILL.

SECOND READING.

This Bill was on the list of Private Bills, but the Chairman of Committees having failed to refer to it.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM rose to Order. As the Bill was on the Paper for second reading, he objected to its being passed over without any Notice of its postponement having been given to its promoters.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, that he had examined the Bill, and thinking that it was one which should not pass without further consideration he had thought it well to defer the second reading.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, he thought the question as to whether or not the Bill was one which should not be read a second time was for the judgment of their Lordships. The measure had been before the noble Earl the Earl of Redesdale, and the noble Earl had admitted in the most candid manner that he believed the Bill was promoted by Trinity College. He did not think that a greater compliment could be paid to the promoters of a Bill than to say that it was one framed by the Corporation at which it might be supposed to strike. This matter had been brought under the notice of Parliament on previous occasions, four years ago and last year; and the promoters were told that a Royal Commission would not be granted to inquire into the subject, but that some other means of ventilating it would be taken.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) pointed out that the measure—which, it was true, he had at first supposed to be promoted by Trinity College—proposed to make alterations in the law between landlord and tenant in behalf of some tenants of Trinity College. It would, in its present form, open the doors to the introduction of most dangerous interference with the public law by private legislation. Time, he thought, should be taken for further consideration before reading the Bill a second time.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM contended that the faults the Chairman of Committees conceived to exist in the Bill were questions for consideration in Committee. The Bill had been promoted because an inquiry by that House, whether by a Royal Commission or a Select Committee, had been refused on more than one occasion. They now sought to get the subject of the Bill inquired into with a view to legislation, or to have it shown to them that they had no case for legislation. They had no option but to endeavour to obtain what they desired by promoting this Bill. He was afraid that the action taken that afternoon was a gagging process, resulting from Trinity College getting hold of his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees. The Chairman of Committees had reported in favour of this Bill.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES): No, no!

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, that Trinity College had pushed matters to an extreme, and there was such a thing even as an Irish tenant becoming exasperated. They had been agitating this matter for four years, and it was now for their Lordships to terminate a very unseemly wrangle between Trinity College and its tenants. Trinity College had divisions in its own camp. Only recently a tenant had gone before the Board, and the majority had agreed to reduce the rents. The Provost, however, had put his veto on the matter, and stopped the reduction. He did not wish to weary their Lordships with these details; but if they did not come before a Committee of the House how were they to be settled? He would move that the Bill be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Leitrim.)

LORD FITZGERALD said, he thought it would be well to postpone the second reading, so as to see whether that which was objectionable in the Bill could not be removed.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM: I will agree to that course.

Motion by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Second Reading postponed till Thursday next.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)—THE SUAKIN-BERBER RAILWAY.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN rose, in pursuance of Notice, to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether the Government have in their possession any accurate survey of the proposed line of railway from Suakin to Berber; whether there is any contract with the constructors of the said proposed railway; and, if so, whether they would lay such contract upon the Table of the House; whether the Government have reason to believe that it will be possible to complete the said line of railway before the autumn; and if there be no reasonable prospect of the line being so completed, what steps the Government propose to take in order to secure the efficiency and safety of the forces now under the command of General Lord Wolseley in the Soudan; also to ask whether the Government had information of the report that Lord Wolseley had publicly announced his intention to advance on and to take Khartoum? The noble Lord said, that, in putting these Questions, he had no idea of doing anything which would embarrass the Government, or be disadvantageous to the public interests. What he wanted to know by his first Question was, whether Her Majesty's Government had any survey of sufficient accuracy to enable them to tell the House whether by any reasonable means the railway could be completed in time to relieve the Forces now acting under

Lord Wolseley? It was clear, for two reasons, that Her Majesty's Government must be in possession of a considerable amount of information as to the line over which it was proposed to take the railway. The first was that, for a long time past, they had been publicly and privately warned that, in the event of any misfortune happening to Lord Wolseley's Force, it would be absolutely necessary to open the Suakin-Berber route; and he could not but think, therefore that they had obtained every possible information as to the practicability of that route; and, secondly, because when the question was before the Government as to which route should be taken by the Relief Force under Lord Wolseley, it was not possible to believe that they had come to a decision without definite and reliable knowledge as to both routes. His second Question, as to the existence of a contract for the railway in question, had been answered in "another place," and the Secretary of State for War had promised to lay it on the Table. Probably the noble Earl would also consent to lay it on the Table of their Lordships' House. He should be glad if the noble Earl would now state the terms of the contract, and whether the contractors were bound to make the railway as a whole? What he wished to say to the Government as to the construction of this railway was this. Are you in earnest? He did not ask impossibilities of the Government; but, if possible, were the Government determined to carry the railway through to Berber, or would they only make a beginning, go, perhaps, as far as Sinkat, and then wait to see what would happen next? Under ordinary circumstances he might have scarcely felt justified in asking them such a Question; but all that was happening now had happened before—only a year ago. Last year, as now, there were soldiers and garrisons in the Soudan, whom we were bound to support and relieve, and besides many thousands of helpless women and children. Last year we sent out troops to crush Osman Digna, as we hope to crush him now. Last year, as now, we sent out plant for the construction of a railway; but the railway was begun, and nothing more came of it. History was repeating itself very fast. He was entitled to ask whether the Government were going to do the same thing now? There was no result from the operations of last year except the shedding of much blood and the lavishing of treasure. The Government said that those battles saved Suakin; but would anybody in this country believe that Suakin would not have been safe except for the battles of Teb and Tamanieb? He would repeat, were the Government in earnest in making the railway from Suakin to Berber? With reference to the third Question, he hoped that the Government would say that it would be made in time to be of service to Lord Wolseley. He should like to know whether this railway would not take two years in construction; for Lord Wolseley himself stated that two years was the time this would be needed for the work. If that were so, it became a question why the railway was to be constructed, or if it should be constructed at all. The matter was of great consequence, because of the position which it seemed intended that Lord Wolseley's Forces should occupy during the hot months. He spoke as one who had had experience of such climates, and he knew how depressing and dangerous enforced inactivity was. He, moreover, was at a loss to know how Lord Wolseley was to get supplies, and how reliefs were to be sent if it became necessary, if the railway were not completed by the autumn. What he wanted to know was, whether the Government had any other string to their bow? He asked the Government to give one some hope—some certainty—that this country would be in a position to relieve Lord Wolseley's Force if necessary. He felt sure that the noble Earl would do both the Government and the country a great service if he would let them know for certain what the Government intended to do. As to the last portion of his Question, as to Lord Wolseley's announcement, he would ask further, if the Government had received this information, whether it was their intention to abide by it? He had himself lived among Orientals, and he knew well that if there was one thing more disastrous than another it was to say anything which they were not prepared to carry out. Were the Government prepared to carry out this intention? He would be very sorry to put any limit to what could be done by British troops under any circumstances, and no doubt it was possible to go to Khartoum and take it; but what would be the advantage of that alone? Her Majesty's Government had announced their intention of destroying the power of the Mahdi at Khartoum. As a Member of their Lordships' House, he entered his protest against this policy of going to Khartoum with the avowed object of retiring from it. There was no more fatal policy than this—to fight, and, though victorious, to act as if the battle had been lost. If they went to Khartoum they must stay there; but the Government had no such intention; they proposed to fight their way there through a sea of blood, with no other intention or object than to wade out again, with this additional evil result—that those Arabs, who might have been our friends, would, and must, become our deadly and implacable enemies. He did not wish to criticize the conduct of the Expedition in any way; but he could not help thinking that General Brackenbury had made a mistake in destroying the villages up the Nile, instead of doing all in his power to conciliate the Arabs of the districts through which he passed. Berber, which was the key of the whole position, should be made the military centre of the Soudan; and under a Government such as might be instituted either by, or under the authority of England, it would now become a centre of civilization and commerce. That was, supposing always that it were possible to construct the railway from Suakin. If the Mahdi were determined to continue his hostile attitude and to drive us out of Egypt, we should be infinitely better able to check and defeat him should he advance to attack us at Berber, thereby following him into his own wild and desert country. The last words from General Gordon were striking and characteristic, and he would recommend them to the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. In answer to a message from the Mahdi that Colonel Stewart was killed, and that he had full information as to the state of Khartoum, General Gordon said—"I do not care what you know or what you do. I am made of iron. I shall stop here." If the Government would only act on such a principle, give the country the information they desired, and to which they were entitled, and, having fixed upon a definite policy, stand firmly by it, he felt sure that they would have the approval and support of the country. He asked the noble Earl for a reply to the Question of which he had given Notice.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that he entirely acquitted the noble Marquess opposite of any intention to impede the military operations by putting this Question on the Paper. But he thought the noble Marquess had travelled a little beyond the confines of the Question. During the course of the noble Marquess's speech, he had more than once been tempted to regret that he had not had an opportunity on a former occasion of hearing the noble Marquess. He trusted, however, that their Lordships would excuse him if he abstained from following his noble Friend into the somewhat extraneous matter contained in his speech. As to the Question on the Paper, they had no actual survey for the construction of the Suakin-Berber line; but they had endeavoured to collect all the information that was available both in Egypt and in this country; and he believed that they had acquired sufficient information to enable them to state that there would be no insuperable difficulties in its construction. There might be one or two points of difficulty in connection with the engineering of it; but he did not believe that these were such as could not be overcome. With regard to the second point, there was no contract with the constructors of the proposed railway; but there was an arrangement made with them by which they were to act as agents of the Government. The Government proposed to lay the document which embodied the terms of this arrangement before their Lordships; and it would not be wise or prudent, meanwhile, to enter into a detailed statement of what those terms were. As to the third point, the period when the line was likely to be finished, he should be extremely glad to give an answer if he could; but, as their Lordships must be aware, its construction depended upon military as well as engineering considerations. They trusted that the military difficulties would be overcome without any long delay; but it would be extremely hazardous to venture upon any forecast on that point. Those difficulties overcome, they were assured by the constructors that there would be no difficulty in constructing it, or at least a great part of it, by the time autumn set in, in a form which would be sufficient for military purposes. There might be difficulties which they could not foresee, which might impede their progress with the line; but as far as they were aware, and as their information led them to believe, the railway would, if not completed, be made for a considerable way by the autumn, and the making of even a portion of it would be of great assistance in any movement of troops or stores that might be necessary. As to the steps which the Government proposed to take for securing the efficiency and safety of the Forces under Lord Wolseley, it seemed to him that the noble Marquess had been a little confusing two things in his own mind. The question of the actual relief and security of the Forces under Lord Wolseley at present in the Soudan could not be affected, in the slightest degree, by any considerations connected with the making of that line. It would be quite as difficult to convey stores and supplies from Suakin as from Wady Halfa. With regard to the supplies for Lord Wolseley's troops in the Soudan, which were above the Cataracts, between the first and second series, these troops were at present being supplied from Egyptian sources entirely, while large supplies were being sent out from home. Although there were difficulties on the line of communication and transport, all he could say was that every effort had been made locally and at home to facilitate the communications with Lord Wolseley's troops, and to provide them with all necessary supplies of stores, clothing, and food, and everything else that they required. He could assure the noble Lord, if it was necessary to assure him, that every effort was being made locally to provide for the needs of the troops, and that there was no reason to suppose at present that those efforts would not be sufficient and effective. With regard to the last Question put by the noble Marquess, he could only give the simple answer that they had no information whatever as to the announcement which Lord Wolseley was reported to have made at Korti of his intention to advance on and to take Khartoum at once.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he thought that their Lordships could not but take into consideration the tone in which the Government had always hitherto treated that question, and that they must examine rather critically such a statement as that which had been just made by the Under Secretary for War. The House was in very great doubt as to what the policy of Her Majesty's Government really was. The whole of the debate which took place the other night failed to elicit from them any distinct expression of opinion; and all that could be discovered was that noble Lords on the Treasury Bench did not agree among themselves as to what the real object of the war was. The noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty entirely differed from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack; and their Colleagues in the other House differed from both of them. Some Members of the Government said they were going to Khartoum, and then immediately to leave, and some said they were to establish a stable Government at Khartoum. Towards the end of the debate it seemed that the Government had wished to convey the impression that they were going to establish some sort of a Government in the Soudan before they left. But what had happened since? He did not wonder that the noble Lord opposite was rather annoyed at the noble Marquess who had put the Question to-night having travelled somewhat far afield. He supposed that noble Lords on the Treasury Bench thought that, the Vote of Censure once fairly over, their Lordships were not to recur to the subject, but were to take the goods the gods provided them, and say nothing. They could not but remember that when the Motion was coming on a state of feverish anxiety to do something strong and positive animated noble Lords on the other side. They sent out that Expedition of our choicest troops which was now on the sea to Suakin, and complete plans for a railway from Suakin to Berber accompanied them. But now it seemed that the cold fit had succeeded to the hot fit, and the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War would not positively state that the railway was to be made. The noble Lord had said, as had been said on several occasions, that a railway could be made; but their Lordships did not know that a railway could be made, although that was the Question which was put by the noble Marquess, and which was not answered by the noble Lord the Under Secretary. If anything like a stable Government was to be established in the Soudan, was it not somewhat extraordinary that the troops that were on the march to Abu Hamad, and going to Berber, should have been ordered away from the forward position they occupied; and if the Expedition to Suakin was to proceed to Berber by railway, there was no co-operation now in contemplation between Lord Wolseley's Forces on the Nile and such an Expedition? Since the Expedition had started from Suakin, a concentration of our troops was taking place on the Nile near Korti, and not in the direction of Berber. The Expedition which left our shores the other day would be enormously costly, not only in money, but in the lives of our best soldiers; and therefore their Lordships had a right to receive some definite expression of the intention of the Government.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH observed, that their Lordships were not called upon to give an opinion on military matters now; but he wished to say, on his own behalf—what he was sure would be corroborated by General Officers of great experience—that the health of the Army was likely to suffer more from inactivity than in advancing even under the most difficult circumstances. He pointed out, also, that a retreat, under whatever conditions, must always have a powerful moral effect upon an Oriental population, as well as upon the spirits of our own troops, and he thought no retreat should be made, unless it were obviously necessary. In reference to the allusion made to Brigadier General Brackenbury, he (Lord Ellenborough) felt bound to say that that officer was free from any kind of blame; and if any blame could be attributed, it was to the General Officer who placed the Force in its position previously, and had the Brigadier advanced, or hesitated for the moment to retreat, he would have had the sympathy, one and all, of his fellow-countrymen.

EARL STANHOPE said, he thought they were entitled to demand some fuller explanation. He had heard on good authority that the officer commanding at Suakin ascertained a short time ago that Osman Digna's Forces were nearly starved out, and that he had applied to the Home Authorities for more men to enable him to take advantage of the opportunity thus afforded for dealing a decisive blow at Osman Digna. That request was, however, refused. The time for doing it had now gone by, and Osman's Force had increased, and he had regained his power. If the Government would only put forward a clear and definite statement of what they intended to do, he felt sure they would receive the unanimous support of that House and of the country; while he was equally convinced that it would strengthen Lord Wolseley's position if the Government would state that they were determined to establish a firm Government at Khartoum or at Berber.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he had understood, from the answer given by the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War, that it was the intention of the Government to try to construct a railway running the whole way from Suakin to Berber, and that they had every hope that there would be no engineering difficulty that would prevent that from being done. He had been a little disappointed at hearing from the noble Lord that no contract had been entered into for laying down that line, although the noble Lord had added that there had been an arrangement made, and that its terms would be laid before their Lordships in a short time. The House could, no doubt, discuss the matter more conveniently when they had the terms of that arrangement in their hands; and he would, therefore, now ask the noble Lord how soon they were likely to be laid on the Table?

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he could not name the day; but the arrangement would be placed on the Table at an early date as possible.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I trust that the noble Lord will not allow any unnecessary delay to occur in producing the arrangement, because a good deal of anxiety prevails on this subject; and such documentary evidence would be very grateful to the public mind, to show it what is going on. I confess that this matter has to me rather an Arabian Nights air about it. We used always to be taught that one of the greatest triumphs of Roman courage was the case of the man who bought land that was at the time occupied by Hannibal's Army. He would be a bolder man still who pledged himself to build a railway on land that was occupied by a hostile Army. But that is not the whole extent of boldness shown by Her Majesty's Government. They have not only pledged themselves, as I understand, to make a railway in the teeth of a hostile Army, but to make it on land of which they have not anything approaching to a survey. The idea of making a promise to make a railway merely on what I may call hearsay—on what this or that traveller has told you he has observed in the country—is, I venture to say, an entirely new achievement in the course of railway construction, and would alarm very much my noble Friend the Chairman of the Great Northern Railway, and some of the most distinguished railway authorities in this country; and I think it is a matter of common notoriety that one of the greatest authorities has expressed very considerable doubt of the possibility of making a railway in the proposed time. I wish to have some test that it is really a bond fide railway that is contemplated, whether the Government have taken any measures to supply materials, and how far they have taken those measures. It is a railway of 280 miles, and if there are no bridges on this railway it is the most singular railway in the world.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: There are no bridges.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: None whatever?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: There are no rivers to be crossed.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Well, it is a difficult and mountainous country, and there must be gullies that will have to be crossed by means of bridges. Iron girders must, at all events, be made to order; and I want to know what orders have been given in that respect, and whether there is anything in the nature of a specification? Then as to the time. The time which is mentioned for construction is certainly very striking to those who have paid any attention to railway business. I suppose that what the noble Lord euphemistically called the military difficulties will not be removed before the end of this month. Before the autumn comes—say the 1st of October—there will be but five months to make 280 miles; and to do this is something like two miles a-day, and this, too, in an enemy's country. I believe that to make a railway, even at the rate of one mile a-day, where an accurate survey has been made, and where beforehand every kind of railway material has been provided, where the country is in perfect peace, and the best organization is at command, is a very considerable achievement. I think it was done by Sir Richard Temple in the case of the Dacken Railway, and everybody was much surprised at it; but when the Government undertake to make a railway in an enemy's country without any survey, when, apparently, they have not ordered a single bit of railway plant beforehand—when they undertake to make this railway at the rate of two miles a-day, it really suggests that the Government have somehow or other found Aladdin's lamp, and that they intend to make use of it. It is impossible, considering the past history of this question, and considering what the influence of Parliamentary events has been upon our military preparations, not to feel some anxiety for more abundant information, that shall assure us that the intention to make those 280 miles before the autumn is serious, and that some adequate preparation for so gigantic a task is being made. I wish to press upon the noble Lord that, if he cannot give this information to-morrow, he will give us it without delay, and that he will let us have the contract, or something in the nature of a specification, to assure us that we are dealing with a serious matter.

EARL GRANVILLE: The remarks of the noble Marquess are somewhat discouraging. Her Majesty's Government have been frequently urged to make this railway, and the moment they undertake it the noble Marquess comes forward to represent the enormous difficulty of accomplishing the undertaking.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Of doing it in the time.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am unable to speak from technical knowledge. The noble Marquess has far greater knowledge of railways than I have. The noble Viscount sitting near the noble Marquess speaks of this railway as if it were a perfect myth, as if no preparations had been made, as if no plant was ready, and as if it were a matter of extraordinary chance that one of the most eminent firms of contractors in the country would be able to carry out the work. But the fact is that all the plant was perfectly ready when the arrangements were made. The noble Marquess does not expect that it is to be made like the Great Northern Railway. It is to be what is called a contractor's railway, its primary object being of a military character; but it may be used in order to be converted into a permanent railway. It will, however, be much more easily managed, and will be constructed much faster than the substantial and expensive railways to which the noble Marquess has referred.

LORD NAPIER OF MAGDALA: I believe it will be convenient to your Lordships if I explain that the railway, for military purposes, may be of a very temporary character, which could be rapidly constructed. In the invasion of a hostile country, where animal transport is deficient, it is necessary to supplement it by a railway, however temporary, as soon as the advanced posts are sufficiently established. Such a railway will greatly facilitate a more permanent structure, if such should be desired. I have had much communication with engineers connected with railways in Egypt and other Eastern countries, who were quite confident of the possibility of making the railway from Suakin to Berber without any extraordinary difficulty. They are men of experience in the construction of railways in Eastern countries, and their judgment may be relied upon. Another point which I consider it desirable to advert to is an opinion expressed in the Press and elsewhere of the desirability of entering into negotiations with the Mahdi. From first to last, the Mahdi has not shown the least disposition to treat with anyone. General Gordon's overture was met with the message—

"Put on my uniform, also become a Mussulman, and I will spare you; otherwise I will sweep you off the face of the earth."

I think that evinced the spirit of an irreconcilable fanatic, and as such he ought to be treated. To talk of negotiating with such a man was absurd. We had either to beat him or let him alone; and I hope we shall beat him.

SOUTH AFRICA (EAST COAST)—ST. LUCIA BAY.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether St. Lucia Bay is British territory, and whether he can state what extent of the coast to the north of Natal is under British protection? The noble Earl said, he did not wish to discuss the Colonial policy of the Government; but as there had been so much misunderstanding on the subject, he thought it would be a great relief to have some information on the point.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I have to say that St. Lucia Bay was ceded to the British Crown a little more than 40 years ago by Panda, the then King of Zululand, who undoubtedly exercised Sovereign powers over the territory in question. No steps were taken at the time in consequence of that cession, and nothing has been done in the long interval which has occurred until the close of last year, when it seemed to us desirable to re-assert or keep alive what was assumed to be our right to the ceded territory by hoisting the British Flag. It was not a new annexation, but simply intended to remind those whom it might concern that we had rights over that coast which were undoubtedly ours, and which we had never given up. The flag was accordingly hoisted, and it remains there. I do not think it would be quite fair to the House if I did not add that we have received communications from the German Government expressing unwillingness to recognize the validity of our title upon various grounds, one of which was the long time during which the claim has lain in abeyance. The matter is still under discussion between the two Governments; and while that is the case I cannot, in the interest of the Public Service, give any further details. With regard to the latter part of the Question, I have already stated what is the present position in regard to St. Lucia Bay; but as to the rest of the coast to the north of Natal, that part only which forms part of the Reserve is under British protection.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I do not propose to comment on the rather serious statement which my noble Friend has made with regard to the intervention of foreign policy or difference in this question; but I wish to clear up one point which seems to me of very great consequence, and which arises out of the last words which he used with regard to Natal. I understand from my noble Friend that the state of the case is this—that we have asserted, or that we have re-asserted, a Sovereignty to St. Lucia Bay; but the territory at the back of St. Lucia Bay is Zululand. At the time when I had the honour of holding the Seals of Office Zululand was not English territory. I should like to understand this distinctly, assuming our claim to St. Lucia Bay is made, whether or not we have a continuous territory from the interior down to St. Lucia Bay, or whether, as I rather gather from the reply of the noble Earl, there is an intervening tract of land at the back of St. Lucia Bay cutting St. Lucia Bay off from the rest of our Possessions in South Africa? That is an extremely important Question, for the absence of this continuity of territory may give rise, and possibly will give rise, to serious complications hereafter.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Behind St. Lucia Bay and that part of the coast that belongs to Zululand, to the southward, is the Reserve, and over that we have assumed protection. What our claim to St. Lucia Bay is I have already stated; but the territory immediately behind that is the territory of Zululand, not forming part of the Reserve.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I understand, then, that our territories are continuous from the Reserve down to the sea coast.

THE EARL OF DERBY: No; I understand the noble Earl to ask me with regard to the territory, not on the sea coast, but at the back, and I answered accordingly. That has not been ceded to England, and we have no other rights over it than over the whole of Zululand.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH said, he hoped that the Government would fully realize the value of St. Lucia Bay. The claim of England to that Bay was laid down many years ago, and though it had fallen into abeyance that was no reason why it should be abandoned.

CORPORATION OF LONDON TOWER BRIDGE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Charles Forster.)

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, he had given Notice of his intention to move the rejection of the Bill; but he proposed to withdraw that Motion in favour of that of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets Mr. Ritchie to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. He had a Petition to present against the Bill from the working men of London, who feared that the measure would diminish the quantity of shipping near London Bridge, and thereby cause a diminution of employment. He was fully prepared to admit—and he admired—the public spirit and generosity of the Corporation in the matter. They were undertaking to construct this bridge at their own expense; but he was afraid that it might be found necessary to pay a large amount of compensation to wharfingers and others, and that the traffic might be seriously impeded.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee, Five to be nominated by the House, and Four by the Committee of Selection."—Mr. Ritchie.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill committed to a Select Committee, Five to be nominated by the House, and Four by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That all Petitions against the Bill, presented not later than three clear days before the sitting of the Committee, be referred to the Committee; and that such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, Agents, or Witnesses, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petitions.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.

POLICE AND SANITARY REGULATIONS.

APPOINTMENT OF A COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Committee of Selection do appoint a Committee not exceeding Seven Members, to whom shall be referred all Private Bills promoted by Municipal and other Local Authorities by which it is proposed to create powers relating to Police or Sanitary Regulations which deviate from, or are in extension of, or repugnant to, the general Law."—(Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

MR. SEXTON said, he objected to the Motion, on the ground that it contained proposals of a novel character, and carried the principle of delegation too far. It was proposed that the Committee of Selection should usurp the functions of the House, which would lose all efficient control over its own Committees. He begged to move the adjournment of the debate, in order to afford time for the House to consider the question and deal with it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, the hon. Member was not correct in stating that the proposals contained in the Resolution were of a novel character. A similar Committee was appointed last year in precisely the same manner. Nor was there any delegation in the matter whatever. Some difficulty arose a year or two ago, in consequence of Bills which contained provisions imposing police and sanitary regulations, at variance with the general law, being referred to different Committees. Great inconvenience was occasioned, owing to the different decisions that were arrived at—for instance, annuities were allowed in one case to be spread over 40 years, and others over 50 years; and, in one case for so long a period as 100 years. It was most desirable that some uniform mode of dealing with the provisions of such Bills should be adopted, and that these applications to Parliament for special powers should not be varied in different cases. A Committee was appointed, which was presided over by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Hampshire (Mr. Selater-Booth), who prepared a careful Report, which was discussed in the House, and a general approval given to it. Last year a Committee was again appointed, which was presided over by his hon. Friend the junior Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot), also with the full approval of the House. It was proposed this year that a similar Committee should be appointed to consider all the Private Bills promoted by Municipal and other Authorities containing provisions relating to police or sanitary regulations which were at variance with the general law, and more especially in reference to the financial position of the towns by which such Bills were promoted.

MR. SEXTON asked who the Committee were last year?

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that, if he recollected rightly, it consisted of his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot), the hon. Member for Chippenham (Sir Gabriel Goldney), the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. C. S. Parker), the hon. Member for East Worcestershire (Mr. Hastings), the hon. Member for South Devon (Mr. Carpenter Garnier), the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. West), himself, and one or two other Members whose names he could not recollect at the moment. Most of the Members of the Committee last year had sat upon the previous Committee in 1883. The general principle which guided the decisions of the Committee was that there should be some kind of uniformity adopted in regard to Bills of this character. It was certainly most undesirable to have one law in Liverpool, another in Manchester, and another in Leeds. The object of the appointment of the Committee was to prevent, as far as possible, Corporations and other public Bodies from coming to Parliament and obtaining powers which deviated from, or were in extension of, the general law. The provisions of every Bill were carefully considered, and every proposition of that nature was rigidly excluded from the measure. He did not think that any advantage would be derived from an adjournment of the debate, and he hoped the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) would not press the Motion. He was not aware that there were many Irish Bills promoted this year which would be brought under the cognizance of the Committee. There were none in the two previous years; and he admitted that if there were Bills from Ireland which would go before the Committee, it would be desirable to have the services of some Irish Members upon it.

MR. DAWSON said, he took it that his hon. Friend's objection was principally to the proposition that an important Committee should be appointed by another Committee, and that, however desirable it might be to nominate the Committee, it ought to be appointed by the House. The Committee might have done its duty very well in the past; but to provide that it should be appointed by the Committee of Selection was to delegate to the Committee of Selection, chosen by themselves, a duty which ought to be discharged by the House. If the seven Members of the Committee did their duty so well, and were so competent to discharge the important functions intrusted to them, why not appoint them directly by the House, and come down with a recommendation to the House to appoint a Committee of seven Members for that express purpose? The proposal made by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Home Department (Mr. H. H. Fowler) was a usurpation of the distinct functions of the House, and amounted not to the regular appointment of a Committee, but to the appointment of a Sub-Committee by an existing Committee. His own opinion was that that was a breach of the Privileges of the House, and that it ought not to be carried further. He should have thought that the hon. Member the Under Secretary of State would have been one of the last men in the House to give his countenance to such a proposition. It must be clearly understood that those who were in favour of adjourning the debate had no desire to impugn the importance of the duties to be discharged by the Committee. They did not impugn the disinterested character of the motives by which the Committee would be actuated, nor did they intend to imply that the tribunal would be otherwise than impartial; but their contention was that the House itself had certain duties to discharge, and that they were not justified in delegating those duties to the Committee of Selection.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY said, he had great pleasure in supporting the protest made by his hon. Friends in this matter. He was of opinion that the delegation, in important matters of this kind, of the functions of the House to the Committee of Selection involved a very serious principle. There had been two previous Committees of this kind appointed, and he understood that the name of no Irish Member had appeared on either of them. It must be remembered that, in the case of a Committee of this nature, its decisions were practically final; because, whatever decision was laid down by such a tribunal, it was always accepted by the House. Important Irish Private Business might be within the scope of this arrangement, and the Irish people might find themselves placed at a disadvantage by the adoption of this system. The fact that for two previous years the plan had worked fairly well was hardly a sufficient justification for the continuance of the arrangement. He earnestly hoped that his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) would persist in his Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, that, as Chairman of the Committee of last year, he was anxious to say a word in support of the observations of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. H. H. Fowler). First of all, in regard to Ireland. As a matter of fact, only a single Irish Bill came before the Committee last year, and all the Bills taken into consideration by the Committee were Bills which contained provisions in excess of the general law, and which proposed to take powers which, in the opinion of a large majority of the House, ought not, without grave consideration, to be given to any Municipal Body. Perhaps the House would allow him to quote from a Report of the Select Committee adopted at the last of a series of sittings last year. These were the principles the Committee laid down—

“ They have in every case amended the Bills, endeavouring to the best of their ability to limit the large powers sought by the Corporations and other Local Authorities upon two main principles, which they believe to be accepted by the House—namely, first, that no local powers should be given which are in excess of the general law, unless strong local reasons exist for such powers; and, secondly, that no statutory enactments should be permitted for purposes which can be effected by bye-laws.”

Those were the two principles laid down by the Committee, and upon those two principles they endeavoured to regulate all the Bills which came before them, and, he believed, to the satisfaction, if not of the promoters of the Bills themselves, at least of all those who took a reasonable interest in the matter. It was said that it was an unconstitutional proceeding for the House to delegate to the Committee of Selection the right of appointing a Committee for dealing with a number of Private Bills. Now, he failed to see any difference between appointing a Committee to deal with a single Bill and appointing a Committee to deal with a number of Bills. It must be borne in mind that the Bills referred to the Committee were all of the same character, and that they related to regulations in regard to police and sanitary matters. It was a special Committee to take into consideration a certain number of very important Bills, to which it was their duty to devote most careful consideration. They did not at all slur the work over, and he thought they sat as many as 30 times last Session, coming in each case to a deliberate conclusion. No doubt, the Committee was appointed by the Committee of Selection; but, as hon. Members well knew, the House of Commons itself appointed the Committee of Selection, and gave them certain powers in regard to the appointment of other Committees.

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that the Question now before the House is the question of the adjournment of the debate, and he would not be in Order in discussing the Main Question.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he was sorry for having transgressed. He would only add that he trusted the matter would not be adjourned, because it was of the utmost importance to come to a conclusion upon it as rapidly as possible. He should be quite prepared, when the question came up again, to state his reasons for supporting the Motion of the hon. Gentleman opposite the Under Secretary of State (Mr. H. H. Fowler).

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the great object his hon. Friends had in view was to prevent what they considered to be a breach of the Privileges of the House. No doubt, a precedent had been established in other years; but the contention of himself and his hon. Friends was that those precedents constituted no valid reason whatever why the House should not, on this third occasion, take exception to the course which had been pursued. The Committee of Selection was constituted for the purpose of nominating the Members of Private Bill Committees; but he did not believe that, save and except by an Order of the House in regard to a Hybrid Committee, the power had ever been given to them to select at their own discretion a Committee to whom was intrusted the duty of dealing with an important class of Private Bills. Hitherto, he believed, their duties had been confined to the selection of Private Bill Committees, and they had never gone beyond that duty. The proposal of the Government, if adopted on the present occasion, would establish what would be analogous to an Imperium in Imperio. They would, at their own instance, have the power of constituting a new Body, with very large powers of interference with the provisions of important Private Bills. No doubt, it was the duty of the House to watch very closely every attempt made by a Corporation to secure the passing of special laws by Parliament for itself, and great vigilance ought to be exercised in order to see that there was no interference with the general law, unless some very good cause should be shown for it. But it appeared to him that the Committee of Selection were now seeking to do, in a great measure, what the House complained of in regard to these Municipal Corporations, because the proposal was to give them exceptional powers, which might involve an arbitrary interference with the ordinary legislation of the House, so far as it affected Private Bills. He supported the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, because he thought that the Government were bound to show a better case than had yet been put forward for continuing a precedent which might involve very serious consequences. In the absence of explanation the adjournment of the debate was quite justified; and he hoped the hon. Gentleman opposite would not resist the Motion.

MR. LEAMY said, he did not think that the adjournment of the debate would entail any inconvenience upon the persons who were engaged in the promotion of these Private Bills. In the event of the Resolution moved by the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department not being carried for the next three or four days no kind of difficulty would arise; and there was, therefore, no reason in the world why the hon. Gentleman should not consent to the adjournment. Of course, the question was one in which not only the Irish Members, but every other Member of the House was interested; and all they wanted was that a fair opportunity should be given for discussing a change which they believed to be one of very great importance. What harm would be done if two or three days were allowed to elapse before the House passed this Resolution? Under all the circumstances of the case, he thought the best course was to adjourn the debate.

MR. HEALY said, he hoped that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. H. H. Fowler) would not inaugurate his new Office by coming into unnecessary conflict with a large body of the Irish people. He thought the Irish people were indebted to his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) for the way in which he had watched these matters. His hon. Friend had already succeeded in obtaining large concessions with regard to other Committees. It was now proposed to rush this Resolution through the House, in order to defeat the intentions of his hon. Friend in another respect, and to prevent him from securing upon this particular Committee the appointment of an Irish Representative who would watch over the interests of the Irish people. He did not see why, in regard to this secondary Committee, the concession which his hon. Friend had already obtained in regard to the Committee of Selection itself should not be made. The noble Lord the Member for Flint (Lord Richard Grosvenor), who had just entered the House, was responsible for the manner in which these Committees were nominated; and he would remind the noble Lord that the Motion they were now discussing appeared for the first time on the Paper that day. The debate, therefore, ought to be adjourned at once, if it were only for the purpose of giving the Government time to consider the proposals now made to them. He must say that it was a monstrously unfair thing that Motions of this kind should be sprung upon the House before hon. Members could have had the slightest opportunity of considering them. There was a general rule, which prevented the discussion of any Business of which due Notice had not been given upon the Paper; and whenever an objection was raised to a Private Bill itself it was necessary that the Bill should be put down, and due Notice given, so that a day might be fixed for the discussion of it. But what was the course pursued in this case? At the time of Private Business, at a quarter before 4, when hon. Members were not prepared for contentious matter, a Motion, involving very important interests, and placed on the Paper for the first time, was attempted to be rushed through the House, contrary to all the recognized Rules. He therefore trusted that, under these circumstances, the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State would now recognize that a case had been made out at least for the adjournment of the debate, so that he and the Government might take time to consider the advisability of placing one Irish Member, at any rate, upon the Committee. Sooner or later, it behoved the House to put its foot upon this loose way of transacting Business. The Irish Members represented a large body of opinion in that House—a body of opinion that was bound to grow and increase—and the Government must, sooner or later, face the fact that the representation the Irish Members desired in regard to every branch of the Business of the House must be conceded. It was, therefore, desirable that the Representatives of the Government should act in a more diplomatic manner towards the Irish Members. The noble Lord the Member for Flint (Lord Richard Grosvenor) had had a large experience in dealing with these matters, and he hoped the noble Lord would be prepared to announce that the Government would consent to the adjournment of the debate, in order that they might have an opportunity of considering the representations now made to them. He would only point out to the Government that Irish Private Bills, of very great importance to the Irish people, must constantly come before this Committee. There was a Bill at the present moment, called the Rathmines Bill, which was of the utmost importance to the City of Dublin; and yet he believed that there would not be a single Irish Member upon the Committee who would have to deal with that Bill. It was most unfortunate that the Government should attempt to rush Business through the House in that way; and if they were not prepared to make the concession they were now asked for, he hoped they would, at least, consent to adjourn the debate, in order that the views of the Irish Members might be fully taken into consideration.

MR. DEASY, in supporting the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, said, it was important, even from the Government point of view, that the House should resist the Motion now made. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had not long filled that Office; and he thought the hon. Gentleman was commencing his official career very badly, in endeavouring to shut out Irish Members from serving on this Committee.

MR. H. H. FOWLER hoped that he might be allowed to explain. He was not proposing to exclude any Irish Member from serving on the Committee; but his proposal was simply that the Committee should be appointed by the Committee of Selection, upon which the Irish Members were already represented. It would be for the Committee of Selection to decide, one way or the other, what the composition of the Committee should be. Personally, he did not propose, in any way, to exclude the Irish Members.

MR. DEASY said, that the proposal of the hon. Member was that the Committee should be nominated by a Committee that was already formed, and which was composed of nine Members, of whom only one Irish Member would have the right of assisting in the nomination of this Committee of seven. Judging from the performances of the Government in regard to Irish measures generally, he thought the Representatives of that country were justified in coming to the conclusion that the one Irish Member of the Committee of Selection would have very little power of nominating and securing a fair Irish representation upon the Committee. He would further point out that the hour at which this proposal was brought on was an hour at which hon. Members were very seldom in their places; and as the Motion had only appeared on the Paper that day, it must be fairly concluded that many persons who took a deep interest in the question could not have seen it at all, or otherwise they would have been in their places to support the remonstrances of the Irish Members. He did not think that a more reasonable proposition could be made than that which had been put forward by his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). His hon. Friend merely asked that the House should not be forced into a decision on the question that evening, but should be allowed a couple of days to consider it. At the end of a couple of days, it was possible that it would not be necessary to offer any opposition to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. The appointment of this Committee affected questions which concerned the Irish people very deeply, from the fact that questions dealing with police and sanitary regulations would have to come before it. It was, therefore, of the utmost importance that the Irish Members should be fairly represented upon the Committee. Judging from the action of Her Majesty's Government lately in regard to Irish Members, there would be no desire on their part to make proper provision for Irish representation; and, therefore, in order that the whole matter might be properly considered, he trusted that the Government would offer no further opposition to the action of the Irish Members, but that they would consent to the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. KENNY said, he thought it would be generally conceded that the action of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. H. H. Fowler) was somewhat extraordinary. He had come down to the House that day with a Motion which was likely to escape the attention of everyone whose attention was not specially drawn to it, and he had moved it without a word of explanation. One thing was quite certain—that it would not only be advantageous to the House, but that it was extremely desirable that the hon. Gentleman should explain the object with which he had made the Motion. He had said already that he was not prepared to exclude the Irish Members from sitting on the Committee. That was all very well; but the effect of passing the Motion would be to place important measures connected with local legislation in Ireland in the hands of Members who could have no possible interest in, or knowledge of, the country. He, therefore, felt that it was essential the hon. Gentleman should explain the precise scope and object of his proposition; and the request made by his hon. Friends the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) and the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), that he would postpone the Resolution until Monday, was only fair and reasonable. Was this intended to be a compromise in connection with the Bill affecting Private Bill legislation which was recently brought under the notice of the House? If it was, it was a very clumsy mode of discussing the question. If there was any desire to facilitate the passing of private measures through the House, the best course would be to convince every section of the House that the interests intrusted to their charge were in no respect disregarded. He should certainly offer the most strenuous opposition in his power to the proposition of the Government.

Mr. GRAY said, that, if his memory did not deceive him, at least one, if not two, important Irish Private Bills would have to go before the Committee this year. The hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot) had mentioned that no Irish Bill was referred to the Committee last year, and he thought the hon. Member was correct; but he was under the impression that an exceedingly important Irish Bill, one that was promoted by the township of Rathmines, would come under the cognizance of this Committee if it was appointed. He also thought there was another measure promoted by the borough of Belfast; but of that he was not quite sure. He was certain, however, that there was a Bill introduced by the township of Rathmines, and that it contained provisions of a most important character which would require the careful attention of the Committee. That being so, he thought that, as a matter of principle, they should press for the adjournment of the debate, so that arrangements might be made for nominating Irish Members upon the Committee, which would have to deal with measures in which their interests were so deeply involved. He objected altogether to this system of indirect representation sought to be established by the Motion. He had the greatest possible confidence in his hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), who would be one of the nine Members of the Committee of Selection; but, notwithstanding that confidence, he did not think that his hon. Friend should be the only Irish Member to decide the matter. He also objected to inquiries of so important a character being conducted in a private room, where the proceedings were not reported. They could not have the same force as an inquiry conducted in the regular way. He trusted that this controversy would not be prolonged, but that the Government would consent to what, after all, was a fair and reasonable proposition—namely, that the Motion, having been placed on the Paper only that day, should be postponed for a few days, and not rushed through the House with unnecessary haste. Hon. Members well knew that the course now proposed to be taken by the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department was in entire contravention of the ordinary Rules which regulated the proceedings of the House.

SIR JOHN R. MOWBRAY said, he was most unwilling to take any part in the discussion; first of all, because the Committee of Selection, of which he was Chairman, had quite enough to do without having any extra duties imposed upon them. The Committee of Selection were perfectly ready to undertake any duties the House might intrust to to them; and he believed that they had hitherto discharged their duty to the satisfaction of the House. It certainly seemed to him that the Motion for the adjournment of the debate was most unreasonable; and as to the assertion that the Motion was brought on without Notice, he might say that his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Home Department (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had on Monday, three days ago, given Notice, at the usual time, that he would make this Motion, which was simply for the re-appointment of the Committee, which had now been appointed for several successive years. He had never heard any complaint of the action of that Committee, nor had the Members of it been accused of dealing unfairly with Irish Bills. Hon. Members who had taken part in the present discussion were most of them new Members of the House; and they might really not be aware that the Committee of Selection was one which had long been appointed to discharge certain important functions, among them being the nomination of Committees upon Private Bills. What was the ground of objection to the composition of that Committee in the present year? So far as he understood, it was that this year there was an Irish Bill, and that that Irish Bill would require particular attention on the part of the Irish Members. Then, what was the natural course to take? It was to secure that there should be some Irish Member upon the Committee of Selection who understood Irish questions. But the House must be aware that that wish on the part of the Irish Members had not been disregarded, and that this very year, at the instance of hon. Members below the Gangway, the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had been added to the Committee of Selection in order to represent Ireland. There were, really, two Irish Members now upon the Committee—namely, the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) and the hon. Member for Longford. Consequently, two out of the nine Members of the Committee, as now constituted, were Irish Members. If a debate of this kind was to be prolonged, and then to be adjourned for further discussion, what hope would there be of getting through the work of the House? He trusted that the House, by a large majority, would support the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State (Mr. H. H. Fowler).

Mr. Gray

MR. CALLAN said, that, with all due deference to the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Sir John R. Mowbray), it would have been in much better taste if he, as Chairman of the Committee of Selection, had allowed the House to exercise an unbiased judgment rather than have made an ad misericordiam appeal to it. The appeal made by the right hon. Gentleman to the Government was that they should reject the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, and leave it to the right hon. Gentleman and the Committee of Selection to say what Rules should be laid down in regard to these Private Bills, and what Members should be appointed upon the Committee whose duty it would be to consider them. It might be in the recollection of the right hon. Gentleman, and of other hon. Members who sat in the last Parliament, that a Motion somewhat similar in its tendency to the present one was brought forward some years ago for regulating the proceedings of Parliamentary agents. That Motion was objected to, and the debate was adjourned for at least a week until the question could receive fair consideration, the result being that an Amendment was placed upon the Paper, upon which the original Motion was withdrawn, and the Amendment ultimately adopted. That occurred in the case of the Parliamentary agents either in the year 1878 or 1879. He would also ask the House to remember what the Rules were which were supposed to regulate the conduct of Private Business. The ordinary Notice of Motion for the nomination of a Select Committee would come under the Half-past Twelve o'Clock Rule; and any person who objected to the appointment of the Committee would have been able to place a Notice of Amendment on the Paper. Standing Order No. 207 said—

"In cases where the second or third reading of a Private Bill, or the consideration of a Bill as amended by the Committee, or any proposed clause or Amendment is opposed, the same shall be postponed until the day on which the House shall next sit."

According to that Rule, if an objection was raised merely in a Bill set down for consideration at the time of Private Business, it was necessary to adjourn the discussion until the next day upon which the House sat. If it were a matter of importance to adopt that Rule in such a trivial case as that which he had mentioned, how much more important was it to adopt the same principle in such a case as this, and to adjourn the discussion until hon. Members could have ample Notice of it. The adjournment of the debate, even until tomorrow, would enable the House to escape the difficulty in which they were now placed, and would afford an opportunity for some amicable arrangement to be arrived at. If that course were not adopted, they might have a discussion which would extend over several hours, in addition to which a feeling would be engendered that the Irish Members, in regard to this question, had not had a spirit of fair play meted out to them.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he would venture to express a hope that the Government would consent to the adjournment of the debate, seeing that the appointment of this Committee was of a novel character, and that, although Notice of the Motion had probably been given, it had never been brought prominently under the attention of the House, and many hon. Members had known nothing of it until they came down to the House. It was quite evident, from the discussion that had taken place, that there was only one voice among the Irish Members with regard to the Motion; and therefore he hoped the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. H. H. Fowler) would consent to adjourn the debate.

MR. HIBBERT said, that last year he was in the position of his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. H. H. Fowler), and had to propose a similar Resolution. He gave Notice of the Motion, and it was before the House for several days before it was brought forward; but no complaint was made on the part of any Member from Ireland of the wording of the Resolution, or in regard to the course taken. He wished to point out to the House what their position would be supposing the Resolution had not been brought forward by his hon. Friend, and a Committee were not appointed to consider these Police and Sanitary Bills. The consequence would be that each of these Bills would be referred to a Committee appointed by the Committee of Selection, and the House would have no voice whatever in the appointment of such Committees. Therefore, hon. Members opposite would gain nothing if the Motion were rejected. The object of the present Motion was to refer all Bills, of a certain character, to a Committee to be specially appointed for the purpose of carefully considering the whole of them; and he felt quite sure that if the Bills so referred included any Irish measure, the Committee of Selection would take care not only that an Irish Member should be placed upon the Committee, but that it should be left to the Irish Members to say who that Member should be.

MR. SMALL said, the right hon. Baronet who spoke above the Gangway (Sir John R. Mowbray) seemed to think that it was of some importance for the Committee of Selection to have the right of nominating this Committee; whereas the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert), who had just addressed the House, seemed to think that it made no difference whatever whether the Committee were appointed or not. What he complained of was the exclusion of Irish Members from Committees; and he thought it would be better to give the Committee of Selection the trouble of excluding them on every occasion, rather than that they should be cut off at one swoop. The right hon. Baronet told them that if any Irish Bill came before the Committee of Selection, he would take care that Irish Members were placed upon the Committee. It was a singular thing that English Members should be of opinion that the Irish Representatives were not to interfere at all with English Business, but that English Members had every right to interfere with Irish Business. That was the best proof which had been given for a long time of the self-satisfied way in which the English Members legislated for Ireland. He was surprised at the course which had taken by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler). He (Mr. Small) had certainly expected to find the hon. Member animated by that spirit of fair play for which he was so conspicuous when he occupied a seat below the Gangway. It might reasonably have been expected that the hon. Gentleman would have manifested the same spirit of fair play now that he had become an occupant of the Treasury Bench. After the unanimous opinion expressed by the Irish Members on that side of the House, he hoped the hon. Member would no longer resist their wishes. The Secretary to the Treasury had alluded to what occurred last year; but the hon. Member himself admitted that, on that occasion, there were no Irish Bills on the Paper. In this instance Irish Bills were affected for the first time, and that was certainly a strong reason why the Government should consent to the adjournment of the debate.

MR. BIGGAR said, that he had been very much impressed with the point raised by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan), that by the ordinary practice of the House with regard to Private Bill legislation, when any objection was raised in regard to Private Business, the ordinary course was to defer the consideration of the objection until a succeeding day. That practice had not been followed in this case, and he was not all certain whether they had not a right to insist upon that Rule being brought into operation now. But he thought that, on the merits of the question, irrespective of those technicalities, a good case had been made out for adjourning the debate. The Rule of the House, in reference to Bills of this nature, was founded upon a strict sense of justice—namely, that Private Bill legislation was of so peculiar a nature that such a thing as a surprise must be guarded against. Therefore, whenever the merits of a particular Bill were called in question, whatever the feeling of the House was, and notwithstanding that a large majority might be in favour of another course, the practice was to postpone the discussion. For that reason he would suggest to the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. H. H. Fowler) that he should accede to the proposal now made to postpone the Motion. It was all very well to say that the Committee of Selection would act with impartiality with regard to the selection of the names of Members to serve upon the Committee; but, at the same time, the names of the Members proposed to be nominated upon the Committee were not down upon the Paper, and the Irish Members would not have an opportunity of expressing an opinion as to the merits or demerits of any hon. Member proposed to be placed on the Committee. For that reason he thought it would be well if the Government would give way, and save the House the trouble of dividing, which would be inevitable unless the proposal to adjourn the debate were acceded to. There would only be one day's delay, and no practical difference would be made in the time of the appointment of the Committee. He presumed that there was no Business actually awaiting the consideration of the Committee; and he was astonished that the Government should interpose a difficulty where there was really no controversy, and where no inconvenience would, as a matter of fact, take place. As to the argument of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert), who said that the course taken last year met with no objection, that was no reason whatever why there should be no objection now. Last year there was no Irish Bill which could have gone before the Committee; whereas, in the present year, there was certainly one important measure, if not more, which would come under the cognizance of the Committee.

MR. P. J. POWER said, that no objection was raised to the nomination of this Committee either last year or the year before; but that was because there was no Irish Bill which could be dealt with by the Committee. But even if there had been, and no objection had been raised to the appointment of the Committee, that was no reason why no objection ought to be raised now. Because the Irish Members might not have done right in one case, that formed no justification for their continuing to follow the same course now. The circumstances were altogether different from those of any previous year, because this year most important private legislation was promoted upon questions of vital interest to the Irish people; and that legislation would, in the first instance, be brought under the consideration of the Committee it was now proposed to appoint. He maintained that, under those circumstances, the Irish Members themselves were the persons entitled to say what the legislation should be; and certainly no people could be more competent to judge of the wants and wishes of the Irish people than the Irish Representatives themselves. They had been informed that Notice had been given of the intention of the hon. Gentleman opposite to make this Motion; but, if so, it was given at a period when the general body of Members were not in their places, and had no means of knowing what actually took place. All he could say was that the Irish Members knew nothing of the Notice, and the Motion itself had quite taken them by surprise. As a matter of fact, it had been sprung upon them, and, he could not help thinking, in a somewhat unfair manner. Therefore, he entirely concurred with the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that the debate should be adjourned. His hon. Friend did not wish to have the question forced upon the attention of the House that day, but desired to postpone the discussion of it, in order to give the Irish Members a few days to consider the action they ought to take. Then, as to the nomination of one Committee by another, he was entirely of opinion that the principle was altogether wrong. He thought that the Committee, which was to be intrusted with most important Business, should be named directly by the House, and that the House should not delegate its functions to the Committee of Selection, or to any other Committee. Taking in view all the circumstances of the case, he was sure that Her Majesty's Government would have no hesitation in acceding to a proposition so just and fair on the face of it as that which his hon. Friend had made; otherwise the Irish Members would be compelled to prolong the discussion.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he only desired to say one or two words. Of course, he could not discuss the merits of the question on the Motion for the adjournment; and he did not know that he would personally object to the proposal itself, so far as it involved the principle of delegation. But the reason he did object to it was, that it might be made the beginning of a system of delegating the work of the House to something in the nature of Standing Committees. He certainly thought that that was a point worthy of careful consideration before it was carried out. He perceived that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir William Harcourt) had entered the House since the commencement of the discussion; and he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) would submit to the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman whether it was an unreasonable request, when a proposal of this kind was made, and a suggestion was offered that a little more time for consideration should be allowed—whether it was unreasonable, on the part of hon. Members from Ireland, considering that the interests of their constituents might be very much affected by the proposal, to ask for a short adjournment of the discussion? He thought that, seeing how much of principle was involved in the proposal, and how fertile it might be of further proposals in the same direction, it was only reasonable to ask for timely consideration before they subjected themselves to the disadvantages in which they might hereafter find themselves involved.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that, as the hon. Member for the Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had appealed to him, he felt bound to say a word, although he did not think he could add anything to the statements which had been already made. This was not a new question at all, but it was one with which the House was quite familiar; and therefore no object would be attained by giving further time for coming to a decision upon a question which was already well understood. The matter was all in a nutshell. The Bills affected were all Bills of a similar character, and it had been thought well to appoint a strong Committee to consider the important principles they contained, instead of having a number of separate Committees all dealing with the same questions, and, it might be, deciding in different ways and acting upon different principles. Such a course would be found to be highly inconvenient. The House had now had experience of the working of this principle of a single Committee for some years; and, on the whole, he thought everyone felt that it was the most desirable mode of dealing with the question. The right hon. Baronet the Chairman of the Committee of Selection (Sir John R. Mowbray) had already pointed out that, whether it was one Committee or a number of separate Committees, they would equally be appointed by the Committee of Selection. The only question to consider was, whether there should be one Committee to deal with all these matters upon uniform principles, instead of leaving them to be dealt with on divergent principles by separate Committees. He had no doubt whatever that the plan submitted to the House was the most advantageous plan; and he could not see how delay or adjournment would add anything to the materials they now possessed for forming a judgment upon the matter.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

The House divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 238: Majority 212.—(Div. List, No. 40.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Standing Order 173A shall be applicable to the said Committee."—(Mr. Henry H. Fowler.)

MR. HEALY said, the Irish Members really could not allow this Resolution to pass without entering another protest. He wished to point out to the Government the very extraordinary nature of the course which was being pursued. What was proposed was this—that the House should abrogate its entire functions for the purpose of appointing a Select Committee and constituting it an Imperium in Imperio. In point of fact, the proposal was to vest a sort of Standing Committee with direct functions of the House in regard to the appointment of Select Committees. It appeared to him that such a proposal was a direct infringement upon the functions of the House, and that it took away from their control over the Private Business of the House. The question, therefore, assumed a very serious and important aspect. In the first place, he might point out that when an ordinary Select Committee was nominated, the names of all the Members of the Committee appeared on the Paper; and hon. Members had the power of challenging the name of every Member proposed to be appointed upon it.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member is not in Order. We are now discussing the question whether Standing Order 173A shall be applicable to the said Committee; and the hon. and learned Member must confine himself to that specific Question.

MR. HEALY said, his objection was that the powers proposed to be conferred by the Standing Order were of such a character that they ought not to be intrusted to a Committee appointed by another Committee. The Standing Order provided that, in case of any Bill promoted by, and conferring powers upon, a Municipal Corporation, or Local Board, or Town Commissioners, or other public authority, the Committee should consider the provisions of the Bill in regard to police, sanitary, and other regulations. He objected to give to any Committee power to appoint another Committee, either from within or without itself, with the right of exercising the large powers which the Standing Order conferred. In his view, a Committee which was to have the right of applying the powers given by the Standing Order should be a Committee which directly sprang from the House. But this Sub-Committee, if he might so call it, would be a Committee that would have power to create preliminary and technical objections to the provisions of a measure before the Bill could be referred to a Select Committee in the ordinary way, and before a single witness had been heard. In the ordinary course, a Select Committee would sit, in order to inquire into the merits of a Private Bill, and would hear all that both counsel and witnesses had to say. He denied altogether that such a right or discretionary power should be confided to a single Committee selected by another Committee. Some of the persons who would be appointed might be persons to whom hon. Members, or the promoters of these Bills, would naturally object; and, therefore, he thought it was a matter upon which the House should not proceed in haste. No doubt, it was said that the appointment of a similar Committee had been acceded to without opposition for the last two years; but, nevertheless, he thought the powers conferred by the Standing Order were much too large to delegate to a Sub-Committee, and he trusted that the discussion which had that day been originated by his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) on so important a subject would convince the House of the necessity for some change of the system of conducting Private Business. Indeed, the question had now assumed a position almost of scandal, and something ought to be done for the protection of the Private Bill legislation of the House. It was monstrous that municipal, sanitary, and police powers, affecting the health and welfare of the inhabitants of every large town in the Three Kingdoms, should be referred to a Sub-Committee in the manner now proposed. For his part, he thought they ought to go to the extent of taking another division against this extraordinary delegation of power. He sincerely hoped that the House, without further discussion, would not consent to place important powers in the hands of a Committee over whose proceedings they would have no control.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the House had now decided that this Committee should be appointed. So far the business was settled, and there was no earthly use in discussing, even if it would be in Order, the propriety of appointing a Committee. But this Standing Order No. 173A was already applicable to every Bill that came before the House which contained clauses relating to sanitary matters or to police regulations. He should have thought, therefore, that the mere existence of the Standing Order would have brought every Bill of that description under its terms, whether it was referred to the new Committee or not. It, therefore, appeared to him that this new Resolution was not necessary. Then, again, as to the wording of the Resolution itself, it appeared to him to be open to objection. It said—"That Standing Order 173A shall be applicable to the said Committee." Now, the Standing Order was applicable to a Bill; and, therefore, as a matter of phraseology, it was incorrect to apply it to the Committee itself, instead of to the Bills referred to the Committee. The Standing Order was certainly drawn up with reference, not to the Committee, but to Bills which contained provisions of a certain character. Consequently, in the matter of phraseology, it was desirable that the Resolution should be amended. It was also a matter for consideration whether it would not be advisable to introduce some modification of the Standing Order, so as to provide against any possible danger in the way indicated by the hon. and learned Member or Monaghan (Mr. Healy). Under these circumstances, he would ask the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who represented the Government on this question, whether, in regard to this Resolution at any rate, the Government would not agree to some postponement, in order to afford time for further consideration? If there was the danger which had been pointed out, surely it was not objectionable to ask for time to consider the matter before the House was put to the trouble of a division.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, the Standing Order 173A was a Standing Order passed by the House in pursuance of a Report of the first Committee which sat upon the Bills which involved sanitary and police regulations. By that Standing Order Committees were required to inquire into clauses of a certain character which were inserted in Private Bills, and to report to the House how they had dealt with such clauses. The hon. Member for the Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) was quite right in assuming that, as a general principle, the Standing Order would apply to every Committee; and he thought that was the true construction to be placed upon it, and that there was no necessity for the insertion of these words. But last year, when the Special Committee was appointed, a doubt was raised whether the Standing Order applied to it; and in order to make assurance doubly sure, the House passed a Resolution directing that the Order should apply to the Committee, and that the Committee should make, under certain circumstances, a special Report to the House. Under these circumstances, it had been considered advisable to take the same course this year. There could be no doubt that, in the ordinary way, all of these matters would have to be inquired into by the Select Committee to which any Private Bill containing clauses affecting police and sanitary matters was referred. But it was most desirable that this Special Committee should inquire into and report upon them in the first instance.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he would suggest that the difficulty would be met by amending it so that it should read — "That Standing Order 173A shall be applicable to all Bills referred to the Committee." All that was necessary was to insert the words "all Bills referred to" after the word "to." He concurred with his hon. Friend the Member for the Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) that the Standing Order could not be applicable to the Committee, but simply to the Bills referred to it for consideration. It was only a verbal correction; but he thought it ought to be made, and he would, therefore, move it as an Amendment to the original proposal.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

Amendment proposed, after the word "to," to insert the words "all Bills referred to."—(Sir Joseph M'Kenna.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that he had not the slightest objection to the words proposed to be inserted.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, proposed.

MR. SEXTON said, he wished to put a question to the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the information of the House. As he understood the matter, at present, the Committee of Selection had power to refer individual Bills to Private Bill Committees, which Committees were bound to hear counsel and witnesses. But before the meeting of these Private Bill Committees, there was to be a Report from the Special Committee under the Standing Order. Was the Special Committee equally bound, before making their Report under the Standing Order, to hear counsel and witnesses?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Certainly.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—ARREST OF JOHN MACDONALD FOR POACHING.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention had been directed to the case of John Macdonald, postal runner or messenger betwixt Carr Bridge and Arie-more, in the county of Inverness, who, in the month of November 1883, in the presence of several persons on the Railway platform at Ariemore, while in charge of the mail bags, was arrested by two policemen, and conveyed a prisoner to Inverness, on a charge of being concerned in a poaching affray on the River Dulnan; whether, notwithstanding his judicial denial of the alleged offence, he was detained in strict confinement for ten days; and, whether compensation can be made to him for his wrongous imprisonment and for the expense he was put to in many ways, particularly in providing a substitute while in prison, and thereafter while the matter was under investigation by the Postal authorities?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I have inquired into this case. Macdonald, although he is a post-runner, was not apprehended while in charge of the mail bags; and the occurrence referred in the Question was an assault by night of a very serious description, by eight men upon two water bailiffs in the employment of the Spey Fishery Board. Macdonald was incarcerated for nine days. He was apprehended on the 13th of November, and liberated on bail on the 22nd. The evidence which led to Macdonald's apprehension was his own statement to another person that he was one of the gang of eight men, and the statement of one of the water bailiffs assaulted, that he was almost sure that Macdonald was one of the party. The evidence, however, did not appear to the Crown counsel sufficient, and, therefore, Macdonald was not tried; but the evidence seems to have been such as to warrant his apprehension and his detention for further examination. That a man should be detained in prison for several days on suspicion, and afterwards liberated without trial, is always a matter of regret; but such cases are occasionally unavoidable in the administration of criminal justice. There is no ground or precedent for awarding compensation to Macdonald, and I know of no fund from which compensation could be paid. Further, with reference to this part of the Question, I must repeat that the chief cause of Macdonald's apprehension was his own statement already mentioned.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS—REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND).

MR. T. A. DICKSON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether in any Registration Bill to be brought in for the purpose of placing on the registers the great numbers of additional voters entitled to the franchise, provision will be made for the remuneration of clerks of unions, rate collectors, and other officials, for their greatly increased duties, and if the Bill will provide that the expense shall not fall upon the rate-payers?

MR. CALLAN said, he wished, at the same time, to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman, Whether he will make arrangements in the Bill for utilizing and continuing the services of the Town Clerks of the eighteen "liberated" boroughs of Ireland, or compensate the clerks for the loss of their emoluments in connection with the registration?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER), in reply, said, he would refer to the Question on the Paper—that of the hon. Member (Mr. Dickson). The matter was at present under the consideration of the Government, and he would ask his hon. Friend to postpone his Question.

PIER AND HARBOUR WORKS (ENGLAND AND WALES)—HOLYHEAD MAIL JETTY.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked the President of the Board of Trade, respecting the Mail Jetty, made of timber, at Holyhead, What was the cost of the Mail Jetty erected in the year 1858; what amount has been spent in the alteration and repairing of the same up to the present time; what is the estimate for the alterations and repairs of the same now going on; is the condition of the Jetty such as would justify the Government in spending a large sum in alterations and repairs; and, taking into consideration the present condition of the Jetty, and the large amount spent annually in repairs, would it not be better economy to erect a stone pier in place of the present Jetty?

MR. GRAY: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, I would ask, Whether it is not a fact that the original scheme submitted to the Government twenty years ago provided for a stone pier?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I cannot answer the Question of the hon. Member for Carlow Mr. Gray positively; but if he will put it on the Paper I will endeavour to do so. As to the first Question, the first cost of the timber mail jetty at Holyhead and its extension was, from 1858 to 1864, £48,226; since that time £26,985 has been spent in repair and renewal. The estimate of the work for raising the platform, required by the Post Office in connection with the recent mail contract, is £7,000;

this is special and not ordinary work. The annual expenditure for renewals for some years past has been about £2,000, and appears, so far, to be maintaining the work in fair condition. As to a stone pier being more economical, I have no proposal for a stone pier before me, and the question of comparative expense would be for the consideration of the Treasury. I may, however, mention that Sir John Hawkshaw tells me that such a work could not cost less than £150,000.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—THE TROOP-SHIP "POONAH."

Mr. TATTON EGERTON asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, at the time that Admiral Lethbridge considered it safe to send off the transport Poonah from Queenstown to Portsmouth, he was aware of the warning in The Times of 18th instant giving notice of a severe cyclone travelling east north-east, and expected on the French and English coasts about the 22nd?

Mr. CAINE, in reply, said, that when the Poonah left Queenstown, they were not aware of the storm warning that appeared. The Poonah left Queenstown at 10 A.M. on the 20th February, and the telegram giving notice of the storm did not reach Queenstown from the Meteorological Office until after the departure of the ship.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND).—THE IRISH CIRCUITS.

Mr. GIBSON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Is there any objection to laying upon the Table a Copy of the Report of the Committee of the Irish Judges on the subject of the Irish Circuits?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND Mr. WALKER, in reply, said, that it would be unusual to make a Report of that kind public.

Mr. GIBSON said, that he would repeat the Question that day week, when he would also ask whether such Reports were not laid before Parliament in the time of the late Government; and, whether any of the Judges objected to the production of this particular Report?

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—MR. ROBERT GRAHAM, CLERK OF COOTEHILL UNION.

Mr. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it has come under his notice that Robert Graham, clerk of Cooteshill Union, has been called on by the Registrar General to resign the office of Superintendent Registrar, in consequence of repeated improper conduct, and very insulting language towards the medical officer of the Tullavira Dispensary District; if it has come under his notice that said clerk was censured by the Local Government Board, September 6th 1884, for—that said clerk swore, at inquiry held by Mr. Matheson, B.L. January 28th 1885, he was never before censured; and, if the Local Government Board, in view of the correspondence before them relative to the last March Election of Poor Law Guardian for the Corween Division of Cooteshill Union, and the minutes of sworn inquiry, July 8th, relative to same, will continue Robert Graham in the office of clerk and returning officer?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The facts are substantially as stated in the Question. It does not appear that Mr. Graham was sworn when he gave evidence before Mr. Matheson at the inquiry referred to; but the Local Government Board will call upon him for an explanation in regard to his alleged untruthfulness on that occasion.

LIGHTHOUSE ILLUMINANTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. GRAY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the fact that the illuminant experiments at the South Foreland are to be discontinued next month, and how soon the Report of the Elder Brethren of Trinity House may be expected; and, whether, before the termination of these experiments, a trial will be made of the double "triform" plan of lighting, the refusal to test which by the Illuminants Committee caused the resignation of Dr. Ball, F.R.S., and other representatives of the Commissioners of Irish Lights?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I have communicated with the Elder Brethren on this subject, and I have received the following reply:—

"The experiments as a whole, as at present arranged, are to be discontinued at the end of the present month; but the Report being dependent on the receipt of intelligence from many observers, will occupy some time in completion. As regards the double 'triform' gas apparatus the Elder Brethren understand that, at least, six burners were to be used; but as with only four burners a temperature of 350 Fahrenheit was sustained at South Foreland, and several valuable lenses were cracked with the heat, it is not considered desirable to try six burners. The Elder Brethren have recently had a visit from Dr. Ball and his colleagues of the Irish Lights, and they have reason to believe that these gentlemen are satisfied with the experiments."

MR. GRAY: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether he is aware that the advocates of gas illumination for lighthouses claim that the double triform is the best for gas-lighting; and is it a fixed arrangement now that what the advocates of gas illumination consider to be the best system is not to be tested in experiments which it is assumed will test the value of the various lights? This is a very serious matter.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The further Question of the hon. Gentleman invites an argumentative reply; but I will answer it in this way. The experiments are intended to show the comparative value of gas and oil; and if they satisfactorily agree upon a point with regard, say, to three burners, then, inasmuch as the multiplication of burners would equally apply to gas and oil, there would be no necessity for continuing the experiments further. There are other and special reasons against such an experiment as has been suggested in the letter from the Elder Brethren from which I have quoted.

MR. GRAY: In consequence of the extremely unsatisfactory answer which the right hon. Gentleman has given, I beg to give Notice that I will call further attention to this matter.

SOUTH AMERICA—THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC—CLAIMS OF PATRICK CANTLON.

MR. GRAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Foreign Office has received from Patrick Cantlon, of Chirilcoy, Buenos Ayres, a communication dated December 8th 1884, and addressed to Earl Granville, detailing outrages which were committed upon him by soldiers of the National Government during the Revolution in the Argentine Republic in 1880; whether Mr. Egerton, the English Chargé d'Affaires at Buenos Ayres, has taken any action upon the representations made to him by Mr. Cantlon; and if not, would he state on what grounds; and, whether the Secretary of State has investigated the complaints set forth in Mr. Cantlon's memorial to him of December; and, if so, with what result?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The letter referred to by the hon. Member has been received at the Foreign Office. Patrick Cantlon's claim for compensation has been officially supported by Mr. Egerton, by Sir Horace Rumbold, and his successors in charge of Her Majesty's Legation at Buenos Ayres; and on the 19th of January last an instruction was sent to Mr. Monson, Her Majesty's Minister to the Argentine Republic, directing him to urge the settlement of this claim upon the Argentine Government.

INLAND REVENUE STAMP OFFICE. DUBLIN.

MR. GRAY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is aware that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, having opened an office at the Four Courts, Dublin, for the sale of stamps and collection of Duty, are now, in addition, selling all kinds of unstamped forms and papers at greatly reduced rates, some at half-price; whether he is aware that this latter proceeding, in regard to unstamped papers, inflicts considerable loss upon the law stationers; and, whether the Treasury will restrict the Commissioners to the sale of stamps and the collection of Duties?

MR. HIBBERT for Mr. CHILDERS: The Inland Revenue Stamp Office at the Four Courts replaces the former licensed vendors; and, like them, it sells unstamped forms for the convenience of the Legal Profession and the public. These forms are sold at a rate which yields a reasonable profit to the State, besides being a convenience to the purchaser of stamps.

MR. GRAY asked, whether the hon. Gentleman was aware that the Office issued a Circular, stating that they were selling unstamped papers at half the price charged by traders; and, whether the Office would be permitted to enter into an unfair competition with traders?

MR. HIBBERT said, that the fact might be so; but a fair profit was realized.

MR. CALLAN: Does a similar practice prevail in England?

MR. HIBBERT: I have no doubt it does.

MR. GRAY gave Notice that he would put another Question on the subject.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGE, GALWAY—
PROFESSOR D'ARCY THOMPSON.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How long has Mr. D'Arcy Thompson been a Professor in the Queen's Colleges, Ireland; how long has he acted as Librarian in Galway College; who is Librarian in Belfast Queen's College, and when was he appointed; who is Librarian in Cork Queen's College, and when was he appointed; and, why is Mr. D'Arcy Thompson not given an appointment of a similar tenure to that enjoyed by his colleagues in the other Colleges?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Mr. D'Arcy Thompson was appointed Professor of Greek in Queen's College, Galway, in 1861. In January, 1877, he was selected for the post of acting librarian, at a time when the Government had under consideration the question of appointing librarians to the Queen's Colleges. He continued so to act until 1883, when an application was received from him that his appointment might be made permanent; but the Government did not consider it advisable to alter the then existing arrangement, and they certainly are not disposed at the present moment to create a new vested interest in connection with the Queen's Colleges. The present librarian at Belfast is Professor Meissner. He was appointed in July, 1882. The librarian at Cork is Mr. Caulfeild. He was appointed in January, 1876.

SOUTH AFRICA — TROOPS FOR THE SOUDAN.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any reply has been sent by Lord Wolseley to the offers made by Colonel Methuen and Sir C. Warren of the services of 600 Cavalry and 1,000 Colonial and Boer sharpshooters in the Soudan; whether there is any foundation for the statement that has appeared in The

Times of the 28th ult. that a proposal has been made to organise a force of 5,000 Zulus; and, whether, in view of the strain upon our very small Army at home, that or any similar proposal for the employment of Native African troops in the Soudan is likely to meet with the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am not aware whether any answer has been sent by Lord Wolseley to the offer of services made by Colonel Methuen and Sir Charles Warren. I do not think there is any foundation for the statement that a proposal has been made to organize a force of 5,000 Zulus for the Soudan; but a proposition has been received from the Lieutenant Governor of Natal for the organization of a corps of Natives of that Colony. It would not be possible, until we have further information as to the progress of affairs in South Africa, to say whether we could take advantage of any of these offers. Of course, the subject will be kept under consideration. Lord Wolseley has expressed himself favourably with regard to the acceptance, with some modifications, of the proposal of Colonel Methuen and Sir Charles Warren.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Has Lord Wolseley given an answer?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not know whether he has sent any answer. I said that he transmitted the offers home. Neither do I know whether the offer has been made direct to Lord Wolseley.

MR. HEALY asked, whether Great Britain had ever employed any savages against white men since the American War.

[No reply.]

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND) — RESULT OF SCHOOL EXAMINATIONS—SUPPLY TO SCHOOL MANAGERS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to his recent statement that the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland give to managers of schools on application particulars of the results obtained by teachers under their management in examinations for class promotion, Whether he is aware that the Commissioners have lately re-refused to give such information to managers, as being against the practice of the Department; and, whether the Commissioners still continue to allege any, and if so what, reason for refusing to inform a teacher, who applies to them directly, what marks in each subject and what total per-centage he had obtained in any examination?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I understand that, through a mistake in the Education Office, an erroneous answer was, unfortunately, recently given to the manager of a school who applied on this subject; but the mistake has since been rectified, and is not likely to occur again. I should add to the answer I have already given the hon. Member on this subject, that the Commissioners invariably communicate to the managers the occurrence of success, as well as of failure at an examination; and that they are prohibited by their published rules from communicating directly with a teacher.

MR. SEXTON asked, whether any reason could be alleged why the Commissioners should refuse to give a teacher, who failed in an examination for promotion, such information as might enable him to remedy his deficiencies before the next examination?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I understand that they will give such information on being applied to by the managers of schools.

MR. SEXTON said, that he would again call attention to the matter.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)— FIGHT FOR A DRUM—FIVEMILE- TOWN PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Irish Government have noticed that, in a case heard at the Five-mile-town (Tyrone) Petty Sessions, on the 5th ultimo, by J. A. Pomeroy and Major R. Brown, justices, it was proved that a man named Sherry had gone, disguised, with others, into the dwelling-house of one Thomas Little, and, while his associates decoyed Mr. Little out of the house, had assaulted Mrs. Little, set fire to the house, and attempted to carry away a drum, but being prevented by the return of Mr. Little, made a dangerous assault upon him with a weapon known as a hook; whether Sergeant

Green, the member of the Constabulary force in charge of the prosecution, applied to the justices named to send the case to a higher Court for trial, and whether the justices refused the application, inflicted on Sherry no heavier punishment than a fine of £3, and refused to award Thomas Little any compensation, either out of the fine or otherwise, for furniture broken and damaged by Sherry; whether Thomas Little and Mr. Pomeroy, one of the justices, were some time since opposing litigants; and, what action the Government will take in reference to the case?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This case arose out of the disputed possession of a drum, which had been purchased by subscription by an Orange Lodge, and which Thomas Little, who had it in his keeping, had declined to give up. On the evening of the occurrence, Sherry, with another man, entered Little's house; and while his companion induced Little to leave the house, Sherry attempted to abstract the drum, but was prevented by Little's wife, whose shouts brought her husband to her assistance, and he, seeing what was going on, struck Sherry with a shovel, and attempted to stab him with a pitchfork, but was prevented by his wife. Sherry then succeeded in making his escape, but without the drum. There was no satisfactory evidence given as to Sherry being disguised, and it was not shown that he violently assaulted Little or his wife, or, in fact, did anything beyond struggling to carry off the drum. The allegation as to his setting fire to the house is based on the fact that, in trying to get at the drum, he upset a lamp; and the weapon "known as a hook" was an instrument apparently intended to cut down the drum which was hanging from the rafters of the house. The police did apply to have the case returned for trial; but the magistrates considered the requirements of the case would be met by fining Sherry £3 and 5s. 6d. costs. I am informed that there had been litigation between Little and Mr. Pomeroy, one of the magistrates; but having regard to what I have stated, I think justice was done in the present case, and that there is no reason for interference.

MR. SEXTON asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the police were so dissatisfied with the decision of the magistrates that they gave notice of appeal?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Yes; I am aware of it.

THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES— QUEENSLAND—MOVEMENT FOR SEPARATION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any movement has taken place in Queensland for a division of that Colony; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have taken any decision thereon?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No doubt, there is somewhat of such a movement in Northern Queensland, chiefly in consequence of the inability of employers in the Northern district to obtain Indian and other coloured labour which they require. Her Majesty's Government have not yet found themselves called upon to take any decision thereon. But, in consequence of communications they have received, they have asked the Colonial Ministry for any expression of their views on the subject which they may be disposed to give. Her Majesty's Government has, at the same time, intimated that they would be very reluctant to advise a separation of part of the Colony, if the wishes and requirements of the residents in that part can be otherwise fairly met, in so far as, after due inquiry, they may be found to be just and reasonable.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.).

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will give a tabular Return of the Revenue and Expenditure of Egypt, together with a list of the Loans, with the annual charges thereon, whether for interest or sinking fund, and the amount received from the sources of revenue respectively hypothecated to them?

Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE: There will be no objection to prepare the Return for presentation to Parliament.

PIER AND HARBOUR WORKS (ENG- LAND AND WALES).

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing the Pier and Harbour Works commenced since the Act 46 and 47 Vic. c. 26, became Law; the amount of the contract in each case; when no contract has been taken the amount sanctioned for each work; the amount expended up to the present time; the works sanctioned but not yet commenced; the amount of the contract in such cases; and the dates when the work is likely to be commenced?

MR. HIBBERT: I think a Return to the general effect suggested would be useful, and that the 31st of this month would be a convenient date up to which to complete it. I will cause such a Return to be prepared accordingly.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)— THE SUPPLIES.

DR. CAMERON asked the Secretary of State for War, with reference to the statement of the War Correspondent of The Morning Post that a quantity of supplies sent up the Nile for the use of our troops in the Soudan had been rendered useless in consequence of having been packed in trade cases, Whether, in addition to the 25 per cent. loss reported on articles comprised as grocery rations and packed in the Government Establishment at Woolwich, any loss has been reported in articles of supply sent out in trade cases; and, if so, what loss, and in what articles; and, if he would state by whom these articles were bought, and whether they were inspected; and, if so, by whom, previous to their despatch from this Country?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No Nile supplies were packed in what are technically known as "trade cases;" but special packages were provided by contractors in accordance with samples decided on by the Committee on Nile Boat Service. As I stated on the 27th of February, these were designedly made lighter than ordinary field cases. Losses are reported in the following articles:—Bacon, cheese, biscuits, pickles, soap, and matches. The exact loss will not be known until the supplies are all opened for use; but the average loss on these articles is estimated at about 12 per cent from all causes, including total loss by wreckage and upsetting of boats, theft, climate, and damage to packages. The proportion of loss due to defective packing alone cannot be stated until the detailed accounts are received. The articles were purchased in the usual way by the Director of Army Contracts. The quality was determined by the Special Committee on Nile Boat Service; and the contractors' deliveries were tested by Commissariat and medical officers at Woolwich. It is reported from Korti that the quality of every article was found, without exception, to be excellent.

THE EXTRA POLICE TAX, LIMERICK.

Mr. LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What steps the Government intend to take to realise the amount due from the Corporation of Limerick in respect of extra police duty, which has been recovered against the Corporation by verdict of a competent court in Ireland?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I can only refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply which I gave, on the 4th of December last, to a Question of the noble Viscount the Member for County Fermanagh (Viscount Crichton) on this subject, and add that a Bill which will include this among other matters, is now being prepared.

MUNICIPAL FRANCHISE (IRELAND)— ASSIMILATION TO ENGLISH FRANCHISE.

Mr. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, When the Government propose to assimilate the Irish Municipal Franchise to that of England?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (who replied): The Government are fully alive to the defects in the existing municipal franchise in Ireland and to the desirableness of legislating on the subject; which, however, is one of those which must be included in the general statement already made, that no announcement of the Government's programme of legislation for the Session can be looked for until further progress has been made with the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill.

Mr. HEALY said, that the right hon. Gentleman, in replying to a previous Question, said a Bill was being prepared. Was that being done in this case?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that a Bill was being prepared; but that they could not make any further statement until some progress was made with the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill.

Mr. HEALY: Will this Bill have precedence of the coercion measure referred to?

[No reply.]

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACT AMENDMENT BILL—REDUCTION OF THE IRISH BENCH.

Mr. HEALY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, To what purpose it is proposed to apply the £25,000 per annum to be saved by the Irish Judicature Act Amendment Bill?

Mr. T. A. DICKSON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether the Government are really serious about pressing forward this Bill this Session?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): Yes, Sir. In reply to the Question of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), I have to say that there will be little or no immediate saving effected by the Bill; but, ultimately, when all the Judges whose places are not to be filled have retired, and their pensions have lapsed by death, the saving will be about £17,000 a-year. There will be no special application of the saving; but the charge on the Consolidated Fund will be diminished by that amount. The hon. and learned Gentleman should remember that the salary list of the Irish Judicial Bench is now more than one-half that of the English, although the population is only a little over one-sixth, and it is nearly twice that of the Scotch, although Ireland has less than one-third additional population.

Mr. GIBSON: I rise to Order. The right hon. Gentleman has been asked a Question, and he has answered it. He is now making a speech, going into matters of a debatable nature?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): No, Sir; I am giving to the House and the hon. and learned Gentleman who has asked me a certain Question as to the saving of expense in the Irish Courts, some figures to show what that expense is. I think that is entirely relevant to the Question. In England the Court fees received cover the cost of the administrative department; but in Ireland there is a deficit charged to the taxpayer.

MR. GIBSON: I must again rise to Order. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. Gentleman is in Order, having answered the Question, to go into these matters, which are subjects of debate and discussion?

MR. SPEAKER: I understand the right hon. Gentleman is only stating facts in answer to the Question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): I will repeat what I was stating when the right hon. and learned Gentleman interrupted me—that in England the Court fees cover the cost of the administrative department, whereas in Ireland there is a deficit charged on the taxpayers of £70,000 a-year.

MR. HEALY: I beg to give Notice that unless the saving of £17,000 a-year effected by this Bill be applied to some useful Irish object, I will give the Bill my most determined opposition.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked, whether it was intended to apply any of the saving to the purpose of the Judicial Bench in England?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): Certainly not.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND)— RETURNS FOR 1883 AND 1884.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he would furnish a Return showing the number of petitions filed in the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland in the years 1883 and 1884 respectively, distinguishing the petitions from the districts of Cork, Belfast, Derry, Galway, and Limerick on which it is proposed by the Local Court of Bankruptcy (Ireland) Bill to confer a local jurisdiction; and showing the estimated assets available for dividend in each district?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN who replied said: There is no objection to this Return being given.

ISLANDS OF THE WESTERN PACIFIC— SAMOA AND TONGA.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Sir Edward Malet has given the assurances referred to in a Foreign Office Telegram of 4th December 1884, that Great Britain will respect the independence of Samoa and Tonga; whether reciprocal assurances have been received from the German Government; and, whether there is any objection to lay upon the Table the Documents in which these reciprocal assurances are recorded?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir Edward Malet did give the assurances referred to in accordance with his Instructions, and reciprocal assurances were received from the German Government. The documents recording those assurances have already been laid in the Parliamentary Papers on New Guinea presented last month (C. 4,273), and are numbered 73, 136, and 181.

MR. GORST: May I ask whether the German Government considers itself bound by the statements made in the despatch of Lord Granville to Sir Edward Malet?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I must ask for Notice of the Question.

NORTH BORNEO.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any Protocol has been drawn up at Madrid, to which Her Majesty's Government is to be a party, recognising British sovereignty over North Borneo; and, if so, when and in what manner such sovereignty was acquired?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No Protocol has been drawn up at Madrid recognizing British Sovereignty over North Borneo.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—BALLY- MENA BENCH OF MAGISTRATES.

MR. MOORE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Government have taken, or propose to take, any steps to modify the constitution of the Ballymena bench of magistrates; and, whether it is a fact that there is still not a single Roman Catholic magistrate on the bench, whilst seven of the justices in the one district are closely related to one another by ties of blood relationship or marriage?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: No well-grounded complaint as to the Ballymena Bench of Magistrates has ever been brought under the notice of the Lord Chancellor, who informs me that, whatever ties of relationship may subsist between some of the magistrates, they appear to discharge their duties in a proper manner. I understand there is no Roman Catholic on this Bench. The name of one gentleman of that persuasion was submitted to the Lord Chancellor, but the Lieutenant of the county declined to recommend him for the Commission; and the Lord Chancellor, after some correspondence, came to the conclusion that he would not be warranted in overruling Lord Waveney's decision.

MR. CALLAN: In reference to the answer just given by the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the Lord Lieutenant of the County Antrim, May I ask, is it a fact that Lord Waveney, the present Lord Lieutenant of the county, is the first name to a recommendation in favour of the same person made in the year 1882; also, whether it is a fact that a recommendation was made of this gentleman, signed by the Roman Catholic Bishop of Down and Connor, the then Lord Lieutenant of the county, Sir Edward MacNaghten; and, also, whether the present Lord Lieutenant of the county has not, in this case, refused his own recommendation?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I will ask the hon. Member to put down this Question on the Paper. I cannot answer without Notice.

MR. CALLAN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware whether that is a fact?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, who has given his admission to the fact that there is no Catholic on this Bench, whether the Lord Chancellor, when any complaint is made, refers to the Lord Lieutenant of the county, who is generally a fossilized Tory?

[No reply.]

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY—HUNDRED OF CHIPPENHAM.

SIR GABRIEL GOLDNEY asked the Junior Lord of the Treasury, When the Ordnance maps, on the scale of 25 inches to the mile, for the Hundred of Chippenham, in the county of Wilts, the survey of which was completed last summer, will be issued?

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: The map in question will be published towards the end of this year. A portion only of the work was completed last summer; the final out-of-doors operations are being completed now.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ACT, 1883—RATES OF INTEREST.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether an order has been issued for reducing the rate of interest charged to Boards of Guardians in Ireland for loans under the Labourers' (Ireland) Act; and, if not, if the Treasury intend charging a higher rate of interest for loans under "The Labourers' Act, 1883," than they charge for loans under the Land Act of 1881?

MR. HIBBERT: The rate of interest for these loans has been reconsidered; and as soon as the Bill introduced by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland has become law, the Treasury will fix the rates of interest at $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent for loans repayable in 35 years, $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent for loans repayable in 40 years, and $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent for a longer term, subject always to the sufficiency of the security. This is a reduction of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent or more on the present rates of interest.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE SUB-POSTMASTER AT CRAANFORD, CO. WEXFORD.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is a fact that Mr. Edward Byrne, Sub-Postmaster of Craanford, in the county of Wexford, was threatened with dismissal by the Post Office authorities in Dublin because meetings of a branch of the National League were held at Craanford, in the same house as the Post Office; whether, if this be so, there is any rule prohibiting the meetings of political Constitutional Committees in a house, part of which is used as a Post Office; and, whether this rule is in force in England as well as Ireland?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, that it was not the case that the threat of dismissal had been made. The man had applied to the Postal Authorities for advice, and was informed that the Department always discouraged its officials from connecting themselves with political agitations.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: In connection with the answer to the Question, I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether or not it is a fact that Mr. Edward Byrne, sub-postmaster of Craanford, as a matter of fact, was not taking any active part in the National League movement; and, whether he had no further connection with the movement, except that in one of the rooms of the post-office meetings of the National League were held?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I can only repeat my answer. I am not aware whether rooms in the post-office were let for that purpose.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: The right hon. Gentleman has stated that no threat of dismissal was held out to the sub-postmaster of Craanford. I would like to know whether it is not actually a fact that the Post Office Authorities compelled Mr. Byrne to give a written undertaking or agreement that he would not allow National League meetings to be held in the house where the post-office was, and that the alternative to signing this agreement was that he should be dismissed? I believe I have a copy of this undertaking that is denied in my possession.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The answer I have given is the only one I can give.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman—[Cries of "Oh!" and "Order!"] Very well; I beg to give Notice that on to-morrow afternoon I shall ask Whether it is a fact that the Post Office Authorities compelled Mr. Byrne to give a written undertaking, with the alternative of dismissal, that he would not allow National League meetings to be held in the house?

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)— CHAPLAINS IN THE SOUDAN.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the Secretary of State for War, How many chaplains are attached to the expeditionary force under Lord Wolseley, and how they are distributed; whether any chaplains were attached to the advanced force under Sir Herbert Stewart; how many chaplains are attached to the troops now on their way to Suakin from England and India; and, whether it is intended that any chaplains should be attached to the advanced forces in the field, to minister to the sick and wounded?

MR. BUCHANAN: May I ask the noble Marquess in his answer to give the number of Presbyterian chaplains with the various forces in Egypt?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: According to the latest Returns received, which are for the 1st of January, the chaplains with Lord Wolseley's Expedition were distributed as follows:—Church of England, one at Dongola, two at Wady Halfa; Roman Catholic, one each at Dongola, Wady Halfa, and Assouan; Presbyterian, one at Wady Halfa, and one at Assouan; Wesleyan, one at Assouan. Probably at the present date this distribution has changed by the move of several chaplains more to the front. So far as I am aware, there was not a chaplain with the Force under the late Sir Herbert Stewart. The chaplains attached to Sir Gerald Graham's Force are two Church of England, two Roman Catholic, one Presbyterian, and one Wesleyan. The question of sending chaplains with an advanced Force is for the General in immediate command to decide. With reference to the Question of which the hon. Member for Edinburgh City (Mr. Buchanan) has given me private Notice, there are two Presbyterian chaplains in Lower Egypt, of whom one is at Cairo and the other at Alexandria.

Mr. William Redmond

MR. BUCHANAN: Is there any Presbyterian chaplain with Lord Wolseley's Force at Korti?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have stated that the Presbyterian chaplains are—one at Wady Halfa, and one at Assouan.

NATIONAL DEBT (CONVERSION OF STOCK) ACT—CONVERSION OF CON- SOLS—THE COINAGE BILL.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, during the present Session of Parliament, Her Majesty's Government intend to develop the scheme for the conversion of 3 per cent. Consols into a 2½ per cent. and 2½ per cent. Stock by the exercise of compulsory powers; and, whether he can relieve the uncertainty in the minds of the recipients of weekly wages as to the real value of the half-sovereign, by announcing his determination not to re-introduce the Coinage Bill, which converted the gold ten shilling piece into a token of the intrinsic value of nine shillings?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): In reply to the first part of the Question, I have to say that the National Debt (Conversion of Stock) Act, passed on the 3rd of July last, gave to Her Majesty's Government two years in which to offer optional conversions of Debt. I have no communication on the subject to make to Parliament at this moment. As to the second part of the Question, I have to remind the hon. Member that the intrinsic value of the silver coins which the recipient of weekly wages is bound to accept for a payment of 10s. is not quite 7s. 5d. I do not think that, under such circumstances, any sensible recipient of weekly wages requires his mind to be relieved on that subject.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Is it intended to re-introduce the Coinage Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): As the noble Lord is well aware, I am not in a position at this moment to state whether or not the Bill will be re-introduced this year.

ARMY (INDIA)—BOUNTIES TO SOLDIERS.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, To state the nature and extent of information which the India Office Records can supply in regard to the amount paid in bounties to induce men of the European garrison of India to volunteer to remain in India, and the rates of bounty paid, the annual cost and number of men who have volunteered from the different branches of the service in each year from 1869-70 to latest year?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The India Office Records do not afford any means of giving the information required; but I shall be glad to furnish my hon. and gallant Friend with Papers showing the cost and effect of the special grant of bounty during the last 18 months.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—LOANS TO SCHOOL BOARDS.

MR. JAMES asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether he has received any communication from the Treasury with respect to the Memorial presented to the Education Department in July 1884, on the terms of the rate of interest and annual instalments made to the Public Works Loan Commissioners by School Boards, for the purposes of school buildings in poor and populous localities.

MR. MUNDELLA: I have received a reply from the Treasury to the Memorial presented in July last. It has already been laid on the Table of this House, and, I understand, will be issued to-morrow. The Treasury have agreed to reduce their rate for loans, and to charge $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent up to 35 years, the period for the currency of loans, which, should, in their opinion, be normal. In loans up to 40 years the rate will be $3\frac{3}{4}$, and up to 60 4 per cent. They are also prepared to accept repayment of loans up to 30 years in the form of a fixed annuity, instead of by equal annual instalments as heretofore.

PUBLIC MEETINGS—THE RIOTS AT ASTON HALL, BIRMINGHAM.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER, who had given Notice of a Question relating to the Aston riots, said, he thought he might save some time and anxiety to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade if he were to state that he put the Question with no animus whatever. ["Oh, oh!"] He had not been instigated by, nor been in communication with, any members of the Conservative Party at Birmingham, and he unearthed the hatchet, if it could be so called, entirely on his own responsibility.

MR. SPEAKER interposing, said, the hon. Member must confine himself to putting the Question.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER then asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the trial and conviction of Peter Joyce, alias Larry Mack, at Birmingham, on March 2nd, for uttering a false, scandalous, and malicious libel against Mr. R. C. Jarvis, a gentleman of Birmingham; whether his attention has further been called to the summing up of the learned Judge, who stated that—"They had heard Mr. Jarvis was a very respectable gentleman in Birmingham, and he had no doubt that he was; but, if he had been guilty of the conduct charged upon him, all his respectability of character would not avail against truth;"

and, again—

"He also thought they would have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the libel was as false as it was wicked, scandalous, and malicious;"

and, whether he is now prepared to retract and apologise for an allegation put forward by him concerning the character of an honourable gentleman, which has been proved before Judge and Jury to have been a scandalous and malicious libel? He also wished to ask a Question of which he had given the right hon. Gentleman private Notice—namely, Whether the right hon. Gentleman's attention had been further called to the expression of opinion on the part of the learned Judge that the affidavits of these roughs had been taken by the solicitors to the Liberal Association without due caution such as should have been shown by

and, further—

“that unless there was some responsible person, who had not been produced at the trial, who vouched for all these people who had made affidavits, then Messrs. Norton and Redfern's conduct was deserving of great blame?”

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I can well believe the statement of the hon. Baronet, that he has not put the Question at the request of the Conservative Party at Birmingham; for I believe the local leaders of that Party much regret that this matter should have been again raised. The addition which the hon. Baronet has made to it was only communicated to me after I came to the House. It consists, as far as I can gather, of an additional extract from the summing up of the learned Judge. I have had no opportunity of comparing it with the reports in the newspapers, and I cannot say whether it is correct or not. In any case, however, I should not think it my duty to make any comment on the remarks of the learned Judge in his summing up. The hon. Baronet appears to be incompletely informed as to the circumstances referred to in his Question. It appears that the defence in the case of Peter Joyce was that he was not the person who made the declaration which was the subject of the prosecution; and, under these circumstances, no evidence whatever was tendered on his behalf as to the truth or otherwise of the alleged libel. I do not know how the learned Judge arrived at his conclusion; but I assume that, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, he accepted the denial of Mr. Jarvis, the person referred to in the declaration. As the hon. Baronet has thought fit to revive this matter, I have to point out that the truth of the declaration was made the subject of another inquiry held before the stipendiary magistrate, when a man named Reed was prosecuted by Mr. Jarvis for libel. On that occasion, Mr. Jarvis denied the truth of the statements contained in the statutory declaration, but he admitted, in cross-examination, that he had given tickets to roughs to go to Aston, and that numbers of these roughs had come to his shop the day after the demonstration, declaring that he had engaged them, and claiming payment for their services to the Conservative Party. He also admitted that in the case of one man he had sent him to Mr. Barton, the secretary of the Conservative Association, with his private card. After hearing that and other evidence for the prosecution, the stipendiary dismissed the charge without calling for evidence for the defence. Under these circumstances, I have nothing to add to an answer which I gave to a similar Question by the hon. Baronet on 23rd of February last.

RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—SIR PETER LUMSDEN, CHIEF BOUNDARY COMMISSIONER.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Sir Peter Lumsden, feeling aggrieved at the position in which he was placed, tendered his resignation to Her Majesty's Government; whether he has since received such assurances of support as have induced him cordially to consent to continue his duties; and, whether the Ameer of Afghanistan, after having expressed alarm, has been reassured as to the intentions of Her Majesty's Government to maintain and support the integrity of his territories?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I stated on Tuesday the instructions which had been given to Sir Peter Lumsden and the advice by him tendered to the Afghan authorities; but I must decline to answer the Question which the hon. Member, under a misapprehension as to what has passed, has asked as to the alleged resignation of Sir Peter Lumsden. There is no reason to doubt that the Ameer, after the assurances he has received, reposes perfect confidence in Her Majesty's Government, and his approaching visit to India is the best evidence of it.

Sir Frederick Milner

GENERAL GORDON'S DIARY.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the Diary of General Gordon, which is now on its way to the Foreign Office, will be laid upon the Table of the House, after it has been received?

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the following Question, of which he had given private Notice:—Whether, in view of the publication of these Diaries, the Government would put themselves in possession of the views of General Gordon's nearest relatives?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Perhaps I may be allowed to answer these Questions. I think I have already stated that, until General Gordon's diaries are received, it will be impossible for us to give any absolute pledge as to what will be done with them. I may add, in explanation, that we really do not know what will be the character of those diaries. If they were, as was the diary of General Stewart, which was prepared under General Gordon's direction, a sort of substitute for despatches, they will, of course, be treated in the same way as other public documents, and the Government will be responsible for the disposal of them. If, on the other hand, it appears that they are of a private character, of course the relatives of General Gordon will be consulted. But, as I have said, until the documents have been received, it will be impossible to state in what manner they will be disposed of.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)—MILITARY CO-OPERATION OF THE COLONIES.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the answer sent to the Australian Colonies, in reply to their offer of Troops for the Soudan?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I hope that in a few days all the Papers connected with this matter will be in the hands of hon. Members. With reference to what has fallen from my hon. Friend behind me, I will not anticipate what these Papers will show beyond saying that, nowhere will it be found that at any time, or on any occasion, were the offers of Canada or of any of the Australian Colonies declined.

The only doubt ever entertained or expressed was as to the date at which, from a military point of view, the offers could best be availed of. As an epitome of how the matter stands, I will read an extract from a telegram, the last of a series, which has, a few days ago, been sent to Victoria, South Australia, and Queensland—

"Her Majesty's Government are carefully considering the patriotic offer of troops. While the disposal of further contingents during the summer heat in the Soudan would be most difficult to arrange, if Colony, either independently, or acting jointly with others, can despatch force in August to arrive in Egypt in September, Her Majesty's Government will most gladly receive it."

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Will my hon. Friend lay on the Table that despatch, with the date on which it was sent?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes, certainly.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)— LORD WOLSELEY'S ADDRESS TO THE TROOPS.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he would telegraph to Lord Wolseley, asking him to forward the text of the speech recently addressed by him to the troops of General Gordon at Korti?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In reference to this subject, I stated, the other day, that we had no official Report as to the observations said to have been made by Lord Wolseley in addressing the Native troops at Korti. I do not propose to telegraph to Lord Wolseley, asking him to forward the text of his speech, or otherwise to call his attention to the matter. He is, as I said before, in receipt of the Instructions of Her Majesty's Government, and we have full confidence in the manner in which he has carried out and will continue to carry out those Instructions. I do not think it would be desirable to indicate any want of confidence in Lord Wolseley by calling upon him for constant explanations of statements made by newspaper correspondents.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is truth in the following items of recent news from the seat of war in the Soudan:—

"The so-called friendly tribes are rapidly becoming very unfriendly since they do not see immediate prospect of farther gain by friendliness."—(Several Papers.)

"The destruction of property by British troops has caused a feeling of intense hostility on the part of the tribes between Korti and Abu Hamad."—(Times, March 2nd.)

"The weather at Korti is becoming hotter and hotter, and several cases of typhoid have already occurred."

"Lord Wolseley's eyes have been affected by the climate of the Soudan."—(Standard, March 3rd):

and, whether, in view of the great losses which must necessarily occur when the real hot weather shortly sets in, Her Majesty's Government will consider the expediency of bringing the troops back by water in comparative comfort without delay, and dealing with the Mahdi by peace or by war at a more convenient season?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: We have no information to the effect that the so-called friendly tribes are rapidly becoming very unfriendly, although Lord Wolseley has intimated that there is some doubt as to the disposition of the tribe of which Hussein Pasha Kalifa was Chief. Lord Wolseley said that Chief was in the Mahdi's camp; and it would be unwise, in those circumstances, to rely upon them. We have no confirmation of the report that the destruction of property by British troops has excited a feeling of intense hostility on the part of the tribes between Korti and Abu Hamad. As to the statement that the weather at Korti is becoming hotter and hotter, and several cases of typhoid have already occurred, we have received no report to that effect. In fact, almost all the sickness that has taken place for a considerable time past has consisted of cases of enteric fever; but we have not heard that the prevalence of that complaint has recently increased. We have received no report as to the alleged statement as to Lord Wolseley's eyes being affected by the climate of the Soudan; and, in regard to the last part of the Question, for reasons stated more fully in the recent debate, Her Majesty's Government do not think it would be expedient to bring back the troops by water from the positions they now occupy.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether it was the case that the British Authorities had furnished the tribe specifically alluded to by the noble Marquess with 1,000 rifles?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: That may have been done some time ago. I have no recollection of the matter having occurred recently.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVATE BUSINESS— RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES BILLS.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked the Chairman of Ways and Means, Whether he has had under his consideration the Bills promoted by nine of the principal Railway Companies, proposing important changes in the incidence of Railway Rates, which are exciting public attention throughout the Country; and, whether he will, in concert with the promoters and opponents of these Bills, fix a day, as soon as practicable, when these important Bills may be fully discussed on Second Reading?

SIR ARTHUR OTWAY: The Bills to which the hon. Gentleman refers have been brought to my notice here, and I have received several communications relating to them which show the great interest and importance attached to them elsewhere. The practice of the House with regard to such Bills is as follows:—When Bills promoted by a Company already constituted by Act of Parliament have been read a first time they are referred to the Examiners, under Standing Order 62, who report to the House that the requirements of the Standing Order relating to the Wharnccliffe meeting have been complied with or otherwise. In the event of non-compliance, the question is referred to the Committee on Standing Orders. Under Standing Order 204, the Bill must be read a second time not later than seven clear days after the Report of the Examiner or of the Committee on Standing Orders, as the case may be. There is, however, no rule fixing the time for the Examiner to hold his inquiry, and, in fact, it depends entirely on the notice he receives from the promoters requesting him to hold it. Under these circumstances, it is not in my power to suggest any day for the second reading of these Bills; but I am of opinion that it is very desirable they should all be discussed together, in order to save the time of the House. The same principle, practically, is involved, and the judgment of the House would, I apprehend, govern the others. There is no doubt that the importance of these Bills requires that ample Notice should be given of the time fixed for their discussion, and I will communicate with the agents for the Bills with a view to insure this being done.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN,— THE SUAKIN-BERBER EXPEDITION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, since the advance of British Troops by the Nile towards Berber is now stopped, he will also stop any infructuous advance on the Red Sea side, except such as may be possible before the greatest heat, and without undue risk, to facilitate the retirement of the garrison of Kassala; and, if that garrison cannot be relieved on such conditions, whether they will be immediately informed that they had better come to terms with their co-religionists and countrymen?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he had no reason to think that General Graham or Lord Wolseley, under whose general orders General Graham was placed, would be disposed to make any advance during the hot weather. The campaign under Sir Gerald Graham would, no doubt, be governed by the conditions of climate and by other considerations referred to in the Question.

In reply to a further Question by Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he had no doubt that if General Graham found it was possible for him to do anything to facilitate the relief of the garrison of Kassala he would do so; but he did not imagine that it would be possible for General Graham on his arrival to make any movement in that direction.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked, whether the Government adhered to the statement, which was practically a death warrant, that Kassala was outside the sphere of British operations, or whether they would make some statement to counteract the impression which had been created?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that Kassala was the subject of the next Question to which his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would reply.

KASSALA.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is a fact that the operations of Major Chermide for procuring relief for the garrison of Kassala are seriously impeded by the occupation of Massowah by Italian troops; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will take any steps to persuade the Italian Government themselves to undertake the relief of that beleaguered town?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government have received no information of the nature suggested in the first portion of the hon. Baronet's Question. The Italian Government are in possession of all the particulars known with regard to the condition of the garrison of Kassala, and Her Majesty's Government must leave to them the decision as to the steps which they may consider it advisable to take.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT gave Notice that, on the first opportunity, he should call attention to the abandonment of the garrison of Kassala.

MR. O'KELLY said, he would suggest that the Government should learn whether it was possible to send information to the Commander of the troops at Kassala to surrender when he could get terms from the Mahdi.

MR. MACFARLANE asked as to the possibility of the garrison retiring to the Abyssinian frontier?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he must refer the hon. Member to his statement on the subject made in the recent debate.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—"THE QUEEN v. RYAN"—KILRUSH QUARTER SESSIONS.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the attention of the Irish Government has been called to an incident at the Kilrush, county Clare, Quarter Sessions, on the 2nd January last, as follows: In the case of The Queen v. Ryan (for larceny; the Defendant pleaded "not guilty." The long panel was called and a jury empanelled, case tried, and jury discharged on disagreement. Immediately after, the County Court Judge resumed the cases of action in Civil Bill

Court, when a litigated case of O'Brien v. M'Grath was called on. One of the witnesses for Defendant was John Griffin, of Querrin, a farmer, and one of the jurors who served in the case of The Queen v. Ryan. Immediately after he gave his evidence in the civil case the County Court Judge, addressing him, said "Come now, tell me, were you not a juror in Ryan's case, just tried?"—Answer: "I was, Sir;" Judge: "Were you for convicting or acquitting him?"—Answer: "I was for letting him free;" if, in questioning a juror with regard to what transpired in the jury room, Mr. Kelly did not exceed his right; if it is not a fact that, upon at least one previous occasion, the Lords Justices have called upon Mr. Kelly for an explanation of his conduct as Judge; and, if in this instance similar inquiry will be made, in order to stop a dangerous and unconstitutional proceeding?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This Question has been referred to the County Court Judge for his observations, and he writes as follows:—

"Sir,—In reply to your letter of yesterday, I beg to state that I did substantially ask the question referred to in the Parliamentary Notice of which you enclosed me a copy. I did so not seriously, nor with the view of requiring any answer. The witness, to the amusement of the crowd in Court, immediately replied that he did not know the meaning of the words 'acquittal' or 'conviction,' but that 'he was for setting the man free.'

"The question and answer had no bearing or effect upon the result of either the criminal case in which Griffin was a juror or of the civil case in which he was a witness."

It would have been better if this incident had not occurred; but I think it may not unreasonably be regarded as a jocular interlude, in an unguarded moment, between the Judge and the witness, and that it is not a matter in which the Executive can further interfere.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)— ARKLOW HARBOUR.

Mr. W. J. CORBET asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, What is the amount of the contract for the construction of the Arklow Harbour works; what will be the extra cost of repairing the foundations of the breakwater that have given way; will such extra cost fall either in whole or in part on the local rates, or will it be met by Treasury disbursements; and, will the Treasury send some independent engineer, not connected with the Board of Works, to examine the condition of the breakwater, and Report upon the extent and nature of the injury?

Mr. HIBBERT: The amount of the contract is £27,891, towards which a free grant of £15,000 will be made. It is not possible yet, owing to the weather, to say what extra cost there will be, but it is expected to be small. Any excess over the estimate will be met by loan, in accordance with the Act. The Treasury are not prepared to send another engineer to the spot, as it would involve extra expenses; but I will call for a special Report as to the state of the foundations.

CUSTOMS ANNUITY AND BENEVOLENT FUND.

Mr. DAWSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund was established for the benefit of the widows and children of Her Majesty's Customs; whether the directors of the Customs Fund, with the consent of the Treasury, purchased the patent of an office called the Clerkship of the Bills of Entry; whether the patent was renewed on certain conditions in 1846; whether the profits applicable to the charity had not then reached from £8,000 to £10,000 per annum; whether the Lords of the Treasury, in 1881, took away the entire business without giving any compensation to the Benevolent Fund, on which depends the welfare of the future widows and officers of fifteen hundred insurers; and, whether the Government proposes to compensate the charity for this great loss?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the facts of the case are as follows:—In 1817, the Directors of the Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund purchased, for an annual payment of £2,000, the interest of the Lewis family in the Patent under which they held the office of the "Clerk of the Bills of the Customs," or "Bill of Entry," as it afterwards came to be called, the Patent being renewed to them for 31 years. In 1848, the Patent was again renewed on certain conditions—for instance, a reduction in the price at which the publication was sold—for a further period of 31 years. In 1879, the renewed Patent lapsed, and all rights under it were extinguished. Her Majesty's then Government had meanwhile appointed a Committee to inquire into the whole matter, and they refused to renew the Patent, not considering it right that their servants should make a profit out of the sale of Government information. The clerks employed on the "Bill of Entry" work were offered the option of continuing their employment on behalf of the Government, who henceforth intended themselves to issue the "Bill of Entry," and they accepted the terms offered to them. I cannot admit that the participators in the funds have any claim whatever to compensation. They purchased the remainder of the Patent, as they might have purchased the remainder of a lease; and the figures quoted by the hon. Member, which I have no reason to question, show how good a bargain they made for themselves. I see no object in going back on the work of former years with the object of renewing objectionable monopolies of this character, which, however consonant with former ideas, are altogether opposed to our present financial practice.

MR. DAWSON: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, is it a fact that the Government not only did not renew the right, but allowed it to lapse? Whether the Government, after taking advantage of all the time this Company worked, had followed this up by getting all their books and papers when it was a going concern of considerable property?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he had no further information on the subject.

IRELAND—THE VICEREGAL COURT— THE GENTLEMAN USHER TO THE LORD LIEUTENANT.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY MCCARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that the Hon. Gaston W. Monsell, Gentleman Usher to the Lord Lieutenant, refused to fulfil his official functions at the State Ball held in Dublin Castle on the day of the death of the late Cardinal McCabe?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir; it is not a fact.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: In connection with this Question, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, if he will be good enough to state what are the particular functions of a Gentleman Usher?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MERCHANT SHIPPING—THE TRANS- PORT SERVICE.

MR. DEASY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he has received offers of steamers from Irish Shipowners for transport purposes on as favourable terms as from English Shipowners; and, whether any Irish ships have been engaged; and, if not, on what grounds?

MR. CAINE (for Sir THOMAS BRASSEY): Offers have been received within the last few days from the owners of upwards of 900 steamers, with, for the most part, nothing to indicate the nationality of the owners, that not being a point to which the attention of the Board is directed. The only stipulation required is, that the owner of the ship used in transport shall be a British subject. Of the ships taken, two—the Dunluce and the Camel—belong to the Port of Belfast. Two others belonging to the Port of Sunderland, and one belonging to the Port of Liverpool, are, I think, the property of Irish owners.

MR. DEASY: I will ask the hon. Gentleman, if he will draw their attention to the point?

MR. CAINE: The Admiralty will consider which are the fittest ships for the purpose for which they intend them.

ARMY—THE MARINE ARTILLERY AND INFANTRY.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can state the reason why not a single Officer of the Marine Artillery or Infantry has been appointed to the general staff of the force under General Graham, although that force has held Suakin for more than a year?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Military Authorities are not agreed as to what are the qualifications necessary in an officer of the Royal Marines; but General Graham will be authorized to select such officers at present serving at Suakin as he may think right.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)—MONO- LITHIC PIERS AND BREAKWATERS.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, In what instances the Board of Works (Ireland) have used the monolithic system in the construction of piers and breakwaters; have they refused to do so for the proposed pier at Tramore, county Waterford, though suggested by an eminent local engineer; was the engineer in chief of the Board of Works examined as to the merits of the monolithic system, and is he in favour of it; and, is it a fact that, in the case of the works proceeding at Kinsale Harbour, it is intended to use concrete blocks, laying them down on their narrow sides or ends on mud of from 15 to 20 feet in depth?

MR. HIBBERT: The Board of Works use the monolithic system in all cases where it is applicable, being themselves in favour of it, as is also their engineer. The Board have not refused to use that system at Tramore; and as regards Kinsale, the use of concrete blocks is an improvement on the original design, which was for a dry rubble work. The foundation there is believed to be quite secure.

MR. DEASY: Would the hon. Gentleman state, if it is a fact that the Government Inspector stated before a Select Committee that the harbour was not worth anything on account of the bad foundation?

MR. HIBBERT: I must ask the hon. Member to put down his Question on the Paper.

CUSTOMS PROMOTION AT LIVERPOOL.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, How it is that no promotion has been made in Liverpool, during the past fifteen months, from the ranks of the Acting Examining Officers, to the situation of Examining Officer of Customs; and, whether there is a Treasury Minute in force providing that promotions to the higher rank should be equally divided between the Acting Examining Officers and candidates by competition?

MR. HIBBERT: Three outdoor officers at Liverpool, approved to act as examining officers, have been promoted to be examining officers during the last 15 months, two by competition and one by selection. The rule is that vacancies in this rank are to be filled up from the grades of assistant examining officer, principal coast officer, outdoor officer, and boatman, equally by selection and by competition, and this rule is duly observed.

CORPORATION OF LONDON TOWER BRIDGE BILL.

MR. BRODRICK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been drawn to the Corporation of London Tower Bridge Bill, and to the fact that the centre line of the proposed bridge, as shown by the deposited plan and sections, intersects the precincts of the Tower of London; and, whether the promoters of the Bill have yet applied for and obtained any sanction for such interference, or for the erection of the bridge, in such close proximity to the fortress?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: My attention has been drawn to the interference by the proposed bridge with the Tower precincts, and I have called upon the promoters to submit revised plans.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)— THE SUAKIN-BERBER RAILWAY.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Secretary of State for War, in reference to the construction of the proposed railway from Suakin to Berber, Whether he will consider the advisability of furnishing special instructions to the officers deputed to superintend the construction, and to the contractors engaged on the work, to the effect that the tribesmen and natives should, as far as practicable, be employed in making the railway, and that pains be taken to circulate amongst them liberal offers, and to afford to them good treatment and acceptable remuneration for their services, so as to convert them, under British protection, from fanatical enemies to interested friends and allies?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: During the past year every effort has been made to induce the Natives and tribesmen of the territories adjoining Suakin to take employment under the British authorities. The same policy will, I have no doubt, be pursued in the construction of the railway.

NAVY—PENSIONS—PETTY OFFICERS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is intended to give to the executive Chief Petty Officers of the Royal Navy a pension based on the rank they hold, their present pension being that of a rank one grade lower in the service?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The chief petty officers are a most valuable class; but the Admiralty do not feel justified in increasing the present scale of pension.

ISLANDS OF THE WESTERN PACIFIC—THE NEW HEBRIDES, SAMOA, AND TONGA—SURRENDER OF BRITISH RIGHTS.

MR. GORST asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the diplomatic engagement formerly made with France not to occupy the New Hebrides, to Mr. Meade's suggestion at Berlin that France should be allowed to take the New Hebrides, and to the diplomatic engagements recently made with Germany not to assume sovereignty over the North Coast of New Guinea, and not to occupy Samoa or Tonga, he will give a pledge that Her Majesty's Government will not surrender any more British rights in the Pacific Ocean until the Colonial governments interested and the British Parliament have had the opportunity of fully considering the interests of the British Empire in the Pacific?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman rests upon certain assumptions which are set forth in the Preamble, and to which we are not able to accede. For example, with respect to the New Hebrides, our statement is this—that the engagement with France to maintain the neutrality of the New Hebrides continues in force, and that there has been no proposal that France should assume the Sovereignty of the New Hebrides, unless on terms satisfactory to the Australian Colonies. So far for the New Hebrides. As regards New Guinea, again, we think that the hon. and learned Gentleman has been inaccurately informed. There has been no such diplomatic engagements with Germany as to New Guinea as he supposes, and a telegram shows that the German annexation of New Guinea has not been made in any way by concert with the Government of this country, and not, therefore, by any surrender of any right on the part of this country. Then, again, with regard to Samoa and Tonga, I believe the fact is this—that Germany has fully maintained its engagement not to occupy Samoa or Tonga, and the German Government itself has expressly disowned the course taken by the German Consul in Samoa in hoisting the German flag there. There are statements to which references to Papers could be supplied to the hon. and learned Gentleman if he desires it; but that being so, we cannot allow that any British rights have been surrendered, and the Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman falls to the ground.

EGYPT—PRINCE BISMARCK'S SPEECH IN THE REICHSTAG.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the report of a speech delivered in the Reichstag by Prince Bismarck, as reported in The Times of the 4th March, in which he says, in reference to Egypt—

"I therefore did not advise England 'to take it,' but, on the contrary, dissuaded her from annexing it as urgently as was possible in my disinterested position ;"

and, how far Her Majesty's Government can reconcile this declaration with a statement made elsewhere by Lord Granville, to the effect that—

"The policy of the Government has never yet been in accord with the advice with regard to Egypt which he (Prince Bismarck, gave to the late Government and ourselves, namely to take it?"

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Gentleman asks me to reconcile a statement made by Earl Granville with a speech of Prince Bismarck reported yesterday, they appearing not to be in harmony one with the other. My impressions upon the matter had been the same as those of my noble Friend; but I think my hon. Friend will agree with me I had better not enter upon the subject at present, as I do not think any public advantage will arise from it, and I have reason to believe that my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will, in his place in the other House, make a statement upon the subject shortly.

CENTRAL ASIA — THE RUSSO-AFGHAN FRONTIER.

MR. ONSLOW asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he could state to the House the precise determination arrived at by Her Majesty's Government regarding the Afghan frontier: what is the present position of Sir P. Lumden's Mission, and how long it is proposed to keep him on the borders of Afghanistan, and for what purpose; and, if he can now state the purport of the visit of the Amir to His Excellency the Viceroy; on what basis any understanding respecting the relative positions of England, Russia, and Afghanistan on the Afghan frontier is to be framed?

MR. HENEAGE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it may not be highly prejudicial to the maintenance of a good understanding between England and Russia for questions to be asked in this House in relation to Afghanistan at a time when the diplomatic relations between the two Countries are exceeding strained, and when answers to questions are likely to be misinterpreted either as a sign of weakness or a sign of menace?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the important letter from The Times Correspondent with Sir Peter Lumsden's Mission in Afghanistan, which appeared in that paper on the 3rd March, and especially to the following extracts:—

"I have pointed out the great strategical importance of Pul-i-Khatum, a place which has always been considered Afghan, and beyond the pale of discussion. Another important position is Penjdeh, in the valley of the Murghab. Its inhabitants have always been subject to Afghanistan, and it is occupied by an Afghan garrison. Russia does not desire the definition of the Afghan frontier, for it will put an end to her successful system of stealthy encroachment. . . . Three years ago the nearest Russian outposts on the road from the Caspian were at Krasnovodsk and Chikishlar, 700 miles from Herat: now they are at Pul-i-Khatum, only 150 miles from Herat. Three years ago the nearest Russian outposts on the road from the Oxus and Merv were at Katra Kurghan, say 500 miles from Herat: now they are at Zotatan, 140 miles from Herat. Nearly all this progress has been made by unopposed encroachments since we evacuated Kandhar:—" whether it is true that the Russian troops have just occupied Zulfagar, 40 miles south of Pul-i-Khatun, and Penjdeh, all three places being on Afghan territory; and, whether Her Majesty's Ministers intend to protect the absolute integrity of all Afghan territory, including these important positions, from Russian occupation and influence, in accordance with their own pledges and those of the Czar's Government?

MR. GLADSTONE: What I have to say upon these Questions is this—I will first take the Question of my hon. Friend

(Mr. Heneage), and I wish to speak explicitly to the House. On the part of Her Majesty's Government I am bound to say that, at the present moment, Questions relating to policy or to future contingencies on the subject of the Afghan Frontier cannot, in our judgment, be answered without prejudice to the public interest. I will state certain reasons why I think that to be plainly the case. The policy to be pursued in relation to the Afghan Frontier has long, in my opinion, been known to be a policy strictly national, having the assent of the country at large, well known to Parliament, stated in Parliamentary Papers and documents which are before it, and known also to be a policy upon which there is a general—I may say, perhaps, an unanimous—accord. The putting of any Question in relation to this policy and to contingencies in connection with it is, I think, to be deprecated, and I may, perhaps, add that the manner in which answers to these Questions are frequently received in some parts of the House, tends to break down the conviction that this country in regard to the Afghan Frontier is a perfectly united country, and to propagate and foster an opposite and very injurious feeling that there are differences of opinion about it, and that the matter is one of Party contention. Without going into other reasons, I think the House will appreciate that which I have mentioned. I do hope that reserve will be exercised by hon. Gentlemen upon this subject, and that they will not put Questions except as to matters of fact. I may almost venture to say once for all—I do not say with absolutely no exception—that it will be the duty of the Government to confine themselves to matters of fact in dealing with the matter. This is my general answer to my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Heneage). With reference to the expression he has used, implying that there are strained relations between this country and Russia, it is one which I do not at all desire or think it necessary to adopt. Upon the general grounds of which I have spoken, having regard to the nature of the case—which is evidently one of the utmost importance—and at the same time considering the circumstances of distance and of doubt as to particular points of detail, and the fact that this is a matter of great delicacy, in which it is much more easy to do mischief than good, I do hope that hon. Members will not press upon me Questions which relate strictly and entirely to matters of policy. That applies to the two Questions of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Onslow), and also to the Question of the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) as regards the latter part of it. With regard to the former part, which relates to matters of fact, I believe they are matters upon which full information has already been given in this House. If the hon. Member desires that it should be enlarged as to matters of fact, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will be ready to give him any information he desires.

MR. ONSLOW said, he thought it would be desirable that the House and the country should know what was the national policy to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, and whether it was the determination of the Government to abide by it.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he did not propose to press his Question; but he would remind the House that when the other day he put the last part of the Question, the right hon. Gentleman had asked him to put it on the Paper.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, it would be interesting to know whether the Ameer and the majority of the people of Afghanistan cordially endorsed our policy; or, might he ask the right hon. Gentleman, in regard to the policy which he had described as a national policy, Whether Her Majesty's Government has any good ground for supposing that the views of the Ameer of Afghanistan are cordially shared by the majority of the inhabitants of Afghanistan; and, whether it is the fact that many Afghans have expressed themselves as only too willing to become brethren in arms with the Cossacks?

TOWN TENANCIES IRELAND.— TENANTS' IMPROVEMENTS.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the fact that on Tuesday thirty-two out of the thirty-four Irish Members present voted for a Parliamentary inquiry into the system under which the improvements of tenants in town houses are dealt with in Ireland; and, if he cannot permit a Parliamentary inquiry, will he appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into this question?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he was aware that a very large majority of the Irish Members present in the House voted for the inquiry into house tenure in towns. He was one of those desirous of giving every possible weight to the authority of Irish Members, if the question were one sufficiently and exclusively Irish; but it was proposed to appoint a Select Committee—without the alternative of a Royal Commission—to inquire into the system under which the improvements of tenants in town houses were dealt with in Ireland. That was a very different question from the town parks question, which, at the time of the discussion on the Irish Land Bill, they were disposed to admit was a fair matter for consideration, as to which his right hon. Friend behind him (Mr. W. E. Forster) did say that the Government might assent to inquiry. The town parks question could be considered an Irish question in some degree; and his hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone had made a suggestion which the Government were perfectly willing to agree to—namely, that, so far as town parks were concerned, an inquiry might be made. The question of the tenure of houses in towns was not alone an Irish question. Town houses existed in England and Scotland in exactly the same manner as in Ireland; and he was really not aware of anything distinct in the law of Ireland relating to town houses. It was quite evident that the question was not an Irish, but an Imperial question. He was therefore not able to agree with the desire of the Irish Members to have an inquiry into the tenure of town houses, on the ground on which it was asked for.

THE ESTIMATES—INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

SIR WALTER B. BARTHELOT: I wish to ask the Secretary of State for War a Question with regard to the proposed increase of the Army. I see in The Times to-day that the Army is to be increased by 15,000 men. I should like to know, Whether that statement in regard to an addition of 15,000 men is a correct statement; and, whether that is in addition to the proposed increase of 3,000 men, which is the figure stated in the Estimates?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that when he laid on the Table the Vote of Credit for the operations in progress in Egypt and the Sudan, it would be necessary to ask for a number of men in addition to those asked for in the Supplementary Estimates. He was not, however, now prepared to say what that additional number of men would be.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the noble Marquess when the Supplementary Estimates and the Vote of Credit would be brought forward?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he could not state with certainty. He believed it would be necessary to go on with Supply on Monday and Thursday; but it would depend upon the progress that was made. The Army Estimate would be taken after the Navy Estimate was disposed of. The Vote of Credit had not been prepared yet.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the Prime Minister, whether the Vote of Credit would be taken before the end of the financial year?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that it was not the intention to take the Vote in the present financial year.

ARMY—THE FORCE IN IRELAND.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Might I ask the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to reduce the garrison now in Ireland, by sending from it troops to the war in the Sudan? If so, how many troops is it intended to take; and, when is it intended to take them?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: There is no such intention. The number of troops in Ireland was slightly reduced some time ago, and it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to reduce it further.

ARMY ESTIMATES—THE SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked, Whether any Supplementary Army Estimate for the present year would be presented in addition to that already on the Table of the House? He did not see any Vote for the extra 3,000 men for the present year.

Sir Walter B. Bartlett

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, there would be none.

COLONEL STANLEY asked, whether a portion of the charge for the 3,000 men asked for since the Supplementary Estimates were laid on the Table would be included in those Estimates?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, there would be no further demand for money, as the 3,000 men would be included in the Supplementary Estimates.

PUBLIC MEETINGS—THE RIOT AT ASTON HALL, BIRMINGHAM.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER: I wish to ask your ruling, Sir, upon a point of Order arising out of an answer given by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. The point is, Whether a Member of the House is not, by the understood Rules of the House, compelled to withdraw any statement made in the House, when that statement has been proved in a Court of Justice to be a scandalous and malicious libel?

MR. SPEAKER: No case has arisen on the facts stated by the hon. Baronet for any interference of the Chair.

REGISTRATION (OCCUPATION VOTERS) BILLS.

MR. HEALY asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he will consider the expediency of not making the Irish Registration Bill a separate measure from that for England; but, as in the case of the Franchise and Redistribution Bills, will introduce one measure for the Three Kingdoms?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, it would not be necessary to have a Bill of the same character for England as for Ireland. It was thought advisable that there should be three separate Bills for the three countries. He could assure the hon. and learned Member that the Government felt the obligation of carrying the measures for Ireland and Scotland quite as much as for England.

MR. HEALY: The hon. and learned Gentleman is aware that the House of Lords has three times in succession rejected the Registration of Voters (Ireland) Bill; and, of course, if it is brought in now in a separate form, they will reject it a fourth time, and the only protection is to bring it in as a part of the English Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Bill that was thrown out was a Bill proposing to alter the law. There was no intention in the present Bill to alter the law with respect to the general rules of registration. Its only object was to apply the rules of borough registration to the county registration.

MR. DAWSON: Did the hon. and learned Gentleman say that the Registration Bill for Ireland is not intended to alter the law?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): To alter it in one sense. What we are seeking to do is to apply the rules of borough registration to the county registration, and that is the only object. So far as that alteration is needed, we undertake that it shall be applied to Ireland as well as to England and Scotland.

MR. DAWSON: Might I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, are we to understand that he is not going to introduce now a separate Bill for the reformation of the registration in Ireland?

MR. CALLAN: Might I ask if the law as it at present exists with regard to borough and county representation is not precisely similar?

[No replies.]

MR. CRAIG-SELLAR asked when the Government would introduce the Scotch Registration Bill?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR), in reply, said, it was their intention in this Bill to take some opportunity of improving the form of the Valuation Roll, and he was in communication with some of the leading assessors on this subject.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—NAVY SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY, in moving—

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £130,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray additional Expenditure for certain Navy Services arising out of the Military Operations in Egypt, and connected with Ship-building in Her Majesty's Dockyards, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."

said: Sir Arthur Otway, before this Vote is put, it may, perhaps, be for the convenience of the Committee that I should offer a few words of explanation. The first two items included in this Supplementary Estimate provide for the pay and victuals and the number of officers and men which are now overborne. There has been an increase in the number of officers on full pay of about 120. That increase has been necessary, partly on account of the military operations in Egypt, and partly in consequence of the increase in the Naval Force in the Red Sea. The number of seamen overborne, partly owing to the same causes, is 330. We have also to provide for a larger force of Marines, the number overborne being 170. Recruiting has been going on briskly and most satisfactorily for the battalions now serving in Egypt, and there is an excess of 920 boys over the number voted. In recent years it has been found that the number of boys in training has been insufficient to maintain the necessary strength in the blue-jacket classes, and we shall be obliged to propose a considerable increase in the number of boys in the Estimate for next year. When the House, in December, sanctioned an increased expenditure, it was understood that in the Dockyards we should do all that was in our power to hasten shipbuilding, without materially increasing the number of men. A scheme of profitable overtime has been recommended by the officers of the Dockyards, which scheme has been approved by the Admiralty. It will involve an extra sum for wages of about £38,000 for the Home Yards, and £9,000 for the Foreign Yards, chiefly in respect of the valuable Yard at Malta. It is not necessary to ask Parliament for the full sum involved in this increased expenditure, for the reason that we have been unable to expend, under Vote 10, Section 2, the entire sum voted last year for gunnery in consequence of the delay in the delivery of the gun-mountings. A less sum has also been required than was estimated for repairs and alterations of ships. I regret extremely the delay in the delivery of the gun mountings. We have pressed Messrs. Armstrong to use all possible despatch; but in consequence of the difficulties inseparable from the introduction of new patterns, some portion of the payments anticipated this year will be necessarily postponed until the next financial year. The Vote of £30,000 for Stores is the necessary consequence of the increased amount of shipbuilding. We have devoted the increased expenditure in stores and shipbuilding and wages more particularly to pushing forward those iron-clads which are now in the most advanced stage; and we hope in the present financial year to complete the Colossus, and in the next financial year the Collingwood, the Edinburgh, the Warspite, and the Impérieuse. The larger portion of this Supplementary Vote may be described as being entirely in connection with the Egyptian Expedition. A sum of £250,000 for transport is an addition to a sum of £170,000 which has been provided in previous Supplementary Estimates, and it is exclusive of the repayment to the Indian Revenue for the transport of the Indian Contingent. That payment cannot be made in the present financial year. The list of ships which have been engaged for the transport of the Egyptian Expedition is distributed as follows:—Troops and horses, 13 ships, one hospital ship, five condensing ships, five tank ships, seven for camels and mules, 25 for railway material, including the employés on the railway, nine for stores, one ice ship, two colliers, and two tugs. The approximate cost averages 17s. 6d. per ton per month for the troop-ships, and from 11s. to 12s. for the cargo vessels. I believe that these rates are quite unprecedented in the experience of the Admiralty. At the time of the Crimean War, the rate was 45s. to 50s. for vessels affording very inferior accommodation; and for the ships taken for the last Expedition to Egypt we paid 30 per cent higher rates than those which we are paying at the present time. I am sure the Committee will be glad to be assured that every care has been taken to provide for the requirements of the gallant men we have despatched on the Expedition to Egypt. The Ganges, one of the finest vessels in the Peninsular and Oriental Company's Service has been taken as a hospital ship, and has been most carefully fitted up. The condensing arrangements at Suakin will be capable of furnishing 1,200 tons of fresh water per day. We have now at Suakin two or three ships with ice-making machinery. In addition, we are despatching one small refrigerating vessel with a cargo of 400 tons of ice to be kept frozen. By these arrangements we propose to keep up a supply of ice, not only to those for whom it is so essential—namely, the sick; but we hope also that there may be some to spare for the troops generally. With these observations, I beg to move the Vote for the additional Expenditure for Navy Services arising out of the Military Operations in connection with the Egyptian Campaign, and for Shipbuilding in Her Majesty's Dockyards.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Supplementary Sum, not exceeding £330,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray additional Expenditure for certain Navy Services arising out of the Military Operations in Egypt, and connected with Shipbuilding in Her Majesty's Dockyards, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."—(Sir Thomas Brassey.)

MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not propose, Sir Arthur Otway, to find any fault whatever with the provision which the hon. Gentleman seeks to make for seamen and Marines, for the victualling and clothing of the seamen and Marines, for the transport expenses, and for the other services included in the Vote; but I cannot help expressing my very great sorrow that my hon. Friend has had again to announce the further postponement of the completion of those ships which the House so earnestly desires. The hon. Gentleman has been obliged to tell us that while a larger sum has been expended in wages in the Dockyards and in stores for building ships, there is a delay in the furnishing of the gun-mountings, which places in the hands of the Department something like £40,000. Hon. Members who are acquainted with the working of the Department will know what that means. A delay in the delivery of gun-mountings to the extent of £40,000 means that the ships for which the gun-mountings are required are incomplete, and are not able to take the sea until they are provided. Therefore, there is to be a further unexpected delay, which certainly comes upon the House by surprise.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The saving upon gun-mountings does not cover the whole sum of £40,000. The actual saving on gun-mountings alone is £19,000.

MR. W. H. SMITH: My impression was that the gun-mountings covered the whole saving. I presume that the statement of the hon. Gentleman relates to Sub-Section 2 of Vote 10—the Vote under the head of Machinery.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: There is also a saving of £18,000 on the repairs and alterations of ships; and the two items together come to about £40,000.

MR. W. H. SMITH: At all events, we have an intimation conveyed to the House that the gun-mountings necessary for the guns in order to enable the ships to take the sea have not been supplied; and, therefore, the ships on which the country was entitled to rely, and on which it thought it could rely, cannot be available for the service of the country. These ships were promised to be in readiness and efficient at a certain date; and as they are not, it shows that sufficient foresight has not been exercised, and sufficient care taken to secure that, as far as the Admiralty were concerned, the promise made to the House should be fulfilled. The hon. Gentleman has stated that the Collingwood, the Edinburgh, the Warspite, the Impérieuse, and the Colossus, will be delivered in the course of the coming financial year. I am sure that the House will receive that statement with satisfaction. But I would ask my hon. Friend if he is quite certain that the guns and mountings will be ready for them in time? From the information which has been furnished to the House I very much doubt whether the guns and mountings will be ready in the coming financial year. I hold that there is no security whatever that the guns and gun-mountings will be in the possession of the Admiralty when required. And now I cannot help referring to what is not in the Estimate as well as what is. On the 23rd of October, Parliament was informed that the Admiralty had carefully considered the whole position of the naval defences of the country, and that the Government would make a statement to the House in the course of the month of November. I think the inference to be drawn from that was that the Government had fully considered the whole subject, and had made up their minds as to the course it was necessary to take, and the additions that were necessary to be made to the Navy in order to provide additional strength. If they did not contemplate an addition to the strength of the Navy, at all events they had made up their minds as to what they did intend to do. Well, November passed, and on the 2nd of December a statement was made in this House which led us to believe that a large addition would be made to the strength of the Navy. But up to the present moment not a single ship has been ordered. Four months of the financial year have elapsed, and nothing of the kind has been done.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Six Scouts have been ordered.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Well, I am very glad to hear that. I was only, however, repeating the information given by my hon. Friend to the House in answer to a Question. I understood him to say that the tenders would not be dealt with until the 6th of March.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Six have already been ordered.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The answer which I obtained to a Question the other day was that no one ship had been ordered. At all events, there is no provision in these Estimates, nor has any been made in the course of this financial year, for payment to any contractor of a single farthing for the building of a single ton. The position I wish to take is this—that the Government ought to realize the necessity for this provision, and the sooner it is made the better, in every sense of the word. It does not cost more to build a ship as rapidly as it can be built consistently with good work than to spread the building of it over a long period of years. On the contrary, we have evidence before the House, given before a Committee appointed by the House, including that of Mr. Barnaby, the Chief Constructor of the Navy, that it costs less to build a ship rapidly. Rapid shipbuilding is conducive to greater economy than slow shipbuilding, which involves an unnecessary expenditure of time. Then, again, there is the question of torpedo boats. We were promised that a certain number of torpedo boats should be built within the year. If there is one thing in which this country is more deficient than another at the present moment, as compared with the Navies of other Powers, it is in torpedo boats; and, from what we all know, great reliance in future naval wars will be placed on torpedo boats for the defence of harbours and strong places. But though four months have elapsed since the statement was made to the House, not one single step appears to have been taken, as far as I can see, to supply this deficiency. I say that good faith has not been kept with the House by the delay which has taken place. For four months no torpedo boat has been ordered, so that there has been the delay of one-third of a year, the information before the House being that a torpedo boat could be built within a year. Yet not one has as yet been commenced.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Ten torpedo boats have been ordered.

MR. W. H. SMITH: No doubt they have now been ordered; but why has such delay occurred? I have only mentioned the matter for the purpose of this discussion; but I take it that five or six Scouts and 10 torpedo boats have just been ordered. The impression left on the House by the statements of Ministers in December last was that they were going to deal with this matter promptly, and that their promises would be forthwith fulfilled; but they have not done so. The engagement into which they entered with the House ought to have been carried out forthwith. I make no complaint of the extra iron-clads not having been commenced, for we know that the plans and specifications with regard to iron-clads require very careful consideration and take some time to prepare; but this class—namely, the belted cruisers and the torpedo boats, are all vessels, the types of which have been studied and decided upon, as has already been explained to the House, and I cannot see why there should have been any delay whatever in forthwith giving orders to the contractors to proceed with them as rapidly as possible. We were told by the Admiralty that one of the principal merits of their programme was that, by the nature of the steps they were taking, there would be no delay; that when once a contract was entered into it must go on. With regard to the torpedo rams, the belted cruisers, the vessels of the Scout class, and torpedo boats, they were to be built by contract, and would consequently be completed rapidly. I must say that the only interpretation which could be placed on language of this character was that the Government intended to proceed with them rapidly. And they obtained the confidence and approval of the House because the programme was one that could be carried out rapidly, and, therefore, one that would give satisfaction to the House and to the country. On another occasion we were told that the Government intended to ask for tenders from the shipbuilding firms as soon as possible, as every one of the ships, except the torpedoes, would take more than a year to build. Now, would the Peninsular and Oriental Company, or the Royal Mail Packet Company, or any other great shipping concern, after realizing the fact that it was necessary to make an addition to their fleet, consider that an engagement by their Chairman to build certain ships as soon as possible had been complied with by postponing the issue of a tender for four months? Yet that is exactly what Her Majesty's Government have done on the present occasion. After the statement made to the House on the 23rd of October the Government ought to have known they intended to do; and it was not unreasonable to expect that all the drawings and specifications and necessary arrangements would have been made before their statement on the 2nd of December. The day after that approval of the House had been obtained the tenders should have gone out with a request that contractors should state in what time they would be able to complete their contracts. If the Government really realized that these boats were necessary it would have been both economical and sound policy, as well as their duty, to have them completed for sea as soon as possible consistently with good work. I wish again to refer to the information we possess so far as the future is concerned. I should be out of Order if I were now to go into the Estimates for the coming year; but I may say that I notice that no provision is made for several of the ships that were undertaken to be put in hand on the 2nd of last December. I notice also that, as far as the House is aware, no provision is made in the Estimates for the coming year for three out of the 10 Scouts that were undertaken in December last to be completed in the course of the year. Instead of building 10 Scouts as rapidly as possible, it is now proposed to postpone the building of three of them until after next year. I hope that some explanation will be given to the House of this extraordinary departure from the solemn engagement made with the House, if not now, at all events in moving the Navy Estimates for the year.

MR. CARBUTT said, he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) had endeavoured to impress upon the Government the necessity of proceeding with the ships with more vigour, and more especially of going on with the torpedo boats, to which they were pledged. He was inclined to believe that in future wars torpedo boats would be quite as useful as line-of-battle ships. He desired, however, in the few words he proposed to say, to refer, not so much to shipbuilding, as to the deplorable condition in which they were in respect of guns. He might state, without fear of contradiction, that they had not one single breech-loading steel gun of large calibre at the present time which had been fired and tested. He, therefore, thought he was justified in saying that they were in a deplorable condition; and if the country were not in the remarkable condition in which it was placed at the present moment, he thought the House ought to insist upon the Government having some proper system upon which the manufacture of guns could be carried on. Recently there had been several instances in which guns had exploded, and they were still going on manufacturing guns, although they could never tell whether the guns, when turned out, would explode or not. Notwithstanding several inquiries no explanation had been forthcoming.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! There is no reference to guns in this Vote, and the hon. Gentleman is out of Order in discussing a subject which will come on for discussion upon a future occasion.

MR. CARBUTT said, he bowed to the ruling of the hon. Gentleman; but he must remind the hon. Gentleman that he had allowed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) to enter into the question of guns.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Member for Westminster was in Order in discussing the question of gun-mountings, because there is an item of £31,000 for gun-mountings.

MR. CARBUTT said, that as the Estimate covered a sum for gun-mountings, if not for the guns themselves, he would be in Order in calling attention to the Question.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is nothing whatever in the Vote which touches the question of guns, although there is an item relating to gun-mountings. The hon. Gentleman, therefore, must confine himself to the gun-mountings if he enters on the subject now.

MR. CARBUTT said, that, in deference to the ruling of the Chairman, he would confine himself to the question of gun-mountings. What he wished to call the attention of the Committee to was the system upon which all these manufactures were carried on. There was not a single responsible head to whom they could go and ask why such a thing had happened, or to give a reason for anything that occurred. If an hon. Member put a Question in the House he only got an evasive answer. He had repeatedly put Questions to the Government, and generally the answer given did not convey the slightest information. For instance, if the Government were asked how far a gun would fire they always gave the estimated, and not the real distance. His objection to the Manufacturing Department was that the gentleman who had charge of it knew nothing whatever of the subject. As a matter of fact, at the present time, the Department intrusted with the manufacture of gun-mountings, and things of that description, were presided over by an Artillery officer, who had no special knowledge of the subject. He had to depend upon some other officer, or foreman, or manager, under him; and he (Mr. Carbutt) maintained that, under such circumstances, the country could not be served with that efficiency which it was entitled to demand. If they were not at the end of the present Parliament—for he presumed that it would end this year—he, for one, would move for the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry into the whole subject. He thought it was a national disaster not to have a Manufacturing Department at the head of which was a man who knew something about guns and the material for making them. As the Chairman had already called him to Order, he did not know that he need go into the question further; but when it came up again on the Vote for guns on another Estimate, he would take the opportunity of returning to the subject, and entering into it more fully.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he quite agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the Committee that there was great inconvenience in discussing gun-mountings now, and having to wait for the Army Estimates before they were able to discuss the guns. He understood that the Army Supplementary Estimates would give an opportunity to the hon. Gentleman to raise the question of the guns on Monday; and he hoped that the hon. Gentleman would bring it forward with all the ability and knowledge he possessed. Various questions were involved in the present Vote, and first of all he would refer to the increase of Marines. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty informed the Committee that the Marines were 170 over the proper number, and that an additional sum of money was required in order to make provision for them. He did not see, however, any additional sum of money in the Estimates on the Table for the increase of Marines; and, considering the onerous duties now thrown upon the Corps, he had hoped to find in the Estimates submitted to Parliament some provision for the permanent increase of the Force. He was sorry that the Marines had not been further strengthened, for it was quite certain that the 12,400 men now voted were not sufficient for the purposes to which the Marines were continually applied in South Africa, in North Africa, and in various other parts of the world. They were seasoned and gallant soldiers, who were employed, not only in their own duties at home and on board ship, but in assisting the Army in the discharge of military duties abroad. He was quite certain that everyone who was acquainted with the nature of the duties performed by the Force would agree with him in opinion that it ought to be materially strengthened. He thought he understood his hon. Friend to say that the boys in training were to be increased by 920.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, his statement was that the boys were now overborne by 920.

SIR JOHN HAY presumed that the Vote about to be taken in the Navy Estimates proper would provide for the overborne boys; but he was not certain whether that was so or not, and he was afraid that the number was not quite sufficient for the purpose. A noble Lord in "another place," a Colleague of the present Civil Lord, was reported to have said that the reason why there were so few boys in training was that, although there was an insufficient number, it was in consequence of the deplorable loss of two of their training vessels which occurred some years ago. He was quite sure that it was impossible for the Admiralty to justify the small number of boys now in training by the fact that, four or five years ago, some two vessels were lost. There was an ample number of boys to be obtained, and this was not an adequate defence for the Admiralty for neglecting to increase the number, so that they might be able to keep up a proper supply of men for the Fleet. With regard to the £10,000 to be voted for stores for shipbuilding purposes, he really was astonished to see such a sum proposed by the Admiralty three or four months after their promise that the sum of £5,000,000 or upwards should be expended for increasing the efficiency of the Navy. It was said by the Secretary to the Admiralty, in the Autumn Session, that at least a sum of £5,000,000 was necessary for the proper increase of the Fleet; and he certainly understood the hon. Gentleman to intimate that immediate steps would be taken to apply that money, which the House was quite ready to grant, and to do all in the power of the Admiralty to increase the number of ships, both armour-clad and of all other descriptions. Until this moment they had had no information as to whether anything had been done to carry out that promise; and in the Return which had been laid upon the Table of the House, and delivered that morning, they found that the condition of the armour-clad ships was one that must be extremely unsatisfactory to the country. He found, from the Return which was before the House and in the hands of hon. Members, that the Collingwood was not to be completed at Portsmouth until this time next year. The time for the completion of the Rodney was "uncertain." The Impérieuse would not be finished until January, 1886; the War-spite was "uncertain;" and with regard to the ships laid down in 1882, the Bombay was not to be put out of the hands of the contractors until July, 1886, and they knew that it was probable that two years would elapse before she was efficient for the public service. The completion of the Camperdown, building at Portsmouth, was "uncertain," and the Hero, building at Pembroke, was also "uncertain." Those vessels were laid down in 1881 and 1882. The completion of the only ships laid in 1883—the Anson and the Hero—was also "uncertain." Those two ships represented ships laid down in 1882-3 and 1883-4. But the Return did not allude to the condition of ships which were in hand in the years 1880 and 1881; and it was worth while for the Committee to consider what chance there was of these ships being completed when it was found that other vessels laid down years before were not yet out of hand, as in the case of the Ajax, the Conqueror, the Edinburgh, and the Colossus. Among the new ships which were indicated in the Return, and which were promised in December at Portsmouth and Pembroke, were two new armour-clads whose type was not yet decided; and in regard to new armour-clads which were to have been built by contract, the statement was that they had not yet been ordered. Thus it would appear that the ships that were to have been built in the Royal Yards had not yet had their type decided; while others which were to have been built in private Yards had not yet been ordered. That was certainly not what the House of Commons expected when the promise of the Government was made in December last. It seemed to him that the country was being trifled with in regard to its naval affairs; and he must say that though he had the greatest respect for the gallant Admirals who sat at the Admiralty Board, some of whom were his own personal friends, yet he could not conceive how they could consent to sit at that Board, and allow the country to be trifled with, when they knew the defenceless state they were in both in regard to ships and guns, especially when compared with foreign nations. Other countries were increasing their Fleets with the greatest possible rapidity. He did not forget that the Admiralty, on the 11th of July last, put forward a statement, by the mouth of the First Lord of the Admiralty—that if they were granted £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 to-morrow, for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the Navy, the great difficulty would be how they would be able to spend the money. That statement was made on the 11th of July, and in October they awoke to the fact that a sum of £5,000,000 was absolutely necessary for our naval defences. In the month of December they promised to spend that sum; but, having made that announcement, they had not, up to the present moment, taken the slightest step to expend the money which Parliament was ready and willing to grant. They came down now with a Supplementary Estimate in advance of the ordinary Estimates of the year, which was totally inadequate for the purposes for which it was required. He had no wish to delay the Business of the Committee, and he thought that the £330,000 now asked for had better be granted, in order that the Admiralty might wake up again from the slumber into which they had fallen since December last. At the same time, he was bound to say that the country ought to know how the Admiralty had neglected the public interests, and if the money were voted care should be taken to see that it was properly spent.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR was understood to express an opinion that, whenever Supplementary Estimates were given to the House, the original Estimates should be combined with them, so that the total amount might be shown for each item. He hoped that the Secretary to the Treasury would see that done in the future. Then the mixing up of various items relating to different matters in one amount was very inconvenient. For instance, the sum required for the construction and completion of the railway in Egypt should have been kept entirely separate and distinct from every other item.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he was not surprised at the protest which the right hon. and gallant Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay) had made in regard to the delay in spending the money which was necessary to maintain the Fleet in a proper state of efficiency. It was quite evident that the country were now paying the cost of the desertion of General Gordon, for it was obvious that the money which would otherwise have been spent on the Navy was now required for other purposes, and that a good deal of it would be wanted for the Sudan Expedition. He had risen now for the purpose of calling the attention of the Secretary to the Admiralty to certain serious mishaps which had happened in Africa in regard to the working of the Gardner gun at the last serious battle which occurred in the Soudan.

Mr. CARBUTT wish to know whether the hon. Member was in Order, seeing that he (Mr. Carbutt) had been ruled out of Order for introducing the question of guns?

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the point he wished to raise had reference to gun-making, which he thought would come in under at least three heads of the present Votes. He might add that his remarks on the subject would be very brief.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member will be quite out of Order in referring to the Gardner gun.

Mr. GORST, on the point of Order, wished to say that his hon. Friend was complaining that a Vote of money would be entirely useless, and that the men and boys, who appeared on the Estimates, were being destroyed by ineffective guns.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see any connection between the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) and the point of Order. I still retain my opinion, that any discussion of the Gardner gun, on a Vote in which there is no mention of guns whatever, would be entirely out of Order.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT desired to call the attention of the Chairman to the fact that the Vote was to defray additional expenditure for certain Naval Services arising out of the military operations in Egypt; and Vote 10 referred to naval stores for building and repairs in connection with the Fleet. The gun he wished to call attention to was strictly a naval gun in charge of the Naval Brigade.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already ruled that the hon. Member is out of Order. This Vote has no connection whatever with guns.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, that hon. Gentlemen opposite had complained, as they generally did, that the Estimates were not sufficiently high. He had not risen with any object of that kind. Since his earliest childhood England had had no Navy; but, somehow or other, she seemed to have got on uncommonly well with the ships she had. When right hon. Gentlemen opposite were last in power they obtained a sum of £6,000,000 for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the Navy; and he believed that what they really did was to provide three ships. He was sorry that the Vote was taken upon two distinct items—namely, the Naval Services arising out of the military operations in Egypt, and the shipbuilding in Her Majesty's Dockyards. He thought it would have been a great deal more convenient if the two items had been kept separate. He must, however, accept the fact that they were not kept separate, but were included in the same Vote. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty had gone through all the different items; and he gathered from the hon. Gentleman's statement that the first and second were really rendered necessary in consequence of the Expedition to Egypt. As the military operations there had necessitated assistance from the Naval Brigade, and the employment of a number of officers and Marines, he would not contest that Vote; but he did contest the sum of £250,000 for conveying troops from this country to Egypt. He gathered from the Secretary to the Admiralty that that was exclusive of any charge for Indian troops; so that this sum of £250,000 was really a charge for the troops which had been conveyed from this country. Probably the Chairman would rule him out of Order if upon this Vote he were to raise the whole of the Egyptian Question; but he would assume that this country was perfectly right in going to Egypt; perfectly right in maintaining troops, and in maintaining order there. That was, the country was told, the reason why they were there; and they were further told that they had the right of adjusting the Southern Frontier of Egypt. But why was this country called upon to defend Egypt, or to adjust the Southern Frontier? The reason was that the Egyptians could not do it themselves. It was all very well for a country to say—"I cannot fight;" but when they asked other nations to come in and fight for them, the least they could do was to pay for the fighting. The House had had many Votes and discussions on this subject, and he had heard very different statements from the Treasury Bench; but he had never yet discovered, ever since these Votes were first brought forward, why in the name of goodness, admitting that they ought to go to Egypt, when the Egyptians themselves could not maintain their position, and govern their own country, the Egyptians ought not themselves to pay for it. They were told, it was true, that Egypt could not pay the money that was required. But, of course, that was sheer nonsense. So long as they were able to pay their Bonded Debt, and to pay extortionate interest to usurers who called themselves bondholders, so long would they find their Exchequer empty. What would have happened in Egypt if this country had not come forward? Where would the bondholders have been? They would have disappeared entirely.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The financial policy of Egypt is not a subject for discussion under this Vote. The hon. Member is introducing a matter which is not in any way involved in the present Vote.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the point he desired to raise was that this money ought not to be in the Estimates at all, because it ought to be charged upon the Egyptian Government. The issue he desired to discuss was, whether the Egyptians were not perfectly able to pay the money themselves. He had no wish to go into the whole of the Egyptian Question, and this was the sole point he wished to bring forward. As he thought the Egyptians were able to pay the money, and as we were not bound to pay it, he begged to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £250,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £80,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray additional Expenditure for certain Navy Services arising out of the Military Operations in Egypt, and connected with Shipbuilding in Her Majesty's Dockyards, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the Committee were very much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) for having called attention to the discreditable neglect on the part of Her Majesty's Government to fulfil their promises in regard to increasing the efficiency of the Navy. The way in which the Committee was treated by the Government was exemplified by the state of the Treasury Bench at that moment. There was not a single responsible Minister of the Crown upon it—an any rate, no Minister who had a right to advise the Crown in reference to this question. The same delay and the same neglect animated the Government in every respect. When the First Lord of the Admiralty was imperatively called upon to look into the state of the Fleet, he was sent by the Government upon a fruitless mission to Egypt. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, who always did his best, according to the power given to him, one or two questions in regard to these facts. He wanted to know what had been done in reference to the leading stokers of the Navy, the pensions to wives and orphans of seamen and Marines; and also what steps had been taken to satisfy the representations which had been made from different classes in the Dockyards as to the position they occupied and the treatment they received? More than two years ago the right hon. Gentleman who was now Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) promised that the grievances of different classes of Dockyard employees should be carefully looked into. In 1883, certain representations were made which, since then, in almost every instance, had been entirely neglected. The regulations which were recommended in regard to the examinations had been altogether set aside by the Government; and he understood that persons in the Dockyards, who had been compelled to pass a severe examination, found themselves superseded by persons who had passed no examination at all. He certainly felt himself unable to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). His regret was, not that it was a Vote of £330,000, but that the sum proposed was not a great deal larger. He hoped before the debate closed that the Secretary to the Admiralty would give a full explanation to his right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) and the right hon. and gallant Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay), and would enable the Committee to go away with the belief that, notwithstanding the absence of these lazy Cabinet Ministers—"Order!" The hon. Gentleman opposite who called him to Order was not the Chairman, and if he was out of Order he presumed that the Chairman would correct him. Notwithstanding the absence of all these—he would call them active—Cabinet Ministers, who had brought the Navy of the country into such an inefficient state, he hoped to be assured by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty that the interests of the Navy would be properly regarded in future by Her Majesty's Government.

MR. PULESTON said, he had listened with much pleasure to the excellent speech of the right hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), and he hoped that the Secretary to the Admiralty and other Members of the Government would give some explanation of the present extraordinary position of affairs in reference to the pledges they had given to the House last Autumn. He hoped that explanation would be given now, and that they would not have to wait for it until they reached the ordinary Navy Estimates of the year. It was a matter of congratulation that the Prime Minister himself was present at the early part of the discussion. The right hon. Gentleman must have been startled by the disclosures which had been made by the right hon. Member for Westminster. It must, indeed, have very much surprised the Prime Minister, as it surprised everybody else, to find that, after all that had been said by the Government last Autumn, after months had elapsed since the discussion which took place in the Autumn Session in December, when they had supposed that the Admiralty would come forward with plans ready cut and dried, and after the utter reversal by the authorities of the Admiralty of all the statements they had previously made in that House and in "another place" as to the requirements of the Navy—it must have surprised everyone to find that nothing had been done to give good effect to the pledges of Her Majesty's Ministers. They were told in the middle of last year by the First Lord of the Admiralty that their Navy was much superior to that of France, and superior, indeed, to any other Navy in the world, and that there was no sort of foundation for what he termed the exaggerated statements which had been made in regard to the inefficiency of the Navy. All of a sudden, under the influence of an agitation raised in the country when the country had become alive to the danger which existed in consequence of the weakness of the Navy, the same noble Lord at once reversed his statement, and acquiesced in the opinion that was forced upon him by the unanimous verdict of the country. They were then told in the House of Commons that a sum of £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 would have to be spent upon the Navy. They came there that night in order to consider the Supplementary Naval Estimates, and they naturally looked to those Supplementary Estimates to find the commencement of the important expenditure which had been promised. They were certainly unprepared for the condition of things which had been brought before them that night in the statement of the Secretary to the Admiralty. He had not the least idea of casting any imputation upon the hon. Gentleman, or of saying one word that was disrespectful of him. The hon. Gentleman could only do that which it was in his power to do; but certainly nothing had ever occurred in that House of a more startling character than the answer which the hon. Gentleman had given to the right hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith)—that actually nothing but a few tenders had been issued for Scouts. No tenders whatever appeared to have been issued either for belted cruisers or torpedo boats, and this was four months after the first promise in regard to the matter was given by Her Majesty's Government. Every hon. Member in that House, upon whatever side he sat, whether he liked the increased expenditure or not, whether he was of the same opinion as the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) or not, went away from that Committee in December last fully impressed with the one idea that some millions of money were to be carefully and wisely expended upon the Navy. It did not occur to any Member of the House that he would be allowed to come back again in the month of March and listen to such an answer as that which had been given by the Secretary to the Admiralty to the right hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith). He did not think there was a parallel for such a startling circumstance to be found in the history of the country. First there was the extraordinary reversal of policy on the part of the First Lord of the Admiralty from a condition of boasted safety, in which nothing ought to be done and nothing would be done, to a conviction forced upon him by the voice of the country that not only something, but a great deal, would have to be done. In the next place, they were led to believe that plans and arrangements would be laid down during the Recess with the view of expending some £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 upon the Navy; and now hon. Members came back to the House, three or four months after the promise was given, to be told that absolutely nothing had been done except an order issued for a few Scouts. He was sorry that the representations which had been made in the House of Commons had not only been treated with disrespect, but with apparently utter and supreme contempt. That would not matter very much if it were not for the condition of the country, which rendered it essential that this increased expenditure upon the Navy should be undertaken. Her Majesty's Government well knew that it was essential, and events which had since transpired showed the folly of delay. Let them only look at the state of Africa, and the feeling of insecurity in our Colonies. It was impossible to conceive anything more serious. He was sorry that the First Lord of the Admiralty had not a seat in that House. It was always a source of trouble to the House of Commons when the First Lord had a seat in "another place." It was impossible for the Admiralty to be represented by Gentlemen who possessed the entire respect of the House more than the Secretary to the Admiralty, and the Civil Lord, whom he was glad to congratulate on the first occasion of his appearance in his official capacity; but they knew that the power was vested in others and not in them, and he concurred with his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) that it was a scandal that none of the chief Ministers of the Crown should have been present on the Treasury Bench upon an occasion like this. He was glad to see that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had returned to his place. He had not risen now to discuss matters connected with the Dockyard expenditure. He thought he might fairly assume that all questions connected with that expenditure would come on in regular order in the discussion of the Navy Estimates proper; but he was entitled to have a full explanation of the conduct of the Board of Admiralty, who appeared to him to have done nothing but utterly neglect the duties imposed on them by Parliament, the responsibilities of which had been fully accepted by them.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he rose to a point of Order. He wished to know from the Chairman, if the hon. Gentleman would be good enough to inform him, when he would be in Order in referring to the jam of the Gardner gun? On what Vote could he raise that question?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman will be perfectly in Order in raising that question on the Vote which refers to the guns in the Army Estimates. I presume that those Estimates will not come on to-night. When the Army Estimates are proposed they will include a Vote for guns.

MR. SEXTON wished to ask a question with reference to the operations of the gunboat Wasp, which had been wrecked upon the West Coast of Ireland, and which, at the time of its last cruise, was in charge of a navigating officer who had only been recently appointed, and who was entirely unacquainted with the coast? It was said that the gunboat had been employed in assisting certain landlords in serving notices of eviction. He should like to know if the Secretary to the Admiralty approved of the use of Her Majesty's ships, and the services of the officers and seamen of the Royal Navy, in turning out of their homes a number of wretched persons who were obtaining a precarious livelihood on that part of the Irish Coast? He did not think that the people of England would approve of the employment of the seamen and officers of the Royal Navy for any such purpose; and he would ask upon what conditions the ships of Her Majesty were placed at the service of the landlords in Ireland for the purpose of serving civil processes? He would be glad to receive any indication of what the Government proposed to do in the matter. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had on a former occasion asked a Question in that House, to which the reply on the part of the Admiralty was that with regard to transports every invitation would be given to Irish shipowners to send in tenders. But he had read in an Irish newspaper of the 2nd instant a statement to the effect that the Admiralty having invited tenders for contracts, they were duly forwarded by the shipowners; but that none of the work had been allotted to them. He begged to assure the hon. Gentleman that unless the undertaking given to the hon. Member for the City of Cork was carried out—the Belfast firms, for instance, being as competent as any in the Kingdom—it would provoke considerable comment from Irish Members from the point of view that the promise given had turned out to be nothing more than a delusion.

MR. CAINE said, with regard to the question asked by the hon. Member for Sligo, that the shipowners of Ireland would have the right of tendering as a matter of course, and that the Admiralty accepted the lowest tender that was most suitable, no matter from what part of the country the tender might come. He would now refer for a moment or two to the complaints made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) with regard to vessels of the Scout class and torpedoes. It was only on the 2nd of December that the House sanctioned the building of those six Scouts; the plans were got out within a month after; and if the right hon. Gentleman remembered the difficulty there was in getting out plans, he believed he would say that to get the plans ready by the 2nd of January was very quick work indeed. The Admiralty having the wish that the orders should be spread throughout the country, 37 shipbuilders were invited to send in tenders for the construction of ships of the Scout class; it took over a month to get all the information required for tendering; a week was then given to the manufacturing firms to consider, and to get out their tenders. That was a short time; and a week for the Admiralty to consider the plans was, in his opinion, also a short time, and yet the 27th of February was the date on which the purchase of the ships of the Scout class was finally settled. He regarded this as one of the smartest things ever done by the constructive staff of the Admiralty. He did not think it would be unreasonable to give shipbuilders seven or eight weeks for sending in their plans. It should be remembered that in the case of an ordinary firm purchasing a merchant ship, three weeks was the period given to the builders to take out their quantities and send in estimates; and he did not think that the time named was too long with regard to vessels to be constructed for the Admiralty. With regard to the torpedo plans, a Committee had been appointed to conduct important experiments before coming to a decision, and the delay had been simply in consequence of the desire of the Board of Admiralty to secure the best type under the circumstances. With regard to gun-mountings, in consequence of new and better guns having been invented, new machinery had become necessary which would greatly facilitate the getting out of the gun-mountings in future. The delay that had taken place was attributable solely to the necessity of having new machinery.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he hoped it was not to be understood from the statement of the hon. Gentleman that the lowest tender was always accepted, because the Admiralty had never proceeded on that principle before. He had understood the hon. Gentleman to say that.

MR. CAINE: No; the lowest tender consistent with sound shipbuilding.

SIR JOHN HAY understood that the Black Prince had been at one time stated to be not worth repairing, and that the Bellerophon had been in process of repair for five years. As far as he was aware, there was no immediate prospect of those repairs being completed. He would ask the hon. Gentleman in what state of repairedness those ships might be.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, it was desirable to bring forward a ship to complete the number of ships which were now maintained in the Channel Fleet. As the right hon. and gallant Admiral would agree, it was extremely desirable to bring forward a ship well adapted to the training of seamen. A large number of their young seamen were sent to the Channel Fleet. The Black Prince was very suitable for that purpose, and she would be so employed.

SIR JOHN HAY: What is the condition of the Black Prince?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, she had been surveyed with regard to fitness, and it had been found that her boilers were in good condition.

SIR JOHN HAY asked why the Bellerophon had been so long under repair?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, he could only speak with regard to the Black Prince. He believed that the repairs of the Hellerophon would be completed very shortly. It was at one time thought that she might be used as a gunnery vessel; but he believed it was now intended that she should relieve one of the iron-clads stationed abroad.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he believed that the Hellerophon had been more or less under repair, in the Dockyard, for five years. She had gone to Devonport towards the close of 1879; she was intended first to be used as a gunnery vessel; but at last, he believed, there was some question as to whether the guns it was intended she should carry could be had or not. His right hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) had referred to the Black Prince and the Warrior. Now, the Black Prince had been put aside some years ago because of the expense that it was estimated would be incurred in repairing her. It was estimated that the cost of making her an efficient ship would be £120,000, for she would require to have new boilers and alterations made in her armour. He understood that the Admiralty had spent £40,000 upon her, which would make her less inefficient for 18 months only, at the end of which time the result would be that the whole of the money would be found to have been thrown away—that was to say, that the money would disappear in the time mentioned. Again, the Warrior was in almost the same condition. It was obvious that she could not remain serviceable for more than two years; and he doubted whether, in case of war, she could serve out another year, even with the money that had been spent on her. The result of this was that they had two ships on which they could not rely in case of war. It was impossible to rely on them; they were not capable of steaming at full speed even with the alterations which had been made, and the repairs which had been executed, and the whole of the money now being spent upon them would be practically wasted.

MR. ONSLOW said, that, observing a charge of £250,000 for conveyance of troops from this country to Egypt, he wished to know whether the ships employed were those paid for by the Indian Government, and in which troops were sent out to India? He was not aware that those hired ships were usually employed to bring troops home; on the contrary, he was inclined to the opinion that the Government of India used only the ordinary troop-ships for this purpose. Now, it seemed to him that if these troop-ships, which were paid for by the Government of India, were being used for the conveyance of troops to Egypt, the Indian Government would pay indirectly for the conveyance of those troops. If his view of the case were correct, he should like to know whether any extra expense would be placed upon the Indian Government in consequence of the troops leaving the country in the troop-ships referred to? He wished to make it clear that no expense was put upon India on account of this Vote.

MR. CAINE said, that the intention of the Government on the point raised by the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) was that no expense at all should fall upon India with regard to the Egyptian Expedition.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the answer of the hon. Gentleman the Civil Lord of the Admiralty was, in his opinion, most unsatisfactory. He was glad to find, although the hon. Gentleman contradicted himself twice in saying so, that the contracts referred to by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) were given out altogether irrespective of nationality; but he went on to say that the Government were bound to have due regard to the requirements of different parts of the country with respect to the disposal of these contracts.

MR. CAINE: I said it was the wish that every part of the country should have an opportunity of tendering for these ships.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had thought that the meaning of the hon. Gentleman was that, while due regard was to be had to economy, regard was also to be had to the dispersal of work in the parts of the country which most required it. But it appeared that he had misunderstood the hon. Gentleman. If no regard was to be had to nationality, it was a remarkable circumstance that none of the contracts had reached Irish hands. Now, that was a matter upon which Irish Members felt very strongly indeed. In Belfast, certainly, there were some of the most eminent and successful shipbuilders in the world, and they were selected to construct ships for which he believed was the most go-ahead and successful of American Lines—namely, the White Star Line. It seemed to him a most extraordinary thing that in Belfast, where work was so sadly wanted, and where encouragement was so much required, there should not be a single Government contract being executed. According to a statement in the public Press, it appeared that there was reason to believe that the work that was expected to go to a large Irish shipbuilding firm would go to the Clyde, although no official intimation had been given. If that were the case, he thought that Irish Members would be justified in contrasting the amount of work given to Glasgow in times of prosperity and withheld from Belfast in times of need. The hon. Gentleman had given the same answer with regard to transports as with regard to shipbuilding; he said that these were employed irrespective of nationality; and he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) repeated that, while it was said that nationality was not considered, Irish nationality was excluded in the matter of transports.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, he might assure the hon. Member who had just sat down that there was no question whatever of nationality in this matter. Anyone could obtain the terms of the contracts on application at the Admiralty. In case the Inspector sent on behalf of the Admiralty reported that the execution of the work could be fittingly done by them, the applicants were placed upon the list. Irish firms were treated in the same manner as English and Scotch firms. One Irish firm had been put on the list, and had been invited to tender for some of the ships that were to be constructed.

MR. SEXTON: What is the difference between the prices?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: I do not know what the figures were; I cannot give any information upon that subject.

MR. DAWSON complained that in the case of contracts with regard to other branches of the Service which were given to Irish firms, the firms in question had not been fairly treated. He knew of a firm that obtained a large supply of material, a short time ago, for the purpose of executing a contract; but although they were told, when they tendered, that it would be a very large contract, they only received a very small order. He hoped that Irish firms would in this matter have the same chance as English and Scotch firms.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Certainly. An Irish firm is now building a vessel for the Admiralty.

MR. DEASY said, that the vessel referred to was only a tank-ship, which would cost only a few thousand pounds, and he did not think they had much to thank the Government for on that account. The Dock Company applied to the Admiralty to be placed on the list, and the Admiralty sent down an Inspector, who went through the Dockyard, and expressed himself highly pleased with the plant there, and reported favourably to the effect that the Dock Company were capable of turning out a ship of 1,500 tons displacement. Improvements had taken place in the Docks since that time, and there was little doubt that they could turn out a ship of 2,000 tons. But the Government took credit for having given them this little ship to build; and, although they were placed on the list in April, it was not until the autumn that they were asked to tender, and it was not until the senior Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) threatened to make this matter unpleasant for the Government that they obtained even the order in question. Now, this Dock Company built steamers for some of the largest ship owners in the world; and he did not think that there was a shipbuilding firm in Ireland which could turn out a vessel in a more satisfactory manner than the Royal Victoria Dock Company. Of course, the Belfast firms could build larger ships; but he believed, for the size of the ships, that no shipyard in the Kingdom could give more satisfaction than Passage Dock. One very important question raised in the course of the debate, by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), had not been dealt with by hon. Gentlemen who spoke from the Government Bench. The hon. Member referred to the loss of a gun-boat conveying troops for the purpose of evicting some unfortunate persons in Ireland, and he thought the matter was one which demanded some explanation at the hands of the Admiralty. It seemed to him strange that the Government should employ the ships of the Navy

for the purpose of carrying out evictions, and he thought that the landlords should have been required to transport the troops from the mainland at their own expense, if troops were necessary, seeing that they had the police of the district at their command. Before the debate closed he trusted that some answer to his hon. Friend's inquiry would be forthcoming. They were told that there was no prejudice at the Admiralty against Irish firms; but he doubted that very much. He had himself asked the hon. Gentleman representing the Admiralty last autumn a Question with respect to the supply of meat for the Navy; but he could get no reply whatever on the subject. He had now to complain that, although the tenders of the Irish houses were at a lower price than those of the Danish firms, the contract was given to a Danish firm at a higher price. He had asked the hon. Gentleman to compare the prices of the Irish house with those of the Danish house, and he declined to do so. If the hon. Gentleman wished to show that there was no prejudice at the Admiralty against Irish firms, he thought he should have no hesitation in placing a statement of the prices on the Table of the House, so that they might see that no injustice had been done to Irish firms. When the Estimates were presented he should feel it his duty to go more fully into this matter. He had also asked another Question of the Secretary to the Admiralty that evening, and the answer to it had been very unsatisfactory. The hon. Member for Galway Mr. T. P. O'Connor had also made reference to it. He (Mr. Deasy) had asked whether any Irish firms had tendered for the supply of transport vessels to Her Majesty's Government; whether their tenders had been accepted; and whether those tenders were as low as those of English and Scotch firms? The hon. Gentleman had replied that the matter was still under investigation; and that when the Admiralty considered the tenders they would ignore nationality altogether, and that they would give a fair chance to those Irish firms who tendered. He trusted the Admiralty would bear that in mind when they came to decide on the matter; and he would point out that if the Government wished to convince Irish Members that there was no partiality in the case, and no prejudice against Irish firms, they need only place the prices on the Table of the House when the contracts were accepted. He hoped that before the ordinary Estimates came forward the Government would be able to assure them that they had accepted contracts for shipbuilding in Ireland. It was all very well for them to say that they accepted the lowest tender; but they asked nothing more from the Government than that they should give Irish firms fair play. They were entitled, however, to say that a due proportion of the money to be expended on shipbuilding should go to Ireland, and that Irish firms should be allowed to compete amongst themselves for work to the amount of that sum. It was not fair to place a shipbuilding yard which had never had an opportunity of constructing ships for the Government on the same footing as a shipbuilding yard which was in the habit of doing Government work. In common justice the Government ought to allocate a fair portion of the Navy Expenditure amongst Irish firms.

Mr. GILES wished to explain to the House what was the practice in commercial circles as to issuing tenders. He, of course, assumed that the Government had followed the usual practice. If work was to be given out, and the principal firms—say 10 in number—of the particular business—take shipbuilding, for instance—were selected, the persons making the selection would feel that any one of the firms would be quite competent to carry out their views, and, therefore, when the tenders were sent in, they would accept the lowest. If, however, the person having work to give out advertised publicly for tenders, he was by no means bound to take the lowest, because it very often happened that the lowest tender was received from a firm whom he knew to be incompetent. He (Mr. Giles) had had occasion to send out tenders for shipbuilding; and amongst the firms from whom he invited tenders were Messrs. Harland and Wolff, of Belfast. He should have been quite prepared to give them the work if their tender had been as low as that of others; but it was not. With all their eminence as shipbuilders, they could not work as cheaply as the people of the Clyde or the Wear, or even as cheaply as the people at Southampton. He only mentioned this that Irish Members might not have any feeling that Ireland had been lost sight of in matters of this kind. As he was upon his feet, he could not help alluding to the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston). He was very sorry, indeed, to hear from the hon. Member that the preparation of the designs for the new iron-clads were out of the hands of the designers within a month, and that the other preliminaries to the construction of the new war vessels were completed with equal rapidity. He could excuse the anxiety of the country to see their Navy considerably strengthened; but there was an old adage it was well to remember—namely, "Sometimes the most haste is the worst speed." He was persuaded that it was not always wise to hurry too much in the preparation of the designs of their fighting ships.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, he must ask permission of the Committee to refer, in the first place, to the question put by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) with reference to the employment of gun-boats on the coast of Ireland. With regard to the question of policy which was raised by the inquiry of the hon. Gentleman, he (Sir Thomas Brassey) had no opinion to offer; it was not competent for him to discuss that point. He might, however, explain to the hon. Member that it was the duty of the Admiralty to furnish vessels to the various Departments of Government when required for the execution of public duty. He was asked by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Deasy) with reference to the tenders for provisions. He feared he could not comply with the request of the hon. Gentleman by laying on the Table a Return showing the prices at which the various competing firms tendered for the supply of provisions for the Navy; indeed, it would be a breach of confidence to make a revelation of that nature. He assured hon. Members from Ireland that the Admiralty wished to deal with the country they represented in a spirit of fair play; and that if tenders should come from Ireland for the building of ships or the supply of provisions at prices which enabled the Admiralty to allocate contracts to that country, it would be a great satisfaction to the Admiralty to do so. He was glad to hear from his

hon. Friend the Member for Southampton (Mr. Giles) that he appreciated the necessity of giving great care and consideration to the designs of ships they were putting out to contract. He reminded the Committee that Lord Ravensworth's Committee, after most careful inquiry into this particular subject, recommended, in a very able Report to the Admiralty, that the greatest care and deliberation should be exercised in maturing the designs of ships before inviting tenders from private firms for the construction of the vessels. It was very properly urged by Lord Ravensworth's Committee that much public money could be saved by greater care being taken in the preparation of the designs. The Admiralty had been anxious to follow the recommendation of Lord Ravensworth's Committee on the first occasion which had arisen since the Report was made; and, therefore, special pains had been taken to make the designs for the cruisers, and the Scouts, and other vessels which they were putting out to contract, as perfect as possible before the commencement of the work. He was persuaded that, although there might be some delay in putting out the vessels to contract, by exercising due care and deliberation in completing the designs a gain in time and economy would in the end accrue. Having, he believed, answered all the questions which had been raised by hon. Members, he need not detain the Committee longer.

MR. DAWSON said, there was one other matter to which it was well attention should be called. In the matter of shipbuilding and the supply of provisions, the particulars of the requirements were well known to the English firms who tendered for the work; but it was not so in Ireland. By what means could Irish shipbuilders and merchants ascertain clearly and accurately what was to be tendered for? Were advertisements issued in the papers? In the absence of information on the point, it appeared to him that the contracts were so vast, and the amount of money involved so great, that Irish firms were not acquainted with all the details. Besides, to permit of many Irish firms tendering for the large and immense requirements of the Navy, it was necessary that a change should be effected in the banking system of Ireland. Supposing that a firm of Irish shipbuilders possessed the knowledge of the amount of money required to comply with some of the tenders, it was of the greatest importance to them that they should be able to go to one or other of the banking concerns in Ireland, and to say—“We want to tender for such and such contract, and on condition that we get the work we shall require so much money; will you advance it to us? You will, of course, be sure to obtain the repayment of the money, because you will practically have the security of Her Majesty's Government.” He should like to know what were the means of information at the command of Irish firms who were rather new to contracts of such magnitude? Were advertisements published in the newspapers?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, that when any shipbuilding was to be given out, it was the practice of the Department to communicate with all the firms on the Admiralty List.

MR. DAWSON inquired if the hon. Gentleman was acquainted with all the shipbuilding firms of Ireland who were competent to tender for Government work? If tenders were invited by advertisements, probably a firm of whom the hon. Gentleman was not aware might see their way to make an offer. What he desired to know was, how Irish firms were to enter into the competition; how they were to become possessed of knowledge of the conditions with which they were to comply?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, that if any of the Irish shipbuilders would communicate with the Admiralty, Inspectors would be sent to their yards to see if they were capable of doing Government work; and if they were found to be capable, he would take care they were placed on the Admiralty List.

MR. BIGGAR said, that in reference to the claim set up to have a portion of the Admiralty work allocated to Ireland, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey) had said it would be a breach of trust to disclose the prices given for the various articles supplied to the Navy. He (Mr. Biggar) was not acquainted with shipbuilding; but, as an old trader, he was persuaded that if the Government wished to get the best and, indeed, proper value for their money, they must not stick at disclosing the contract prices. It must be well known to all persons that there was great variation in the quality of work done by shipbuilders, just as there was a great difference in the quality of the other articles supplied to the Navy. It was, therefore, of the greatest importance in the interest of the public, as represented by the Admiralty, that prices at which articles were supplied should be known. Under the present secret system, it was quite possible for shipbuilders to get a sum from the Admiralty altogether disproportionate with the class of work done. Such a state of things, however, would soon cease if it were possible for criticism to appear in the newspapers and through the voices of Members of Parliament with regard to the mismanagement of the Department in this particular. He knew that Harland and Wolff, of Belfast, were eminently competent to do the work of the Admiralty, for they were as good shipbuilders as it was possible to find. Harland and Wolff might ask higher prices than some other shipbuilders; but, at the same time, they did immensely better work, and therefore it was to the interest of the public that the Admiralty should give the preference to that firm. The same principle applied to all the other articles supplied to the Navy. Take the case of pressed beef. No doubt, the American pressed beef could be obtained at a cheaper rate; but, as regarded quality, it was not to be compared with the Irish beef. Instead of perpetuating the antiquated and stupid system of keeping the prices paid secret, the Admiralty ought in every case to publish them. If people then found that higher prices were being paid for particular articles than those at which they could afford to supply, they would, no doubt, tender. It stood to reason that the result of disclosing the prices would be that a much larger number of people would enter the competition. The great temptation in regard to contracting was the hope of large profit. He remembered that at the time of the American War the Government had to give for pressed beef a far higher price than the trade value of the article. The occasion was an emergency, and the supply was wanted in a hurry. The number of people who, up to that time, had been tendering for this particular article had been very limited, and they had been paid such extravagant prices, and had made such enormous profits, that others rushed in and contracted at prices even lower than they could afford to take. The result was that the Government recouped themselves for all the extravagant prices they had previously paid. The observance of secrecy led to no good whatever, and therefore he hoped that, after consultation with the Admiralty Authorities, the hon. Gentleman (Sir Thomas Brassey) would be able to see his way to introduce an entirely different system.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he could say, of his own knowledge, that the system of secrecy with regard to Government contracts was attended with very great danger of corruption, if not peculation. He recollected a case which came under his observance some years ago. A contractor had sent in to a large Public Department tenders at a certain price for an article which was not very extensively used. He tendered at such a figure as involved loss. He tendered three times over, and each time his tender was disregarded; and another contractor, whom he knew personally, informed him that his tender, which was something like 50 per cent higher, had been accepted. Well, now, the contractor whose tender was disregarded was a sensible man, and, instead of troubling himself to still further lower his price, met an official of the Department, and explained to him his grievance. "Oh," said the official, "if you will dine with me to-morrow, I will introduce you to Mr. So-and-so." The contractor accepted the invitation; and the consequence was, that the next time he tendered, his tender was accepted, and for aught he (Mr. A. O'Connor) knew, the tender of the gentleman had been accepted by the Department ever since. Such was one of the results of the secrecy observed in regard to Government contracts. So much for the contract system. Now, it had been said that the Admiralty was perfectly free from all prejudice as regarded Ireland. He wished he could think so. Five years ago he was at some trouble to point out to the House the practical "Boycotting" which Ireland experienced at the hands of the Admiralty. Every single thing which the Admiralty could do to deprive Ireland of a fair share in the funds which the Admiralty had to distribute, was done. If there was any possibility of curtailing expenditure in Ireland, it was taken advantage of; no opportunity was seized of making something like a fair distribution of the National Expenditure. Let them take the case of the Dockyards, which was only one branch of the Services included in this Supplementary Estimate. Under that head there was always something like £1,750,000 expended at home and abroad; at home about £1,600,000 was expended. One Dockyard in England received £330,000; another got £270,000; and another got £200,000. What did Ireland get? The large sum of £900, not 1-1,600th part of the total sum expended. If the Committee turned to the Victualling Vote, they would find a similar state of things—Ireland obtained a sum equal to 1-72nd part of the whole Vote. These were the most important Votes taken by the Admiralty, and this was the way in which Ireland was treated. When he referred five years ago to this system, it was not contested by the then Secretary to the Admiralty and the present Postmaster General (Mr. Shaw Lefevre). All the right hon. Gentleman said was—"Oh, we are doing something at Haulbowline, and we intend to spend £25,000 a-year there." As a matter of fact, the Admiralty had not spent that amount of money. The Government had not spent as much money at Haulbowline as they said they intended to spend, and the reason assigned was that they were obliged to employ convict labour on that kind of work, and Ireland was so free from crime that they could not get enough convicts. Now that the convicts had been removed from Haulbowline, the difficulty attending the mixing of free and convict labour had been removed. All the contracts came to England; all the money for victualling was expended in England; all the money for Admiralty services of every kind and description was spent in England and for the benefit of England. In Ireland there was spent nothing except £193 under one Vote, and a somewhat similar sum under another Vote. There had been ample opportunities of testing the sincerity of the Government in this respect; and, after the experience he had had in connection with the distribution of Naval Expenditure, he should be very chary of accepting any assurances from the Government.

Mr. Bigger

Mr. P. J. POWER said, he was glad to hear the Representative of Her Majesty's Government who had charge of these Votes say that the Admiralty were actuated by feelings of fair play towards Ireland. He was sure that personally the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey) was actuated by no other feeling. At the same time, he thought that the figures which his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) had given showed that in their dealings towards Ireland, the Admiralty did not act up to their professions. According to the statement of his hon. Friend, who was regarded as an authority upon such subjects, Ireland received a mere bagatelle in proportion to the enormous sums expended on Dockyards in other parts of the United Kingdom. No one could contend that the people of Ireland did not contribute their fair share of taxation; indeed, most people acknowledged that now-a-days the taxation paid by the Irish people was altogether out of proportion to their means—altogether out of proportion to what the richer parts of England paid. He, therefore, thought that a certain amount of restitution was due to the people of Ireland. He spoke on this subject with some difficulty, because he knew he addressed a Government who believed implicitly in the principles of Free Trade. He was, however, prompted to say that, inasmuch as the English Government had in times past destroyed the industries of Ireland, it was only due to the people that they should receive something now by way of restitution. According to an authority—Mr. Froude—who could not be said to be particularly favourable to Ireland, England had destroyed Irish industries and—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is now travelling beyond the limits of the Question. It is not competent for him to discuss the general policy of the Government towards Ireland when the items of certain Supplementary Votes are under consideration.

Mr. P. J. POWER said, he had no doubt strayed away from the Question, owing to the fact that he was not yet conversant with the Rules of Debate. This, however, was a time when Her Majesty's Government could mend their ways by giving to Ireland a little more of the money the Irish people paid to them in the form of taxation. He did not know whether he should be out of Order in alluding to the question of chaplains. If so, he should like to ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey) a question concerning the employment of chaplains. Within the last few days he had received letters from boys in his own part of Ireland desiring that he should give them notes of recommendation with which to endeavour to enter the Navy. Before complying with the desire of his correspondents, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman what provisions were made in the Navy for providing chaplains for Catholic boys?

Mr. KENNY said, that as he observed that one of the items of the Vote was for the conveyance of troops, he would like to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Caine) if he would explain to the Committee the circumstances under which the Poonah was recently disabled?

Mr. DEASY said, he thought the Irish Members were entitled to an answer to the statements made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor). With regard to the works at Haulbowline, he might say that he had visited them recently, and he was astonished to find that they were in a more advanced state than he expected. At the same time, he was bound to say that, at the present rate of progress, it would be a long time still before the works would be in proper working order. The floating dock would be finished shortly, and the dry dock could soon be completed; in fact, if the Government exerted themselves, they could within six or eight months launch a vessel from the dry dock. Instead, however, of employing a large number of men on the work, they employed a very limited number. He believed that not more than 400 men were employed at the present time, and the weekly sum paid to these men did not exceed £350. It would, of course, be of great consequence to the people of Queenstown, and indeed to the people of Ireland generally, if the Government were to lay down a vessel in the dry dock immediately. But, owing to the fact that no provision whatever had been made for the accommodation, in Haulbowline Island, of the workmen, it would be useless to commence work for some time to come. He would like to know from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey) if any steps had been taken for the erection of the necessary buildings on the Island when the docks were completed? It would be a very unfortunate thing if, after expending £500,000 on this work, the docks should lie idle for three or four years more, simply because there was no accommodation for workmen on the Island, and no plant set up for the building or repairing of ships. Could the Government give the Committee any idea as to the time in which the docks would be completed; and would they state further if they intended to take steps to have houses and all the necessary accommodation for workmen, and the appliances required by those workmen for the carrying on of their trade, provided by the time of the completion of the docks? He had heard it was intended that the docks should be finished in the course of three years.

MR. CAINE said, that some of the subjects alluded to by hon. Members did not rightly come under the present Vote. If they looked at the Estimates relating to the Dockyards they would see that the sum of £82,000 had been expended altogether, and that of that amount Ireland had received £36,000. That had been, or was going to be, spent at Haulbowline. With regard to the transport Poonah, she had been bringing troops home in the regular course, and was not one of those transports included within this Supplementary Vote. The accident which had happened to her was entirely unforeseen, and the Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company, to whom she belonged, could not be held responsible for what had occurred; much less could any blame be attached to the Admiralty.

MR. BIGGAR said, he should like to ask the hon. Gentleman who represented the Admiralty, whether or not he was disposed to make a reply to the point raised by himself (Mr. Biggar) and another hon. Member as to the desirability of publishing the prices paid by the Government for provisions, and as to the desirability of giving the public some idea of the contracts entered into for supplying necessaries to the Navy? This appeared to him to be a matter of great importance, and one deserving the attention of the Government and the Committee, seeing that the present practice was perfectly contrary to the public interest. Some reply should be given by one or other of the hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench representing the Admiralty. What argument was there to be urged in favour of the present system?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, that, in reply to the hon. Member, he was obliged to state that, under the present arrangement, to publish the details asked for would be a breach of confidence on the part of the Government, to which exception might properly be taken by the firms supplying the Admiralty. He should be happy to comply with the suggestion which had come from hon. Gentlemen opposite and consult with the officers responsible for the administration of the Department in relation to contracts; and if more publicity could be given to these transactions without a breach of confidence, he should be happy to consider what steps the Government could take in the matter.

MR. DEASY said, the hon. Gentleman had not answered one of the questions put to him—namely, that with regard to the works in progress at Haulbowline Docks. Had provision been made for the erection of houses at Haulbowline Island for the workmen to be employed when the docks were finished?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, the Admiralty could not at present pledge themselves as to the decision to which they would arrive at with regard to the completion of buildings and the equipment of the buildings at Haulbowline. All the Government could say for themselves was that they had added considerably to the annual expenditure for the prosecution of the works at Haulbowline. Free labour had been substituted for convict labour, and 400 persons were now employed. When the Navy Estimates for the year were proposed, he should probably be able to give fuller information upon this matter.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Caine), in reply to an observation he (Mr. A. Connor) had made some time ago—and a reply which he was sorry to say he had not heard—had stated that the Government were spending some £36,000 a-year out of £82,000 in Ireland for Government purposes, without including shipbuilding. This amount, he believed, was spent on Dockyards. Probably the hon. Member would have the Committee and the country to believe that that represented something like the ratio of expenditure in Ireland compared with that in Great Britain.

Mr. CAINE: Only as far as one matter is concerned—namely, Dockyards.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Very well. If the hon. Gentleman would allow him, he would state to the Committee the facts with regard to the expenditure under Dockyard Vote, No. 6.

Mr. CAINE said, that his statement had reference to the expenditure under Vote 11, on page 19 of the Estimates. He had pointed out that the Government were spending £36,000 on Dockyards in Ireland out of a total sum of £82,000.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that, no doubt, the hon. Gentleman's statement was correct as to 1881-5 in regard to this particular Vote. This was a year in which the Vote for England was exceptionally low, and the Vote for Ireland exceptionally high; but it was only one out of a large number of Votes. He

Mr. A. O'Connor had not been complaining of this item at all. What he had complained of was that, under Vote 6, out of a total expenditure of £1,500,000 Ireland obtained only £965. There was a very great difference in proportion between £965 and £1,500,000, and £36,000 and £82,000. Well, he came to the next Vote for the Victualling Service at home. Here, again, out of a total of £72,000 Ireland only received £1,000. It was altogether misleading for the hon. Gentleman to take one particular item out of one particular Vote which happened this year to be more than usually favourable for his purpose. It was unfair for the hon. Member to bring forward these two items to endeavour to lead the Committee to believe that they represented something like the proportion spent on the Navy in Ireland as compared with the expenditure in England. He Mr. A. O'Connor still complained that the expenditure on the Navy in Ireland was something like 1-400th part of what was expended in England. If the hon. Gentleman would take the trouble to ascertain, by means of the furnished Returns, what the Admiralty had done year after year, he would see that the sum voted for expenditure in England was nearly always exceeded, and that it was never, or hardly ever—not once in 50 times—exceeded in Ireland. He argued, therefore, that the conduct of the Admiralty, so far as Ireland was concerned, was exceedingly unfair. He did not see how the Government could expect to find Irish Members consenting to a Vote of this kind, until they got a trustworthy assurance that, in the future, something like fairness would be adopted in regard to this Vote.

Mr. PULESTON said, he was sorry to interpose between the Committee and the division which hon. Members wished to take; but he desired to urge for an answer on the subject of the tenders asked for for the construction of ships. He took it that not many would support the hon. Member who had moved the reduction of the Vote; but he should like to know whether or not they were to have an explicit statement from the Admiralty as to what was to be done under the practical Resolution adopted last autumn, before the Vote was taken that evening? If such a statement were not made that night, when would it be made? As he had said, he was sorry to interpose; but he was under the impression, and others besides himself in the House were under the impression, that the Budget had something to do with this reticence on the part of the Government. He was glad to see the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his place. If there was to be a Vote of Credit, would the extra amount to be spent on the Navy come on later, so as to be put into the account of another year?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, the information the hon. Member asked for had been laid before the Committee when the Navy Estimates were moved.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 22; Noes 66: Majority 44.—(Div. List, No. 41.)

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. PARNELL said, he desired to say a few words upon the shipbuilding contracts, or rather the contracts which had been given in Ireland for the construction of ships of the Royal Navy. He was glad to say, and he wished to express his obligations to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey), that in reference to a particular vessel—namely, the tank vessel—which was under consideration when this subject was last before the House, a Cork firm of shipbuilders had been successful in obtaining the contract. But he had since learnt that this tank vessel was the only ship the building of which had been given to any shipbuilder in Ireland. Now, the cost of building this vessel was not excessive; it only amounted to a sum of about £8,000. He congratulated the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty upon having seen his way to give that contract to the Passage Docks Company; but, at the same time, he was bound to take this opportunity of saying that he considered the total result as regarded the number of contracts which had been given most unsatisfactory so far as Ireland was concerned. The particular firm in Ireland to which he referred had never throughout its existence received any contract until now from the Admiralty for the building of a vessel. It had done some odd jobs in the nature of repairs and so forth, but it had never before received a contract for the building of a complete vessel; and the position of Ireland with regard to the proportion of work which was given out to shipbuilding firms was most unfavourable. Now, he did not know from what cause this might arise—whether it was that the Irish firms had been lost sight of or not by the Admiralty, that they were not invited so often as the English and Scotch firms to tender for the construction of vessels; nor did he know whether it arose, on the other hand, from some favouritism on the part of those who had the acceptance of the tenders—but this he did know, that the result was that Ireland did not get her fair proportion, or anything like her fair proportion, of the Admiralty work. While Ireland contributed her full, and more than her full, proportion to the Imperial Exchequer for work of this kind, she got little or nothing in return. He was sure it must strike the Committee, and the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty, that the sum of £8,000 spent on building ships in Ireland was not a fair proportion to be spent in that country of the millions which had been voted for this purpose; and he would ask the hon. Member whether some different system to that which at present obtained could not be adopted? The Belfast shipbuilders were noted amongst the famous shipbuilders of the world. It was known that Messrs. Harland and Wolff were the first to invent the new system by which the length of vessels was very greatly increased in proportion to their width, and that, in consequence of this invention, America had been brought several days nearer this country. How was it, then, that Messrs. Harland and Wolff had not yet obtained any contract from the Admiralty connected with the large sum of money which had been already voted for increased shipbuilding, and which they were asked to supplement that night? When Irish Members applied to Her Majesty's Government to see the tenders they were told that they could not be produced. Why could not the Admiralty, following the rule which was adopted by all private firms when contracts were given out, and when they invited contracts, publish all the tenders, whether successful or unsuccessful? Such a plan might conduce to the lowering of prices in the future. Those who had tendered in the past and been unsuccessful, would see how and why they had been unsuccessful; they would be encouraged by the knowledge of the difference there was between them and the successful competitors to out in at a still lower price in the future. All Railway Companies, all contractors, and all private firms who had occasion to call for tenders for particular work, were in the habit of publishing the replies they received to their request for tenders; and if in the commercial and manufacturing and building world the adoption of such a custom had been found of advantage, why should it not be found of advantage in relation to the Admiralty also? Why should not the House have before it a list of the replies and of the tenders received with reference to the building of particular ships? Why should not these be laid on the Table of the House, so that hon. Members might be absolutely sure that fair play had been observed, and so that the unsuccessful competitors might be in a position to make still lower tenders hereafter, to the great advantage of the Public Service, and also to the advantage of the public purse? He supposed he should be told that in the present case it was a case of accepting the lowest tenders. Well, if it was a question of accepting the lowest tenders, there surely could be no objection to laying the highest as well as the lowest upon the Table of the House, so that hon. Members might see exactly how matters stood, or that they might be able to ascertain how far short Irish contractors were from the English standard, and that it might be possible for the Irish shipbuilders to correct their prices for the future, and to enter successfully into competition with the Tyne, the Clyde, and other great shipbuilding centres in England and Scotland. He did not know what the present rules at the Admiralty were in this matter, and how far they might be precluded by the conditions under which the tenders were asked for from publishing these Returns; but it would be perfectly possible for them to change their rule for the future, and to give the House all the information required. Of course, the breach of confidence that the hon. Gentleman had pleaded that night could not prevail in the future. He (Mr. Parnell) wished to take this opportunity of bearing testimony—testimony which he was enabled to bear in consequence of having paid personal visit to the works—to the great facilities which could be obtained for the construction of war vessels in the yards of the Passage Docks Company. This Company was capable of constructing ships of a very large class indeed. Their machinery was admirably adapted for the work; and he earnestly hoped that the result of the attention which had been directed to this matter would be that in the future they would not see the magnificent shipbuilding establishments in Cork and Belfast entirely neglected by the Admiralty as they had been in the past, but that they would be given a fair share of the Imperial Expenditure on ships of war.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, the hon. Member who had just sat down had not been present during the somewhat lengthy discussion which had taken place upon these subjects. If he had been present he would have heard the assurance he Sir Thomas Brassey had endeavoured to give to hon. Members from Ireland. The firms he had recommended were well known to the Admiralty, who shared the hon. Member's high opinion of their capabilities. They had been invited to tender for the more important ships which were about to be put out to contract, and for his own part he should be glad to hear that they had been successful.

MR. DEASY wished to put a question to the hon. Gentleman with regard to the departure of the troops from Ireland for the Colonies and elsewhere. They embarked at Queenstown, but not on their way directly to their destination. They were taken to England, whence they were provisioned and sent on their journey, and the result was that the people of Cork, who might naturally have expected to be called upon to supply provisions for the outward voyage, had nothing to do with these contracts. This seemed to him a monstrous thing. Of course, the system he complained of had to do with the Army, and did not properly come under the Navy Estimates. He would be out of Order in going into it at any length, and also in referring to an evil for which he thought a remedy should be found—namely, the co-operative system, whereby officers prevented their men from making any purchases outside the barracks. This latter subject did not come under the Vote at all, and he would not further deal with it. All he would ask at the present moment was what, in future, the Government intended to do with regard to embarking troops for service abroad, and the victualling of such troops?

MR. CAINE replied, that the business of the Admiralty was to charter ships to the War Office, and they had nothing to do with the embarkation of the men, or of leave or permission given to the men to go on shore.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA wished to say a word or two, having had charge of a deputation which had waited upon His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces, on a subject which had an important bearing on this question. His Royal Highness had assured the deputation that in future, so far as possible, troops would be embarked direct from Cork or Queenstown, and not brought over to England in the first instance. He (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) had no doubt that His Royal Highness intended to carry out that pledge faithfully.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICES (SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1884-5).

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(2.) £3,000, Police—Counties and Boroughs, Great Britain.

(3.) £4,700, Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great Britain.

MR. SEXTON said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury a question connected with this subject. He found, from the last Report of the Inspector General of Reformatory and Industrial Schools in Ireland, certain allowances made in respect of children who had left reformatories in Great Britain. The Inspector General mentioned an allowance of 2s. per week for the first 13 weeks, and 1s. per week for the next 26 weeks, after the liberation of the young persons from the reformatories—money laid out in the interest of the children to facilitate their being placed out in workshops.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman will observe that this is a Vote for the Reformatory and Industrial Schools of Great Britain.

MR. SEXTON said, he was quite aware of that, and he had no intention whatever of debating the propriety of applying this rule to Ireland. He simply mentioned the subject in order that the Committee might receive information to prepare them for the discussion which might take place on the ordinary Estimates. In that view he would ask whether the grant of this money to children released from reformatories in Great Britain had been attended with salutary results?

MR. HIBBERT said, he had no doubt that the granting of this money for the benefit of children after their release from reformatories had been beneficial. He was not aware that no similar law applied to Ireland. He would suggest to the hon. Member that it would be more convenient to raise the question of so applying it in connection with the Bill to carry out the recommendations of the Reformatory and Industrial Schools Commission, which was in course of preparation. Upon that Bill ample opportunity would be afforded for ventilating this question as it affected Ireland, because he believed the measure would apply to all parts of the United Kingdom.

MR. SEXTON said, he thanked the hon. Gentleman for his suggestion, which was a very practical one; and he hoped that when they came to take the debate on the introduction of the Bill, the hon. Gentleman would be able to give them the information now asked for.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £96, Court of Bankruptcy, Ireland.

MR. BIGGAR said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, or the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, whether they had any cause to find fault, generally speaking, with the administration of the Bankruptcy Law in Ireland? It appeared to him (Mr. Biggar), so far as he was able to form an opinion on the subject, that it was very doubtful whether the business of the Irish Bankruptcy Court was carried on economically, or in a satisfactory manner or not. He did not wish to debate the question as to whether or not it was desirable to take the greater part of the labour and business of the present Bankruptcy Court in Dublin from the parties who now performed the duties in that place, and intrust the Bankruptcy jurisdiction to Courts established in other parts of the country; but he would like to know whether the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland had any cause to find fault with the way in which the Bankruptcy Law had been heretofore administered, and whether or not he saw any substantial reason for the extension of the expenses and the increasing of the staff of the Court in Dublin? The total amount of the Vote was only £10,000; and so far as he could form an opinion upon the matter, it seemed that the business must be extremely limited—so small was the sum, and so small must the amount of business be, that he doubted very much whether there could be any sound excuse for extending the staff and increasing the expenses.

MR. KENNY said, before the hon. and learned Gentleman answered, he wished to put a question to the Secretary to the Treasury. There were so many items in these Estimates for compensation and for making good losses incurred, either individually or owing to some fresh fault attached to the Irish Government, that it was well to seek some explanation when the Vote was before the Committee. He saw in connection with the Court of Bankruptcy an item called "An excess of £205 damages caused by loss in the matter of the case of A. M. Richardson," and he wished to know why the officers should be allowed to safeguard themselves in the case of serious mistakes of this kind at the public expense? He (Mr. Kenny) should be obliged if the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury could explain how this item of £205 had come to be included in this Supplementary Estimate.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he should be far from saying that the Bankruptcy Court of Dublin was not a valuable one. His opinion was that the Bankruptcy Law was very well administered in Ireland, and that its administration would contrast very favourably with that of the English Bankruptcy Law. But, at the same time, there had been great demands from Belfast, Cork, and Limerick, for local Bankruptcy Courts, and it had been considered that it would be an advantage to start local Courts in order to bring the transaction of Bankruptcy business home to the doors of the suitors. This subject could be discussed when the Local Bankruptcy Bill—in the passing of which the assistance of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) would no doubt be given to the promoters—was before the House.

Mr. BIGGAR wished to know how many cases were tried daily in the Dublin Bankruptcy Court? Was it not a fact that the business of the Court did not average more than two or three cases a-week, and was it not a fact that the Court was idle half its time?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, there was a Return before the House from which the hon. Gentleman would see the number of bankruptcy cases which had occurred in Dublin, Belfast, and Limerick. The Return was laid on the Table on the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Findlater).

Mr. SEXTON said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland appeared to be very shy of approaching the case of A. M. Richardson. Who was A. M. Richardson—where was he, and what were these damages?

Mr. HIBBERT pointed out that similar sums had been paid in previous years. In the matter of Mr. Richardson, although he knew nothing about that particular case, the sum was put down in the Estimates with the object of bringing it under the notice of the House. Previously, these sums had been paid without any notice of them being laid before the House.

Mr. WARTON understood that the official assignees had a claim to be recouped for their costs and their expenses; but it appeared to him that this was not a case of costs or expenses, but one of damages. It was possible that these official assignees might have exceeded their duty and have been guilty of some negligence, and that somebody had been sharp enough to bring an action against them, and had secured damages. He wanted to know if this was a case in which persons had obtained damages through the incapacity or negligence of the official assignees? He did not know if it was so; but it might happen that the official assignees had done wrong in something.

Mr. HIBBERT said, the official assignees might have exceeded their duty, and in that case the Judge of the Bankruptcy Court would give damages in respect of their having done so. He did not know if that was so, but that might possibly be the explanation.

Mr. KENNY asked whether the Solicitor General for Ireland could not give some information upon the subject? The Act of 1874 was passed in order to prevent possible frauds of this kind in Ireland.

Mr. HIBBERT contended that it was for the protection of the public that the matter was brought before Parliament.

Mr. SMALL said, he understood the official assignees were not paid by salaries, but by fees; and he should like to be informed how much these gentlemen received last year?

Mr. HIBBERT said, he could not possibly have a knowledge of all these points. He knew very little of the details of the question as far as Ireland was concerned, and did not know what those gentlemen received.

Mr. SMALL asked what Mr. Richardson received last year?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) stated that no sufficiently exhaustive Return had been issued to show what these sums were, and it was impossible for him to carry all these small items in his mind.

Mr. KENNY complained that the Committee was asked to vote this sum of money, but the two hon. Gentlemen who were responsible for it were unable to give them any satisfactory explanation as to what it was for.

Mr. HIBBERT said, he would be glad to make inquiries and furnish the hon. Member with the information.

Mr. BIGGAR believed that if the Committee had the true explanation of this Vote they would find that there was something which would enable them to form a definite opinion as to whether this money ought to be granted or not.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £2,050, Prisons, Ireland.

Mr. DEASY said, he desired to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland one or two questions in regard to this Vote. It would be within the recollection of the hon. and learned Gentleman that he had been good enough last year to bring in a Bill to assimilate the Law of Ireland to that of England, upon its having been discovered that the two Acts of 1877 were not exactly similar, although Parliament at the time had been led to believe they were. The Irish counties went on paying about £15,000 a-year for the conveyance of prisoners since the passing of the present Prisons Act. This Act vested the control of prisons in the hands of the Government. Up to its passing the cost of transferring prisoners, tried and untried, was borne by the counties where those prisoners were arrested; and it was not discovered until three years after that in England the counties were not liable for this cost, and that it should be paid out of moneys voted by Parliament. A gentleman in the county of Surrey protested against the charge as illegal, and brought the case before the Court of Queen's Bench. On appeal, the matter was brought before the House of Lords, and it was then decided that the Government was responsible for this money themselves, and that the amount was illegally levied in England. Accordingly, the Prime Minister brought in a Bill to refund to the English counties all the money they had thus illegally paid up to the year 1882, amounting to £100,000. But when the Irish Members made an application to have a similar course pursued in regard to Ireland, it was discovered that there was something dissimilar in the Irish Act to the wording of the English Act, and that the Irish counties were legally liable to pay these enormous sums. In 1882, however, the Cork Grand Jury refused to pay the charge, and the case was laid before the Judge of Assize, Mr. Justice Barry, who was on the Bench at the time. He did not give his decision outright, but had the matter argued before the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin. After hearing the arguments, the Court of Queen's Bench decided that all the charge, with the exception of a very small portion, was a legal charge on the county. This small sum, which was not so chargeable, was a matter of only £200 a-year, and although the Grand Juries ought to have had that small sum returned to them, they were unable to get it. If there were any national representation on the Irish Grand Juries, no doubt the matter would have been pressed; but the Grand Juries in Ireland were almost entirely composed of landlords, who had a very small interest in these subjects, because they paid little rates themselves, and therefore they did not trouble themselves much about the county cess.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, the hon. Member had himself explained the reason for the difference which existed between the case of the Irish counties and the English counties. The difference was an obvious one. The charge which had been made was an illegal one in England, and, therefore, the Government were equitably bound to refund the amount which had been illegally collected; but under the Irish Act, the charges were always legally made, and would have been so until now if a new Act had not been passed to alter the law. An amending Act having been passed, however, the Irish counties were put on exactly the same footing as the English counties.

Mr. SEXTON remarked, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had talked about equity; but it appeared to him that from the point of view of equity the two cases were precisely the same.

It was originally intended that the two Acts should operate precisely in the same way, and it appeared that when the Act was altered in England equity compelled them to refund the amount illegally charged to the English counties. In the case of the Irish counties the equity was precisely the same; but, probably through the action of some cunning lawyer, a few words had been incorporated into the Irish Act, and these were used to cheat the Irish counties out of the same rights which were allowed to the English counties. They did not desire to have a prolonged debate on this question, and, for his part, he would be very glad to withdraw the claim they had made if any lawyer could tell the Committee what was the difference between the equity of the two cases. He thought that the argument which had been used by the Solicitor General for Ireland was not one which the hon. and learned Gentleman should couple with the name of equity.

Mr. P. J. POWER desired to draw attention to the circumstances attending the conveyance of prisoners in Ireland under the Prevention of Crime Act.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the hon. Gentleman would be out of Order in discussing the Prevention of Crime Act on this Vote.

Mr. SEXTON, on the point of Order, wished to ask the Chairman whether the remands of prisoners and their conveyance to and from the prison and the Court under the Prevention of Crime Act would not come under this Vote? There were prisoners in Ireland arrested under the Prevention of Crime Act who were remanded time after time for upwards of a year, and he submitted that the conveyance of these prisoners from one place to another could be discussed on this Vote.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the conveyance of such prisoners would be in Order, but it would not be in Order to enter into a discussion upon the policy of the Prevention of Crime Act.

Mr. P. J. POWER said, he was merely attempting to point out the circumstances connected with the conveyance of prisoners under the Prevention of Crime Act, which certainly came under this Vote. They had had prisoners conveyed from Galway and other places to Dublin for investigation and trial under the Prevention of Crime Act, and on this ground alone it was their duty to prevent, as far as they could, this Vote passing. They regarded it as one of the greatest scandals in Ireland that these prisoners should be conveyed about from place to place.

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he did not think that cases of this sort, under the Prevention of Crime Act, did come under the Vote at present before the Committee. As the hon. Member would see from the particulars, this Vote was for the expenses incurred in the conveyance of prisoners from the period when the order for their committal to prison was made.

Mr. SEXTON wished to ask a question in regard to the prisoners who had been conveyed backwards and forwards between Sligo and Dublin. One of these prisoners was being conveyed from one place to another, and the constable who was in charge of him put a pair of handcuffs on him which were very much too small for his wrists. In the process of handcuffing the man, therefore, the constable cut the wrists of the man, who complained of what had taken place, and was seen by the prison doctor at Sligo. The only reply the unfortunate man received from the doctor, however, was—"Oh, Paddy, they did not know that your wrists were so large." What he wished to know was, whether this brutal conduct was to continue; whether the right hon. Gentleman would make inquiries into the case, and ascertain if the expression he had quoted was made use of; if he discovered that the circumstances were as he Mr. Sexton had stated, whether he would reprove the persons who were responsible for such conduct?

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he was not aware of the circumstances of the case to which the hon. Member had referred; but if the hon. Member would send him the facts, he would inquire into the matter.

Mr. SEXTON said, he would send the right hon. Gentleman a letter in the man's own handwriting.

Mr. WARTON desired to know if there had been, in respect of this matter, a recent change in the law which had given rise to this supplementary amount becoming necessary? If not, it showed a gross error in the original Estimate.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) remarked, that there had been a change in the law last Session which made this Supplementary Estimate necessary.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

(6.) £165,708, Public Education.

(7.) £7,000, Science and Art Department.

MR. DAWSON asked, what was the position of the New Science and Art Department in Dublin?

MR. MUNDELLA said, that question did not arise on the present Vote. The matter would be brought forward on the ordinary Estimates.

MR. SEXTON asked, whether the Report of the Commission and the scheme laid down for the development of Art Education in Ireland by Professor Sullivan had been taken into consideration?

MR. MUNDELLA said, he would prefer not to make any statement on that matter at present. The Report of the Commission had nothing to do with this Vote. The grant was one in which Ireland shared in precisely the same degree as England and Scotland.

MR. SEXTON said, it was evident that the right hon. Gentleman had not seen the document referred to, as it referred especially to grants.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £83,520, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for the Salaries and Expenses of the National Gallery."

MR. CUBITT said, the amount of this grant was so exceptional that he thought it unnecessary to make any excuse for addressing the Committee on the subject. Whatever opinion there might be on the question involved, he thought that it was a Vote which ought not to be passed over silently. The Government proposed to give £87,500 for two pictures—that was to say, dividing the amount, £70,000 for one picture, and £17,500 for the other. This was an enormous price to pay for two pictures; and the sum was so large that it required some little consideration to realize its magnitude. He had seen, a short time since, an ingenious calculation, which turned the amount of £70,000 into half-pence, and showed that it represented a half-penny from every man, woman, and child in the United Kingdom. In other words, it represented a perpetual annuity of £2,000 a-year on the finances of the country, or £5 or £6 a-day for ever, and that simply for the purchase of one work of Art, without taking into account other expenses connected with it. It was also interesting to compare the cost of these pictures with some of the amounts derived from taxation at the present time. He found that it came very nearly to the amount which the Chancellor of the Exchequer obtained from Auctioneers' Licences; that it exceeded the sum he received from the Gun Tax, as well as that received from Armorial Bearings; it was more than two-thirds of the sum produced by the Tax for Male Servants, and was equal to that of the interest paid on the Two and a-Half per Cent Annuities before the recent transaction of the right hon. Gentleman. Finally, it was nearly half of the sum squeezed out of the Government for the repairs of the highways. These comparisons were, he thought, sufficient to show to the Committee that the amount in question was a very large one. There was another question which arose on the Vote. Was this the time when a large sum of this kind ought to be voted? It was a time of great and increasing depression in trade—not only in agriculture, but in all branches of trade; it was a time of heavy war expenses, and it was a time of rumours of war. They had been told, even that evening, of the great calls made on account of the Navy, not only for the purpose of war, but for the purpose of the defence of the country. They knew that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was preparing his Budget, and that the expenditure was so great that people must shudder when they thought of the consequences. Putting aside the exceptional state of things at the present moment, he asked whether it was wise for a Government to pay extreme prices for works of Art? The National Gallery had been formed by bequests and donations partly, and partly by purchases. But if Her Majesty's Government paid extreme prices for works of Art, would they not thereby discourage donations, and would not persons be eager to obtain those vast sums instead of leaving their pictures to the nation? This purchase was one of the first results of the new law allowing the sale of heirlooms. The possessors of the picture might be right in saying that they had one of the best works of Art in the country; but to say there would never be another work of Art in the country equal to it was saying rather too much. Again, he believed that the Trustees of the National Gallery were entitled to a grant of £10,000 a-year, which was subject to their own discretion and the control of the Treasury as to the way in which they spent it; but he thought he was right in saying that no further grant was to be made to the National Gallery Trustees until the annual ordinary grants amounted to the sum paid for these pictures, the consequence of which would be that if constant sales of pictures, as was in the present state of the country likely to happen, were to continue, it would be impossible for the Trustees of the National Gallery to have its share of them owing to the want of money. The case was the same with regard to the National Portrait Gallery, which from having made a costly purchase was prevented from buying for some time. He thought that this condition ought to be removed. The National Gallery had not purchased since 1859 any single picture at a cost of more than £10,000. Two of the largest purchases ever made by the Trustees of the National Gallery for single pictures were when it gave, in 1857, £13,650 for a Paul Veronese—The Family of Darius—and £9,000 for a Madonna by Raphael. During the time of Sir Charles Eastlake, pictures for the National Gallery were bought at an average cost of under £700, and he need not, therefore, trouble the Committee with any comparison in respect of these works of Art. He would only give two examples of the largest prices ever paid for pictures, and then he thought the subject would have been placed pretty fully before the Committee. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in conversation with a deputation which waited on him, had mentioned that he believed a Prince of Orange once bought a Rubens for £24,000. And in the extravagant times of the Second Empire, when Marshal Soult's Collection was brought to the hammer, there was an extraordinary contest between three great nations for his celebrated Murillo, and it brought 615,300 francs, or about £24,000. He thought these examples showed that there was reason for the Committee to pause before giving such a price for these pictures as was now asked. Now, with regard to the correspondence that had taken place. First of all he would refer to the requisition in favour of these purchases, signed by members of the Royal Academy, and forwarded to the Prime Minister by Sir Frederick Leighton. He did not wish to criticize minutely the verbiage of this Memorial, because artists were not disposed to take the same view of these matters as was taken by Members of Parliament, and it would be sufficient for him to say that on the occasion referred to the members of the Royal Academy avowed that they addressed the Prime Minister under "strong emotion." But he should like to say a word or two with reference to the letter addressed to the right hon. Gentleman by Sir Frederick Leighton, who said it would be impossible to overstate the anxiety felt by the whole artistic community—

And he went on to say—

"We are accustomed to look to you as to one absolutely fearless in the carrying out of an elevated idea, and we believe that your championship will not be wanting to us on an occasion of which the like cannot recur, and in a cause which must on so many grounds commend itself to your inmost sympathies."

Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was not in the House at the moment; if he were, he believed he would say that there were financial and other reasons which should make him a little cautious in carrying out this elevated idea. However, he would pass from that; they were accustomed to emotional language when artists took to the pen. He came now to the second Memorial to the Prime Minister, from persons who he supposed were called the Art-supporters of the country, amongst whose names he saw that of the hon. Baronet the Member for Lisburn Sir Richard Wallace). The Memorial did not recommend any sum to be given, but only asked the Government to keep in view the approaching disposal of this great Collection—

"The Directors of every Continental Museum," they said, "are on the alert, and all hope that some of the treasures of the Marlborough Collection will be added to their own walls."

On this he would say, had any foreign Government bought any of these pictures? Now, he was quite aware that the Government in this matter was under a very great difficulty, because it was quite impossible that the negotiations could be kept secret; but he thought he could show that persons inside and outside the House had increased the difficulties of the Government in making a bargain. He came now to another point—the proposal which the Trustees of the National Gallery sent to the Prime Minister. He believed that the Trustees had no part in the finances, and that the valuation of pictures entirely depended on the Director, and it was to a letter of that Director that he now asked the attention of the Committee. Sir Frederick Burton, Director and Financial Adviser, wrote to the Prime Minister, and his letter contained the following paragraph:—

"The value of any great production of genius in money is a thing not easily to be determined. It resolves itself simply into a question of what the vendor will take and the purchaser give for an article combining the highest qualities with extreme rarity. Considering that these conditions are fulfilled in those pictures which are now placed at the disposal of Her Majesty's Government, I cannot feel any hesitation in expressing my opinion that even the large sum of 400,000 guineas would not exceed their value, and that in accepting them at that price the nation would in the end be the gainer."

Those were the words of a gentleman who had the control of the financial arrangements of the National Gallery, and he could not but regret that such a letter was ever published, because, however valuable the opinion of Sir Frederick Burton might be, it would be impossible for him ever to obtain a picture in future at a moderate price. He now came to three letters which had passed between the National Gallery and the late Secretary to the Treasury and Mr. Barrington. It appeared from the letter that the Treasury seemed to have had the idea that the Trustees were supporting Sir Frederick Burton in the valuation of the pictures; but the letter of Mr. Eastlake, dated the 10th of June, showed that the Trustees very firmly declined any responsibility, and left the matter in the hands of Sir Frederick Burton. He passed to the second letter of Sir Frederick Burton, who professed to give an opinion as to the value of the pictures in the Collection if they were exposed to public competition. He valued 11 of the pictures at 268,500 guineas, and added—

"These prices united fall considerably short of the amount which the Duke of Marlborough demands for the whole. But it will be for Her Majesty's Government to consider whether this discrepancy, notwithstanding the associations connected with most of the works named in the list, and, far more, the fact that they are in this country, and that a feeling strong and universal prevails that they should, if at all possible, be retained in it, would not justify the acceptance of the terms offered by the Duke of Marlborough rather than that these invaluable works of Art should be lost to the present and future generations in England."

Therefore, it was clear that Sir Frederick Burton was quite ready to close, regardless of cost, the bargain for the pictures. As one versed in Art, his opinion was that these pictures were worth anything to the nation, though the vendor or his agent appeared to put forward no plea that they were considering the nation, or going to make the nation a donation. The whole thing was done simply in the hard-and-fast way of a bargain; the 11 pictures must be bought together, the Duke of Marlborough having declined to sell a smaller number at a proportionately lower price. On page 11 of the correspondence a very important stage of the negotiations was reached. There was the letter of the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for East Cumberland (Mr. G. Howard), one of the Trustees. But there was, of course, some former correspondence left out, because the letter began—

it referred, probably, to correspondence which, like that of Sir Frederick Burton, was not adapted for publication. In that letter the Prime Minister said—

"We are, however, prepared to stretch a point to secure, if possible, the Raphael, and, perhaps, the Vandyke, together with the first on the list of the Rubens' (The Garden of the Hesperides): and I am in a position to authorize the Trustees to make an offer of £70,000 for the Raphael, or of £100,000 for the three pictures, subject, of course, to the sanction of Parliament."

Now, he would ask the attention of the Committee for a moment to the Memo-

random of the proceedings of a deputation which waited on the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the 2nd of July last—that was to say, nearly a week after the Prime Minister had made up his mind. The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not seem to be acquainted with what had taken place between the National Gallery and the Prime Minister; he received the deputation, accordingly, in a cautious and guarded way; he reminded them that the largest price ever paid for a picture was £21,000. And, although he said that he would inform the Government of the views of the deputation, he did not give them any hope that the purchase would be made; but on the 4th of July Mr. Eastlake wrote to the agent of the Duke of Marlborough, in accordance with the Prime Minister's decision, offering £70,000 for the one picture or £100,000 for the three. The Prime Minister, however, having made up his mind to stretch a point, did not stretch it further; but remained firm at the offer of £70,000. A sort of round-robin was signed, on the 4th of July, by several Members of that House, which, strange to say, was headed by the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex, Sir Walter R. Barttelot, and for which he believed the hon. Member for Cricklade, Mr. Story-Maskelyne, was answerable. Mr. Story-Maskelyne was afterwards, "Well, it was a most extraordinary document, and the words of one of its paragraphs were—

"The price that we ask the Government to be prepared to offer for these real masterpieces, even if it should be the price of the National Gallery, is not a large one, and it is because the Government have not been prepared to do so, and so anxious ever to retain, that we have been obliged to step outside the barrier of a Government purchase, and to strike a blow for the higher level of the nation of pictures of the world, which is to be paid, and which is to be paid with and raised on account of the picture to be rich."

He could hardly believe that, when this Memorial was passed round the Lobby, many of his hon. Friends knew what they were signing. They were willing to pay £100,000 for two pictures for which the Prime Minister had offered a much lower sum, and he believed that the moral of this was that round robins in the Lobby were rather to be avoided, because hon. Members were not likely to be always quite satisfied when the result of their recommendation appeared in the Estimates. The result of the deputation to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the account of the round-robin being sent to the Prime Minister, of course, got to the knowledge of Mr. Davis, the agent managing the sale for the Duke of Marlborough; and the effect of this was a letter from Mr. Davis, dated 147, New Bond Street, the 5th of July, to Mr. Eastlake, mentioning that he was instructed by His Grace to say that—"He has reason to believe that there are other purchasers for these pictures."

In short, the bargain was entirely repudiated. Therefore, he thought he was justified in saying that the round-robin did not assist the Prime Minister in obtaining the pictures at a more moderate price. Then he came nearly to the end of the negotiation. On the 12th of July the Secretary to the Treasury again wrote to the Trustees and Director of the National Gallery, stating that the Treasury were prepared to submit a Vote to Parliament for £85,000 for the purchase of the two paintings. The offer was then repeated by Mr. Eastlake to Mr. Davis, who, finding that the Prime Minister was firm at the offer of £70,000 for the Raphael, and that he could get no more money, on August 9 closed with the offer, and the purchase was settled. There then remained only the Vandyke, and he was sorry to say that all this grandiloquent correspondence had a very shabby ending. The Government offered £15,000 for it, and the agent wanted more, and the result of that was that they did what other vendors and purchasers generally did under similar circumstances—they split the difference, and the picture was bought for £17,500. He believed he had shown that this was a question which the Committee ought to consider; and having thought very carefully whether he ought to propose to annul the Vote, he was afraid that his only course would be to divide the Committee on the question whether this purchase ought to be completed or not. In taking that course, he carried the Committee with him, he should have the satisfaction of having saved the country a large expenditure; and if he did not succeed in doing so, he should have made his protest against the Vote, which protest might have some effect in detering other Governments from paying these large sums under similar circumstances on future occasions. He believed that a Vote of this kind could always be obtained if the subject could be considered sufficient to attract public attention; but he would remind the Committee that if they inquired at the public Institutions, they would be frequently told that the money at the disposal of the managers was insufficient to enable them to take proper measures for the display of their Collections. He believed that if one-tenth of the sum now asked for were spent on the arrangements of their National Collections, more benefit would accrue to Science and Art than would result from the possession of the objects for which this sensational Vote was demanded. Finally, there was one observation which he wished to make. Mr. Frederick Harrison, one of the deputation which waited on the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that occasion, was reported to have spoken warmly of the interest shown by the working classes, especially in the North of England, in the Collections at Nottingham, Manchester, Leeds, Sheffield, and other towns, and to have expressed the opinion that they were invariably in favour of the purchase of great works of Art, even at very high prices, when recommended by those who were conversant with such matters; and Lord Aberdare also pointed out that no act of Mr. Lowe's, while Chancellor of the Exchequer, was more popular than the purchase of the Peel Collection. It seemed to him (Mr. Cubitt) that there was an advantage to the classes referred to in the arrangement recently made to distribute works of Art over the country under certain conditions, and that this would be more prized by the working classes than extravagant purchases of this kind.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, the right hon. Gentleman had concluded with the remark that the Government should, as far as possible, carry out a system of lending works of Art from the Metropolis to the Provinces. In certain cases that had been done, and he was sure that his noble Friend the President of the Committee of Council on Education would do all that lay in his power to extend the application of that principle. The right hon. Gentleman had remarked that this was an extravagant purchase; but he also combined with that remark a very curious suggestion on the point of economy. He said in effect—"If you do carry out this purchase, by all means do not stop any future Vote for the purchase of pictures."

MR. CUBITT: I referred to pictures that could be bought for an ordinary sum.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he did not see any difference between an ordinary sum and a large sum; but, as a matter of fact, the right hon. Gentleman did suggest what was the reverse of economy. The simple narrative of the whole transaction was that the National Gallery was avowedly deficient in the highest examples of Art. The unfortunate dispersal of the Gallery of Charles I., which scattered some of the most important works of the great Masters all over Europe, had been a great misfortune to this country; and the result was that while at the Louvre, at Madrid, at Dresden, at Florence, at the Hermitage, and elsewhere, there were great and worthy examples of Raphael, there was in the National Gallery nothing approaching to what this country ought to possess of this Master, if it desired to have a Gallery of the great Masters fairly emulating the Galleries abroad. When this proposal, therefore, for the sale of the Blenheim Collection was made to them, he confessed that the sympathies of the Government were strongly in favour of purchasing one or two great works, provided they could make this purchase on terms which should appear to them reasonable, having regard to the price of pictures at the present time. The Assisei Madonna was certainly a picture of a most remarkable character in connection with the life of Raphael and the three different manners through which his painting passed; and he thought those who had seen his pictures, especially in Italy and other foreign capitals, would agree with him in saying that this picture was an example of extreme value, and one which, if it could be bought at a reasonable price, should not be lost to the country. He believed the Government were asked, in the first instance, £160,000 for this picture; it was valued then by Sir Frederick Burton at 110,000 guineas, and, whatever the right hon. Gentleman might say, Sir Frederick Burton was a great authority; and the Government came to the conclusion, after carefully considering what had been paid, not in former, but of late years, for great works of Art, and the continuing increase in their value—knowing something of what was going on with respect to offers for these pictures contemplated by other persons, that they might offer £70,000, and having decided to make that offer they never departed from it. They made the offer, in the first instance, on the 6th of June. The Duke of Marlborough persisted in his demand until early in August, and, when he found the Government were firm, accepted the offer. They could not have got the picture for less; and the question, therefore, was whether they should offer £70,000 for this remarkable example of Raphael, or allow it to go to one of the great Collections on the Continent. They believed that the House would support them under the circumstances in making the offer of £70,000, subject to their sanction. The Duke of Marlborough knew that the offer was made subject to the approval of the House, and would have no ground for complaint if that approval was withheld; but Her Majesty's Government, knowing that the offer was a fair one, had no hesitation in asking the House for the amount of the Vote.

SIR GABRIEL GOLDNEY said, he had very few remarks to make upon this subject. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Surrey

Mr Cubitt had done a very good service in drawing attention to this matter. Hon. Members ought to recollect that there were two sides to questions of this sort—people were apt to be carried away into a large expenditure, and next year, perhaps, something equally valuable and attractive cropped up, and equally likely to go abroad if it was not bought; and unless there was some control over these matters, it was very likely that they would be led away into further expense, and placed in a difficult position. Now, the Committee should consider the position of the National Gallery. It was of very great advantage to the country, no doubt, associated as it was with South Kensington. The National Gallery was established in 1824 for the purpose of forming a receptacle for public gifts. It was formed with the Angerstein Collection, which was for some time exhibited in Pall Mall. Mr. Thomas Baring, in 1871—when the Peel Collection was brought before the public with a view to purchase—moved for a Return of the money which the nation had spent, and what they had acquired by purchase and gift since the formation of the Institution. That Return showed that, from 1824 to 1870, a period of 45 years, the House of Commons had voted as the largest amount in any one Vote £75,000 for one of the most valuable and beautiful Collections that had ever been acquired—a Collection of 70 pictures, called the Peel Collection—to which amount was to be added the annual cost of other purchases, amounting to about £7,800, which brought up the total expenditure to £337,000 for the time named. The Return further showed that, during the 45 years which had elapsed since the National Gallery was established, there had been presented to the nation 284 pictures; that 256 had been bequeathed and 313 purchased. The cost of the 313 pictures purchased amounted, at that date, to £254,527, or an average price of £800 each for the whole of those valuable works. It was delightful to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer speaking with such freedom from the considerations which usually restrained the right hon. Gentleman; but he (Sir Gabriel Goldney) said that the history of the National Gallery showed that they ought to limit their expenditure upon it to a certain amount every year, or they would be carried away too far by the fear of losing some valuable work of Art, which it would be said the country ought to secure at any price. The House should, in his opinion, determine that expenditure on these matters should be limited to a certain sum per annum.

MR. STORY-MASKELYNE said, that, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Surrey had imported his name into the debate, he would ask the attention of the Committee for a few minutes. He did not shrink from owning that his hand was in the document quoted by the right hon. Gentleman; that he drew it up with the advice of some friends; and he was happy to say it received the signatures of influential Members on both sides of the House, including hon. Friends of his own, who represented the working classes in an especial manner. He thought the last observations of the hon. Member who had just sat down were very well worthy the attention of the Committee; and he might add that the desirability of taking some steps in the direction indicated had been present to his mind for some little time past. That, however, he did not think had anything to do with the question before the Committee. That question was whether, with regard to the two pictures, the hon. Members who had memorialized the Treasury had been acting in an extravagant spirit, carried away by emotion, or whether the proposal to purchase them was the result of long and careful consideration—whether, in short, those who urged the Government to take action were not actuated by a proper and just idea of what they owed at once to Art and to the principles of economy? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Surrey (Mr. Cubitt) had been kind enough to read some of the clauses of the document which had been signed by hon. Members with regard to those pictures; but he had omitted to read the last clause, which was the most important one of all, in which they said—

“We assure the Government that, to the best of our belief, our constituents and the whole nation will approve and applaud an expenditure, even though so large, for the special object in view; because it will be known that whatever price is paid will have been the result of much negotiation at the hands of the responsible Advisers of the Government.”

For his own part, he had been perfectly willing to leave the matter in the hands of the Government, and that they should decide what was the fair price that should be paid for these unique pictures. The Raphael was a unique picture, and the occasion of such a picture coming into the market was also unique; and they had, therefore, advised the Government to step out of the economical position which they usually occupied, and purchase the picture. He and his hon. Friends were not ashamed of that advice. He knew the picture, and had seen it illuminated with a powerful light in the splendid palace of Blenheim; and he could only say that if there were a Raphael in the world which illustrated the pictorial art in its highest form in the age of Raphael it was the picture in question. He need not go into the reasons which gave this picture its special value in the history of the development of painting as exhibited in Raphael's work; he would only say that for wealth of colour it was, perhaps, the finest Raphael in the world. Such a picture placed on the walls of the National Gallery would be not for to-day or to-morrow, but for all days. In that Gallery it would be seen not only by the wealthy, who had pictures of their own, but by those who had not the opportunity of seeing such supreme works of Art elsewhere. During the 20 years that he was at the head of a department at the British Museum, he had observed what had been the effect from year to year of the increase in the number of works of high type, representing the noble Arts of Greece and Rome. He knew that its effect had been to increase the number of visitors of the artizan class, as well as of other classes; and they showed, by their scrutiny, the highest appreciation of them. Such scrutiny and the cultivation of taste which was born of it was one of the factors, and no small one, in the culture of a nation, and in a kind of culture which our nation greatly needs. But the question must be looked at from the point of view of the effect it was to have upon the England, not of to-day only, but of the future. In one of the Natural History Departments of the British Museum, the collection belonging to which he largely formed, the most gratifying result was that he found that by degrees students came from Germany, America, France, and Italy to study and explore it, because, as they said, they were not educated in their science until they had studied that Collection. It was the same with the Art Collections in the Museums and National Gallery. The National Gallery had one unique advantage; the Collection had not been made by Kings and wealthy nobles, but, in a large degree, by men who were themselves artists, who know Art in its highest form and in all its characters. It was made by men who meant it to be a History of Art, who intended it to be a Collection to which the student of Art could go to find an education; and where, no less, the wayfarer outside the profession of the artist could find a historical sequence in the Schools of Art and illustrations of the great Masters' work in each, whereby he might be led on step by step to a real enjoyment of the highest and noblest works of Art. He hoped every Member of the House appreciated this aspect of the National Collection; he was persuaded that none appreciated it more than some of those who represented the artizan constituencies in the country. Those hon. Gentlemen were always ready to acknowledge the good they derived from a visit to the National Gallery. He was sorry for having detained the Committee so long; but he hoped he had given some reasons for having drawn up the Memorial which had been referred to, in not very complimentary terms, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Surrey (Mr. Cubitt).

MR. GEORGE HOWARD said, the opinions of the Trustees of the National Gallery had been expressed very much in the Correspondence which had been published; but he should like to say a few words in justification of those opinions, and to explain away a few inferences which had been drawn from them by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cubitt). Of course, he could not say that the price proposed to be paid for the pictures was not a very large one indeed, but the real question was not whether the price was large, but whether the pictures were worth the money—whether they were paying for them now a price which they would not be able to get them for in a few years. He thought that this might be illustrated by what had been already alluded to. The largest price ever paid for a collection of pictures for the National Gallery was that paid for Sir Robert Peel's Collection—£75,000 was given for that Collection 15 years ago. At the time that sum was considered enormous, and, as had been said by another hon. Gentleman opposite, the Government, in giving it, were considered to be acting very generously in the interest of Art and Education. He, however, had the very highest authority for stating that the present market value of that Collection was not £75,000, but £200,000. Now, if they could look for a rise in the value of their National pictures an equivalent to that in the case of Sir Robert Peel's pictures, it was almost impossible to calculate what the value of these particular pictures would be in a few years time, because, although the pictures of Sir Robert Peel were masterpieces in themselves, they were pictures by Masters whose works were from time to time in the market in considerable numbers, whereas these pictures were absolutely unique. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cubitt) talked as if pictures turned up like products of Nature; but the Trustees of the National Gallery knew with absolute exactitude what pictures of these Masters there were in the world, and they could confidently say that the pictures in question were absolutely unique. The great picture by Raphael could, in the opinion of the best authorities, rank second only to one in Europe; he did not think there was another picture by Raphael that could be put above it in value, unless it were that at Dresden. The state of a picture was a matter which greatly affected its value; and the state of this picture was more perfect than that of any other easel picture by Raphael. The purchase of the great Vandyke had, perhaps, been more criticized than the purchase of Raphael; but he thought that the purchase recommended itself to the artistic world. It was a great equestrian picture, ranking with those by Titian or Velasquez at Madrid. Although Vandyke was a foreigner, he was said to be the father of English painting. An hon. Friend of his said, the other day—"We do not care for any more Vandykes, because we can see Vandykes in any English manor house." But, as his hon. Friend the Member for Crickehowe (Mr. Story-Maskelyne) had said, it was not everybody who had access to manor houses. Beyond that, Mr. G. Howard would say it was just because there were so many imitations of Vandyke in England that it was eminently desirable to have the masterpieces of that painter in their National Gallery. He remembered that people used to say—"If you want to know what Vandyke could paint you should go to Genoa." Again, it was not possible for everyone to go to Genoa, and even if it were they would not see such a picture as the Government proposed to purchase. The unrivalled excellence of these pictures was generally admitted, but it was thought that an extravagant price was being paid for them. Great as the price was, in his opinion, it was not at all an extravagant one; indeed, he had reason to believe that one of the greatest foreign authorities on painting had expressed the opinion that the Raphael would probably sell at the present moment for £100,000. It was certainly a curious thing that many years ago, when one of the former Directors of the National Gallery entered into communication with the late Duke of Marlborough on the subject of the Raphael, that he expressed the opinion that, from what he had heard, he believed the value of the picture was £100,000. That was a good many years ago, when the value of pictures was not so high as it was at present. He (Mr. G. Howard) would not go into the Correspondence in detail, because the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cubitt) had dealt with it at sufficient length. He would just allude to one or two points in it. The right hon. Gentleman had said that Sir Frederick Burton was an extravagant valuer of pictures, and he founded the statement upon a list of prices which Sir Frederick had sent in to the Prime Minister. He (Mr. G. Howard) would point out, in the first place, that it was a very difficult thing—in fact, Sir Frederick himself said that it was almost an impossible thing—to price a picture of this character. Before an exact price could be fixed, it would be necessary for them to know more about the probable competitors, if the picture were put up to auction, than it was possible to know when the sale was a private one. Sir Frederick Burton had given what he believed to be the amount that the picture would fetch if exposed to general competition. A certain number of the pictures priced by Sir Frederick had since that time been sold. There was a list of nine pictures, which Sir Frederick Burton had valued at £83,000, and of these seven had been sold—he said seven, but, as a matter of fact, one—an inferior picture—was not on the list. However, six of that list had been sold, and the seven disposed of in the open market had fetched, not £83,000, but £98,350. That was the sum actually paid for them—a far larger figure than had been estimated by Sir Frederick Burton. It was a regrettable circumstance that these masterpieces had gone abroad. Perhaps it was inevitable, but, at all events, it proved that there were foreign competitors ready to give large sums, much larger than we ourselves were ready to give, for the pictures. It must not be forgotten that in some respects the present moment was an unfortunate one for the Duke of Marlborough to have selected for the sale of his pictures. The Berlin Government had—he did not know whether last year or the year before, but at any rate quite recently—given something like £90,000 for a collection of manuscripts, one of which was a sketch-book of Botticelli, containing illustrations of Dante. Germany was a great country, but was supposed to be managed most economically, yet it did not consider £90,000 an extravagant sum for a sketch-book. We ought to be thankful to the German Government for the use they had made of the sketch-book, for they had published reproductions of the sketches; but if these pictures of the Duke of Marlborough had gone abroad, it would not have been possible for us to have obtained reproductions, and no idea of them could have been obtained by ourselves or future generations without going abroad to see them. It was unfortunate for the Duke of Marlborough that Germany had made a large investment, because, no doubt, it had crippled them in regard to other purchases, and had rendered them unable to compete for the purchase of the Blenheim pictures. It was not unreasonable to suppose, also, that there might have been some feeling on the part of purchasers that the English Government had a certain priority in the purchase of these pictures. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Oubitt) had been good enough to take the National Gallery under his protection, and to say that they ought not to be cut off from their annual grant. He (Mr. G. Howard) hoped that attention would be paid to what the right hon. Gentleman had said in that respect. He should like to point out that, on the one hand, the right hon. Gentleman had represented the managers of the National Gallery as anxious at any price, totally disregarding economy, to obtain this grant of money for the purchase of the pictures; but that, on the other hand, he forgot that, in making that recommendation, the Trustees of the National Gallery had this fully before their eyes, and yet preferred to run the risk of losing the grant rather than lose what they believed to be a unique opportunity. He thought that their willingness to obtain the pictures at that sacrifice, however reluctant they might have been to lose their annual grant, showed that their opinion had not been formed recklessly and impulsively, as had been suggested, but had been a deliberate one. The right hon. Gentleman had also detailed the measures which he thought would be useful for educational purposes in the way of the circulation of works of Art and in the management of their Galleries, in order to make works of Art more valuable to the public. For his own part, he agreed with much that the right hon. Gentleman had said about what should be done for the purpose of education. Much had been done, and much more could still be done; but he thought that people were rather apt to undervalue the great educational effect of the best works of Art being available to the Art students. In that respect, he believed that the National Gallery stood very high. It was a remarkably complete historical Collection; but what was wanted, above all, as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had pointed out, was a few great masterpieces. Year by year the managers of the National Gallery had made their Collection of pictures more complete in an historical and educational sense; but, to perfect it, it had rather wanted some great masterpieces in order to have a full representation of what was absolutely the best in Art. Although opinions and fashions were fluctuating things, they did not at all fluctuate in regard to the highest names in Art; and he believed that, by becoming possessors of these pictures, the Government would be putting their National Collection in an absolutely unassailable position. The number of Art students at the National Gallery was increasing year by year, and this year rather more than 100 students were engaged in copying the pictures in the National Gallery over and above the number so engaged last year. Then there was one personal matter upon which he begged permission to say a few words. It had been suggested, because the Prime Minister's letter to him in regard to the Blenheim pictures began rather abruptly, that some communication had passed which the managers of the National Gallery did not wish to have published. Nothing could be a greater mistake. As the communications had been going on from day to day, and as the Trustees of the National Gallery only met from time to time, he (Mr. G. Howard) had very naturally, as the only Trustee at that time in the House of Commons, communicated the information received to Members of the Government whom he had seen in the House. He believed that the Prime Minister's letter to himself was in answer to a letter from him (Mr. G. Howard), in which he had stated that he believed there was then a chance of purchasing the two pictures separately, the Duke of Marlborough having before that refused to treat for them except in one collection. It, however, appeared that the noble Duke had changed his mind, and he Mr. G. Howard communicated that fact to the Prime Minister, and this letter was the right hon. Gentleman's answer. There was nothing which could not have been fully published to the House in the matter. He had nothing more to say; and in conclusion he would merely observe that he felt absolutely convinced that if this opportunity had been lost they would not have had another of getting a picture or pictures of that class again.

Mr. ST. LATER-BROTH said, he did not suppose the Committee desired this debate to be prolonged; and he certainly had no wish to detain it for more than a few moments. He felt, however, that he must, for one, express his thanks to his right hon. Friend near him (Mr. Cubitt) for bringing this question before the Committee. It was quite reasonable and proper that such a question should be debated there; and he was sure the Government itself would not have desired a Vote of that kind to pass without comment. There were two or three things to be deprecated in connection with this purchase. In the first place the country, no doubt, through its great wealth, by its action in this matter, had tended to raise the value of pictures in the market. It had done this by giving a price higher than could be given by any private purchaser. It was evident that the price originally asked for these pictures was something exorbitant. It had been brought down by the firmness of the Prime Minister to a comparatively moderate amount, although he thought it was still excessive—so that he could not help thinking that if the Treasury had been left alone a still smaller price would have been agreed upon. But the economical instincts of the Treasury could not be trusted, and a deputation of distinguished persons had waited upon the Government in order to stimulate them to make the purchase, and they had besides a round-robin signed by Members in the Lobby of that House for the same object—a practice which he thought was to be more honoured in the breach than in the observance. The round-robin was intended to strengthen the hands of the Government; but who could doubt that when great pictures were in the market, the artistic world would be more inclined to stimulate than depreciate their value? Who could doubt that, under the circumstances, the prices would be enormously raised? He remembered that a considerable sensation was caused at the enormous amount of £23,000 being given by the French Government for Marshal Soult's Murillo. From that time to this no such sum had ever been given for a single picture. The value of the Duke of Marlborough's Raphael was not fixed by any consideration as to what it was worth, but in view simply of what the Treasury could be persuaded to give. That was a matter of precedent. So far as the intrinsic value of the picture was concerned, he could not, of course, pretend to offer an opinion; but he would say, with regard to the National Gallery, that probably no one frequented it more often than he did himself, or had taken a greater interest in it for a long period of time; and he must admit that pictures of this class were the one thing needed to make it complete. The Collection was an extremely interesting one, and an extremely valuable one, and he thought more valuable from not being too large. It was valuable to the English people because it had been built up, not by extravagant purchases at one time, but generally by purchases made from year to year out of an annual Vote. If the Committee were willing to pass the present Vote, he thought it ought not to be done at the cost of the annual grant of £10,000. It did not follow that because that sum was voted annually it was necessary always to spend it; but he considered that their National Collection of pictures, such as it was, owed its chief merit and distinctive character to purchases made in the market from time to time in the natural way. With regard to the Vandyke, the price at which it was to be obtained was, he must own, a large sum to give for a picture, which, however fine, was not unique, there being many similar to it in the country. There was one in Burlington House—a portrait of Charles I. on horseback. There was one at Windsor and one at Highclere. In conclusion, he wished to express his obligations to his right hon. Friend for having drawn attention to this Vote, and to say that, if he went to a division, he should support him.

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, he did not rise to say one word as to whether it was expedient or not for the nation to purchase these pictures; but as he was one of the Trustees for the Blenheim estate, and guardian of the Marquess of Blandford, he thought he might be permitted to say what his views were upon the subject. In 1883 a large sum was offered for 12 of the Blenheim pictures, and in 1884 application was made to the Court of Chancery, under Lord Cairns's Act, for permission to negotiate their sale. There was a reasonable expectation of obtaining a sum of certainly £400,000 for the 12 pictures. This application was granted by the Court of Chancery; but when, under the terms of the order, the Duke of Marlborough applied to the Court to sanction the sale of the Ansidei Raphael and the Vandyke portrait of Charles I. to the Government for £70,000 and £17,500 respectively, he (Mr. Marjoribanks) and his co-Trustee thought it their duty to oppose the application to the utmost, on the ground of the entire inadequacy of the price offered by the Government. He wished to express his decided opinion that if the Duke of Marlborough had been more firm in the matter he might have obtained a much larger sum for the Raphael and Vandyke than he had agreed to accept. He (Mr. Marjoribanks) did not mean to say that the noble Duke would necessarily have obtained it from the Government. He believed—and he wished to express the opinion—that the country, in obtaining these two pictures at the price they were giving for them, were obtaining them at much below what would have been given for them elsewhere.

MR. RUSTON said, he would not trouble the Committee for any length of time; but he wished to express the satisfaction with which he had heard the eloquent vindication of the Vote which had fallen from the hon. Member for

Mr. Selater-Booth

Cricklade Mr. Story-Maskelyne). He did not want to depreciate the bargain the Government had made, and was sorry that the Committee was to be divided on the subject. He trusted that the hon. Gentleman's remarks would have the effect of removing the impression that existed in some quarters amongst Gentlemen who were disposed to question the wisdom of this Vote. He did not regard this as a question as to whether one more picture or two should be added to their National Collection. That was a small matter, though he was not, of course, disposed to undervalue it. The study of such noble works as the Blenheim Raphael was distinctly elevating, no doubt; but he wished to regard this proposal in the light of that great educational movement which was going on in this country, and more particularly in connection with Art. Hon. Members would be able to carry their minds back 35 years, to the time of the Exhibition of 1851. That Exhibition convinced the people and Government of this country that we were very much behind not only in Art matters, but especially in those manufactures in which artistic treatment entered at all; and he believed that it was on account of the enlightenment that Exhibition gave them that the Government inaugurated, he might say, a new era in regard to Art in this country. They established the Schools of Art, under that distinguished man, Sir Henry Cole. These schools had become established in almost every important town in the country; and hon. Gentlemen knew as well as he did what were the wonderful results they had accomplished. The manufactures of this country, in which the element of solidity mainly entered, had always held their own, because of the peculiar advantages which they as a nation enjoyed; but in those manufactures in which Art treatment was required they were deficient, and behind their foreign competitors. It was therefore precisely in those branches of manufacture in which Art treatment was essential that this great revival of Art had brought the manufactures to a level with those of other countries. What had been the consequence of all this? Let Gentlemen look at their own houses—"order, order!" He did not wish to transgress—he simply desired to show what was the influence of Art-teaching on the country, and how necessary it was that high ideals should be placed before those who had to study Art in the country. But he would pass from that, and would say that if the country was to maintain its place in the competition with foreign nations, they must, as far as they could, place before their workers the highest Art ideals that could be obtained. This Raphael, which had been so much spoken of, was, he believed, although he had not seen it, a wonderful picture. Certainly the price to be given for it was enormous; but whether or not it was an extravagant one depended upon what it was possible to get the picture for. If someone else was prepared to give £70,000 for it, £70,000 was the price the British Government could purchase it for on preference. Considering, therefore, that this was a unique occasion, and considering the wonderful stimulus this kind of purchase gave to the study of Art in the country, and looking upon its effects on the manufactures of Great Britain, he thought the occasion was one of which they ought to avail themselves. If they did not avail themselves of it, it would pass irretrievably away. As their manufactures increased and flourished, so did their artisans by the millions flourish; and it was on their behalf more than on behalf of the wealthy, who could go to the Picture Galleries when they chose, and who had the advantage of having pictures in their own homes, that he heartily supported the Vote.

Mr. AGNEW confessed that it was with much surprise and regret he saw the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Surrey Mr. Cubitt placing himself in front of the opposition to this Vote. Many in the House must know that the right hon. Gentleman was a distinguished connoisseur in matters of Art, that he was in possession of artistic heirlooms, and that he was himself a collector of works of Art of no mean distinction. He did not, however, gather from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that he objected to the purchase of this picture under any circumstances, but rather—though not expressed in words, and judging from the tone of his remarks—that he objected to the price to be paid. It appeared to him Mr. Agnew that there were two points before the Committee—first, was the Gov-vernment justified in seeking to acquire these precious examples of Raphael and Vandyke? If so, was the price which the Government contracted to pay more than the value of the pictures? He believed that no Government, in any civilized country, would have done other than depart from its true and proper functions if it had permitted, without making an effort to acquire them, such works to be deported. He confessed that since he had had the honour of a seat in that House he had never given a vote with greater pleasure and satisfaction than the vote he should give in favour of this purchase. And why was that? It was because he believed that the country was getting more than value for its money. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Hampshire (Mr. Sclater-Booth), in his remarks, had said—"Where is the person who has offered to give £70,000, or more than £70,000, for the Raphael, and why does he not come forward?" Well, he (Mr. Agnew) asked the House—this House of Commons, composed of English Gentlemen—whether there was a Member in it, or one of their countrymen out of it, who would have ventured to enter into negotiations with the Duke of Marlborough for the purchase of these pictures until it was certain that all negotiations between His Grace and the Government were at an end? In reference to what had been said about private individuals buying the pictures, he knew, as a matter of fact, that many persons were prepared to negotiate. He might tell the Committee without any breach of confidence, that, on behalf of a distinguished American, the firm of which he was a member had been invited to enter into negotiations for the purchase of this Raphael; and he took no credit to himself for having, to use a vulgar commonplace, shown the "cold shoulder" to his American client. He believed the picture to be worth a larger sum than £70,000; and that if it were offered for sale in any auction room in Europe it would command a much larger price than the Government proposed to give for it. A great deal of stress had been laid upon the fact that, 30 years ago, Soult's Murillo was sold for £24,000. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cubitt) was not correct in his facts when he said that the competition for that picture rested between the French and Spanish Governments. That was not so. It was a fact that an English nobleman was one of the competitors for the picture, and the penultimate bidder for it. The right hon. Gentleman knew well enough that during the last 30 years the value of works of Art had quadrupled—nay, quintupled. Twenty-five or 30 years ago high-class pictures could be obtained with comparative ease; but what was the state of things now? Important cities like Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, Edinburgh, established public Galleries, and others devoted annually large sums of money for the acquisition of pictures. They found in the Colonies Melbourne and Sydney National Galleries established, and they saw these Galleries in Boston, St. Louis, New York, and other places in the United States; and did hon. Members suppose for a moment that those who were interested in the formation of those Galleries were indifferent to the acquisition of pictures of the highest class? He repeated that the value of works of this class had more than quintupled within the last 25 years. There could be no comparison whatever between the two pictures in point of Art or educational value, there being a great gulf between the Art of Raphael and that of Murillo. He did not desire to detain the Committee a moment longer. He regretted very much that the tone of the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cubitt) had been to disparage the Director of the National Gallery; and he would take this opportunity of expressing his opinion that the administration of the National Gallery had been an immense success. Of course, the Director and Trustees of that Institution had no greater claim to being immaculate than any other set of men, and there could be no doubt that they had made mistakes; but, at the same time, he did believe that there was no Department of the Government, and no public matters connected with the National interest, that had been better safeguarded than had the interests of the English people in the National Gallery. Sir Frederick Burton was a very distinguished man; and although he was not supposed to be what might be termed an appraiser—for it was not expected of the Director of the National Gallery that he should know to a hair the value of any particular work of Art which the Trustees might desire to possess—he felt bound to say that the nation had every right to be satisfied with the administration of the National Gallery. He trusted, therefore, that the Committee generally, or, at least, a considerable number of hon. Members, would agree with him in saying that when the two pictures they were then discussing were placed in the National Gallery, in point of general excellence and distinctive character, there was no Gallery in any city in Europe that would be in a prouder position than their own. The Committee should understand that the Raphael was not a small picture. As a good many hon. Members had probably never seen it, he would tell them that it was not a picture that could be put under Mr. Speaker's Chair; but a large composition of a quality unsurpassed by anything in the Kingdom. Indeed, he had no hesitation in saying it was a more valuable picture, twice told, than any other picture in the United Kingdom, and that there was no picture in Europe by the great Master that was in the same state of perfection; while there was not one, with the single exception of that which an hon. Member below him had already referred to—the Maddalena di San Sisto at Dresden—that could compare with it for a moment in point either of quality or value. He regretted very much that there should be any division of opinion on this Vote; but he had little doubt that the Committee would, by a substantial majority, give its assent to the Motion of the Government.

MR. COOPER said, he was of opinion that that House and the country generally were under a deep debt of gratitude to the Government for having availed themselves of the unique and unexampled opportunity which had been offered them of securing for the nation the two most magnificent works of Art to which the Vote under discussion related. The Maddalena was, he believed, one of the finest that had been produced by Raphael. At any rate, there was only one other work in the world by that great Master that could be compared with it; and with regard to the Vandyke, it was the finest equestrian painting that Master had ever painted. It was true that the National Gallery already possessed one of the finest portraits Vandyke had ever produced; but the picture it was proposed to purchase would prove a very valuable adjunct. In his opinion, the purchase of the Peel Collection was one on which the nation might congratulate itself; and when the country had obtained the addition of these two magnificent paintings it would possess a National Gallery of which it might well be proud. He had listened with considerable interest to the hon. Member opposite Mr. G. Howard), who was one of the Trustees of the National Gallery, for any remarks from him on such a subject must necessarily receive great attention in that House. He might say that they were very much indebted to the management of the National Gallery on other accounts. They had lately arranged the pictures in that building in schools, and they had also placed servants in uniform in the rooms, so that the public could know them, and address to them any inquiries they might wish to make; whereas, before this was done, the visitors did not know who they were to put questions to when they desired information. He regretted that the Trustees of the National Gallery had not taken the same course as had been followed by the Trustees of the South Kensington Museum, as well as by the Trustees of the British Museum, but which he was glad to find was now being tentatively undertaken; and he trusted that when the National Gallery had acquired the two magnificent works for which the present Vote was asked they would constitute another inducement to the Trustees to offer the public every opportunity of viewing those great artistic creations which belonged to the nation, and which the people ought not to be debarred from seeing on all available occasions. If the Committee went to a division on this Vote, he had no doubt there would be a large majority in favour of the proposed acquisition. He regarded the proposal as one of those which the Prime Minister would, on reflection, regard as one of his last and best acts.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST desired to say a few words before the Committee went to a division on this Vote. He did not think that this was a time when the country should be asked to spend £70,000 on a picture, however much it might be worth the money. It was proposed to increase the Army by 15,000 men, and it was also intended to expend large sums on a considerable addition to the Navy. There was a war at present going on in the Soudan, and, perhaps, there might soon be another in Afghanistan; and he certainly did not think that this was a moment when the nation should be called upon to spend £83,000 on pictures. He had no doubt that the pictures it was proposed to purchase were works of very great value; but, at the same time, he could not overlook the fact that they had had those pictures in the country for a great many years, and, as far as he was aware, the public had not shown so much interest in them as should induce the Committee to spend so large a sum of money upon them. Besides, there was no reason to suppose they would otherwise leave the country. He was strongly opposed to this Vote. Moreover, there was another point that had struck him with regard to this matter, and which, he thought, would demonstrate most plainly the inadvisability of making the proposed expenditure. In this country they were occasionally subjected to fearful outrages by the use of dynamite; and if pictures of so costly a description were to be purchased, and put into the National Gallery, some ruffian might walk in and blow to nothing in a moment those valuable works. He would advise the Committee not to spend the money asked for, and, for his own part, he should oppose the Vote.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY regretted that the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken should have said what might be taken as furnishing hints to the enemies of this country to go and destroy a really inestimable piece of property, on which the nation was about to spend the large sum of £70,000. But, passing away from this point, he rose with a feeling of astonishment at its being possible for anyone to hold that hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House were going to such lengths as to oppose the present Vote. He hoped that hon. Members who thought so would find themselves greatly disappointed. His own reasons for supporting the Vote were that, according to the information he possessed, the picture for which it was proposed to give £70,000 was a work, not merely of the greatest Master that ever lived, but one belonging to a class of that Master's of which there were no other examples that had not found their way into public Galleries. The natural consequence was that the picture was one that could not be expected to come into the market—he would not say, in 10 or in 100 years—but at any future period. In his opinion, it would even be good policy, were it not rendered impossible by what had happened of late years, to borrow the money to buy the pictures rather than refuse to pass the Vote. He hoped the Committee would not regard with any feeling of impatience the further development of this discussion, because for once it happened to be engaged in discussing a pleasant subject.

MR. MAGNIAC said, an hon. Member had made use of an exceedingly curious argument in relation to this Vote; because he seemed to think that it was too much to spend £70,000 on a picture for the National Gallery in comparison with the sum that had to be expended on an iron-clad which would only last a few years. The fact was that the National Gallery had only cost £300,000 altogether, and ought to be regarded as worth much more than an iron-clad. For his own part, he could not conceive of a greater loss, in an artistic sense, than to allow the Raphael picture to go out of the country, which he believed would have been the case had not an agreement been come to with Her Majesty's Government that it should be purchased for the nation. In his opinion, the Government were entitled to great credit for the negotiation, which they had conducted with a boldness that he must confess had rather astonished him. He thought that, in not refusing to purchase the picture at a price which he believed others would have given for it, they were deserving of the greatest praise. He believed he knew what would have happened had they refrained from seizing the opportunity thus afforded. There would have been a perfect howl of indignation if the Government had taken such a course. This country had an Art future before it; but it had a great deal to learn. It was undoubtedly, at the present time, a good deal behind many parts of the Continent in this respect. It had, however, learnt much, and he hoped it would learn a great deal more. Whereas only 20 years ago they had to go abroad for artists and designers for their manufactories, they were now furnishing designers to foreign manufacturers. Were they to let their national glory stand still? For his part, he looked forward to the time when they would see this country on a level with the glories of Dresden and Paris, which, however, was not the case now. They had, unfortunately, lost a great opportunity of making additions to their National Collection that were now at St. Petersburg. Still they had made a great advance, and he had no hesitation in saying that the South Kensington Museum would, at the present time, fetch five times what it had already cost, and that if put up to auction its contents would realize 400 per cent on the amount that had been expended upon them. Referring to what had been said about iron-clads, he wished to point out that while £800,000 was not grudged for one of those vessels, which could last but for a few years, the £300,000 that had been spent on the National Gallery would last for all time. He hoped pains would be taken to show the country the great advantage it would derive from this Vote, and he felt confident that the Government would receive the support of the Committee in the division about to be taken.

Mr. BIGGAL said, he had listened to the discussion that had taken place on this Vote with a considerable amount of interest. He had heard hon. Members pronounce very decided opinions in regard to this £70,000 picture, as being one of very great value. For his part, he was very much disposed to doubt whether the picture was worth such a sum of money; and he would venture to suggest that the Vote should be withdrawn or postponed for the present, and that in the meantime the picture should be brought into the Tea Room for the inspection of hon. Members, and thus give them an opportunity of seeing for themselves what the picture was, and of saying whether or not they would agree with one or other of the two Parties in that House, who said, on the one side, that the picture was one of great value, and, on the other, that it was not at all worth the money. This course would give them the opportunity of seeing the article, and would enable them to judge of its merits for themselves. He might suggest, at the same time, that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Agnew, who had given so very decided an opinion in favour of the purchase of this highly-priced article, might also put alongside the picture a few other heirlooms, so as to give the House an opportunity of comparing them, and assist hon. Gentlemen in arriving at a satisfactory result. The House could, upon a subsequent day, vote for or against the confirmation of the purchase which had been made, as he understood, in a provisional way by the Government.

Mr. WILLIS said, he fully concurred with the right hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Cubitt) in the objection he had raised to this Vote—an objection which was all the stronger if that right hon. Gentleman possessed, as he (Mr. Willis) was told he did, a true taste in Art. He would state very shortly his objections to this Vote. In the first place, he objected to deal with a man for the purchase of a picture for the sum of £70,000, when that person had asked £160,000 for it at the beginning of the negotiation. Again, he objected to buy a picture for £70,000 in a case where his own agent had valued it at £110,000, especially when he was told that the £70,000 offered for it was not regarded by the person selling as a fair price. He should say, let those buy it who would give a fair price; and if it were true that there were Foreign Governments who were prepared to purchase the picture for the large price that had been named, let them have it. "No, no!" Hon. Members said "No, no;" but that, at any rate, was his opinion. Having had the advantage of visiting the Louvre, he could say to the French people, they might very well take away a great many of their worthless pictures and acquire this one for their Gallery, where it would aid the Art education of their people, who, perhaps, needed that education quite as much as, if not more than, the English people. He did not think there was any occasion to keep the picture to themselves. We had in the country a sufficient number of Raphael's productions, for the cultivation of taste and the knowledge of the great painter's work. The fact was that, in cases of this kind, the price fixed for a particular work of Art was reckoned according to the known wealth of the competitors, and not in accordance with the actual value of the work, and he objected to this country being called upon to pay prices like this, that were not estimated in regard to the inherent value of the works offered for sale, but rather in relation to the great wealth of this country. He objected on all these grounds to this Vote.

MR. HEALY said, if it were necessary, he should move that the Committee approve of the purchase. He certainly intended to support the Vote; but, at the same time, he was of opinion that works of Art of such a character ought not to be confined to this country. The taxpayers of the Kingdom generally had to provide the money expended on these purchases; and he thought, therefore, that the people in Ireland, as well as those in Scotland, should occasionally have the opportunity of seeing them. He would give his support to the Vote on the distinct understanding that the opportunity of seeing the pictures was not to be simply confined to London, but that people elsewhere might also be able to see them.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he desired to explain very briefly why it was he intended to oppose this Vote. He thought it was simply a monstrous piece of absurdity to spend a sum of £83,000 in the purchase of two pictures which only a few privileged persons would ever have the pleasure of seeing. He could assure the Committee that there were very few people in Ireland—certainly among those in his own constituency, who, nevertheless, would have to contribute their portion of the cost—who would ever have the advantage of seeing these works of Art. No doubt the people in London would have that advantage; but the great majority of those who would have to pay for them would never have the opportunity of seeing them. But it was not on that ground alone that he wished to oppose the Vote. The hon. Member the Secretary to the Treasury would remember that he (Mr. Redmond) was one of a deputation who waited on him the other day for the purpose of asking the Government to give an additional grant of £10,000 or £50,000 for the completion of a harbour which was now in a very disgraceful condition on the South-East Coast of Wexford. As it was, for the want of a few thousand pounds to complete the harbour a great many lives were constantly being lost, and a large amount of valuable property destroyed. As he had pointed out to the hon. Gentleman on the occasion referred to, there was no part of Ireland, and, perhaps, no part of the United Kingdom, where there existed a greater necessity for the construction of a good harbour of refuge than at the particular portion of the Wexford Coast to which he alluded—namely, Rosslare. ["Question!"] Hon. Members cried "Question;" but he was about to render his remarks à propos to the Question. The harbour for which the Government were only asked the miserable contribution of a few thousand pounds would not only greatly benefit the Irish people, but, if completed, as it ought to be, would prove of service to the British mercantile classes generally. Ships were constantly passing to and fro off this part of the Irish Coast. ["Question!"] The question was this—and he was going to put it very plainly—that he thought it a disgraceful procedure on the part of that Committee to vote large sums of money like £83,000 for the purchase of pictures at a time when, as the Committee was well aware, the Government refused to give a few thousand pounds for the completion of a necessary work like the harbour to which he had referred. It appeared to him that the Government were very much in the position of Nero, who played his fiddle while Rome was burning. They were engaged in the very pleasant task of discussing the value of pictures and considering proposals to buy costly paintings at a moment when they were wasting the National treasure and pouring out the best blood of the country in a war against a considerable foe. He believed, however, that the Government were acting wisely, from one point of view, in spending vast sums of money in the purchase of pictures, because, when the news reached the Mahdi that they were thus engaged, what would the Mahdi say? He would probably say—"It is useless for me and my followers to maintain a contest with a nation which is so wealthy that it can, at the same time, equip armies and purchase pictures that are offered at enormous prices." If the English Government wished to impress the Mahdi with a strong sense of the vastness of their wealth, they had better go on buying pictures while they continued their fighting. But he did think that, while the streets of London were filled with people who were starving and did not know where they were to obtain the means of sustenance, while the trade interests of this country were in a state of great depression, and hundreds and thousands of unemployed workmen and artizans were clamouring outside the Government Offices in the neighbourhood of Parliament Street for work, it was a disgraceful thing for the Government to be proposing the expenditure of vast sums of money on the purchase of pictures. It would be within the recollection of the Committee that, not many days ago, thousands of unemployed workmen, who wanted the means of support for their families, had met in London; and he imagined that when those thousands of men who had clamoured for work outside the Government Offices only a few days ago, and who were denied the employment they asked for, came to hear that, though they were refused the means of living, the Government could purchase costly pictures in which those persons had no interest, they would be very likely to go back to the Government Offices and raise a clamour which he hoped would be louder than before, accompanied by knocks at the door which he trusted would be still stronger and more emphatic. He should oppose this Vote, as he thought there were a hundred and one things in Ireland which needed the attention of the Government far more than the purchase of a couple of pictures at the enormous price of £83,000. As long as people were starving for want of employment, or being shipwrecked for lack of proper harbours in which they could find safety, he would, with all the power given to him, raise his voice against proposals such as this.

Mr. CUBITT said, he did not wish to put the Committee, at that late hour, to the trouble of a division, especially as he believed there was a tremendous majority of Members in favour of the Vote. He trusted, however, that the discussion in which they had been engaged would not be without its effect, and that, while the majority of the Committee would remain satisfied with the purchase of the pictures, those who had agreed with him and had supported him in the protest he had offered would be allowed to retain their conviction that that House preferred Art to economy.

[BILL 64.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Instruction to the Committee "that they have power to insert a Clause reducing the qualifying period for a municipal vote in Ireland to one year, as in England and Scotland."—Mr. Dawson.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that whilst he agreed that the long period of municipal qualification existing in Dublin was unnecessary, he did not think the last words of the Instruction should be adopted.

Mr. SEXTON said, that if the objection had any force it could easily be met by arranging that the qualifying period in Ireland should be one year, and the reference to England and Scotland could be omitted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had no objection to the Instruction being given in that form; but he would reserve any observations he might have to make on the subject until it came to be dealt with in Committee.

EAST INDIA EXPENSES (MILITARY EXPEDITION TO THE SOUDAN).

RESOLUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, Her Majesty having directed a Military Expedition of Her Native forces charged upon the Revenues of India to be despatched for service in the Soudan and Nubia, this House consents that the ordinary pay of such troops, as well as the ordinary charges of any vessels belonging to the Government of India that may be employed in the Expedition, which would have been charged upon the revenues of India if such troops or vessels had remained in that country or seas adjacent, shall continue to be so chargeable; Provided, that if it shall become necessary to replace the troops or vessels so withdrawn by other vessels or Native forces, the expense of raising, maintaining, and providing such vessels or forces shall be repaid out of any moneys which may be provided by Parliament for the purposes of the said Expedition."—Mr. J. K. Cross.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
 (Mr. J. K. Cross.)

Mr. ONSLOW said, he would like to put a question on this subject to the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India; but he would first like to know from the Chair whether, if he asked a question now, he should imperil his right to speak in the debate when it came on?

Mr. SPEAKER said, that by putting a question now the hon. Member would not be barred from taking part in the debate.

Mr. ONSLOW said, he only wished to know whether the hon. Gentleman could state when it was likely that the Motion could come on for discussion. It was understood that the Civil Service and Army Estimates would come on to-morrow. Was there any chance that the Motion now before the House would be brought on as first Order of the Day to-morrow?

Mr. J. K. CROSS said, he hoped the adjourned debate upon the Motion might be taken either as first or second Order of the Day on Monday.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH WIRES.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL moved—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the Law relating to the control over Telephone, Telegraph, and other Wires, and that the Committee do consist of Sir ALEXANDER GORDON, Sir JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG, Mr. TORRENS, Sir HENRY TYLER, Mr. GRAY, Mr. FIRTH, Mr. THOMAS DICKSON, Mr. TOTTENHAM, and Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, with power to send for persons, papers, and records; Three to be the quorum."

Mr. GRAY said, he did not object at all to the appointment of the Committee; but he would like to understand what it was that the wording of the Order of Reference exactly covered. The words were—

"To consider the Law relating to the control over Telephone, Telegraph, and other Wires."

And it might be presumed that they referred to the existence of overhead wires. He hoped, however, that they were sufficiently wide to enable the Committee to investigate the whole subject in a complete manner. He would suggest that after the word "over" the words "way leaves" should be inserted.

Mr. R. N. FOWLER said, he was very glad that the Government were proposing the appointment of this Committee, for the matter was one which was of very great interest to his constituents.

Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL said, it had been especially desired to make the Order of Reference as wide as possible, and the word "overhead" had not been used in order that there might be no risk of excluding underground wires from consideration. He was inclined to think that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gray) need not press any Amendment, for the whole question of telephone and telegraph wires would be considered by the Committee.

Mr. GRAY said, he was quite content with that assurance.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY RATES.

QUESTION.

LORD SUDELEY said, that as he saw the noble Lord Lord Henniker in his place he wished to ask him whether he would consent to postpone until Monday week his Motion on the subject of railway rates, which stood upon the Paper in his name for Monday next? The Board of Trade were negotiating with the traders on the one side and with the Railway Companies on the other, and it was hoped that a settlement would be arrived at satisfactory to both parties. If the subject came on for so early a day as Monday, it was feared that the proposed arrangement might be placed in jeopardy. In any case it would be impossible for him, pending those negotiations, to state the views of the Board of Trade, or to take any part in the discussion.

LORD HENNIKER said, that he always thought it a bad plan to postpone a Motion without very strong reasons, as it seemed as if the case to be brought forward was a weak one; and on this occasion he could assure their Lordships that the contrary was the fact. However, if he had been acting quite independently he might have listened to the appeal of the noble Lord. He took on himself the entire responsibility of any action he might take; but he was Chairman of an important Committee on Railway Rates composed of Members of their Lordships' House, Members of the House of Commons, and representatives of Chambers of Commerce, Chambers of Agriculture, and Trading Societies all over the country. Under those circumstances, he could not retire from the position he had taken up without a very strong reason for doing so. He did not believe that anything he would say, or that would be raised by the debate, would prejudice the negotiations going on with the Railway Companies; and he had every reason to believe that a discussion in that House might forward the views, even in the negotiations, of the Committee over which he presided. Of course, the Committee had their views as to various details; but that was not the time to state those views. Suffice it to say that one main point was, that the very great changes in railway legislation proposed by certain Bills in that House and in the other House of Parliament should not be made in such measures, but in a Bill brought in by the Government. If the noble Lord would say that the negotiations going on were based strictly on this principle well and good—he would put off his Motion for a week; but if not, he must proceed with it, for he could not tell what direction the negotiations might take, and he might not only prejudice his case by postponement, but be helping those who took a different view from the Committee over which he had the honour to preside.

LORD SUDELEY said, he was afraid he could not give the information required as to the nature of the negotiations; and he presumed, therefore, that the noble Lord would go on with his Motion.

ENGLAND AND GERMANY—SPEECH OF PRINCE BISMARCK.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, with the permission of the House, I wish to make a very short statement. Your Lordships have doubtless read in the ordinary channels of information a report of the speech made by Prince Bismarck a few days ago on the subject of the relations between Germany and this country. I feel, and I think your Lordships will feel, that it would be unbecoming, either as respects this House or the German Chancellor, of me to make anything like a lengthened reply here to what was stated in the Reichstag by Prince Bismarck; and for that reason there are several points raised by him—as to the numbers of our communications in writing, of despatches being published before delivery, and of despatches published which ought not to have been published at all—which I do not intend to touch. On these points I hope to be able to make such a statement in a regular way to Prince Bismarck that will show him that a very different colour can be given to our proceedings. But I do not think I need be quite so reticent with regard to what I stated in this House. Your Lordships will probably remember that I spoke in debate under the pressure of a severe Parliamentary attack; and what I said, to my sincere regret, has given annoyance to Prince Bismarck—I think from some misconception of the bearing of it. You will remember that in the course of his speech the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), who is not now present, made a fair Parliamentary attack upon us by saying—

“It is shown in your own Papers that your Egyptian policy is so bad that a great foreign statesman condemns it.”

I met this by the retort that I had no reason to complain of Prince Bismarck's disapproval, because we had not followed the advice—I ought, perhaps, to have said opinions—which he had given to the last and present Government to take Egypt—advice which must be considered as very friendly to this country. I added that I presumed that the noble Duke did not expect us to abandon all liberty of action in foreign and Colonial policy—a thrust which, however slight, I aimed at the noble Duke, and not in the least against Prince Bismarck. Prince Bismarck, however, to my great regret, construed this as having a meaning which I can positively assert I did not attach to it. He also complained of my having incorrectly described advice, or rather opinions, which, even if true, I had no right to mention, as they had been of a most confidential character. Now, as to the words “take Egypt.” I might probably have used a better phrase if I had spoken from written notes, although the words certainly apply either to an annexation or a Protectorate, or even to an occupation for the future. With regard to a breach of confidence, I should deeply regret any such act, which would be much more painful and injurious to myself than to anyone else. The accusation, of course, does not apply to what happened under the late Government, when I had no access to official sources, though receiving, together with other Leaders of the Opposition, much important information. It was assumed that what I had said as to advice given, or, more properly speaking, opinions expressed, was founded on very confidential and very friendly communications which passed in 1882, and of which the Prince gave a detailed explanation the other day. But I did not mean to refer to those private and very friendly communications which Prince Bismarck described to the Reichstag. I referred to subsequent declarations, not of a confidential character, which seemed to me to express that two years ago, whatever may be the opinion now, it was the wish and hope of the German Government that England should take upon herself to represent the interests of Europe in Egypt for the future. And I must add that I do not wish to imply that such a hope was expressed in a manner inconsistent with existing Treaties. My object in making this statement is not to defend myself. It is for the purpose of correcting misapprehensions which are inevitable when important utterances on foreign affairs are conveyed by telegraphic messages, frequently incorrect, to all the capitals of Europe. I can conceive nothing more wanting in self-respect, or in respect for the great Minister of a foreign and friendly State, than that I should have spontaneously initiated in this place any attack upon such a person as the leading Minister in Germany. Your Lordships will have noted with satisfaction the concluding words of Prince Bismarck on the future relations of the two nations—the more impressive as they were spoken at a moment of some annoyance. There seems to be a suspicion in Germany that we are not fully cognizant of the present position of that great nation. I believe, on the contrary, that there is no country in which not only politicians but all classes more fully and cheerfully appreciate the immensely important position in Europe that Germany occupies since her own union. I believe it to be in the interest of Europe that German relations should be good with this country, and that they should not be less so with France and her other neighbours. I am sure that it is more than ever in the interest of Germany and ourselves that our relations should be good at a time when we are about to meet in almost every part of the world. While both will maintain their rights, I cannot doubt that we ought to advance in a great and common work of commerce and civilization in a spirit of cordial co-operation. Your Lordships will not doubt that all my efforts will be exerted in favour of the conciliatory policy which has been sketched out by the German Chancellor.

NAVY—STATE OF THE NAVY—THE MINISTERIAL PROGRAMME

QUESTIONS—OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT STAMFORD asked Her Majesty's Government, What progress has been made towards carrying out the additions to the Navy which were announced by the First Lord of the Admiralty last autumn, and whether the Admiralty still intend to adhere to the terms of that announcement, or to proceed at once to still further increase the strength of the Naval Forces? The noble Lord complained that no progress had been made in the interval in the Dockyards. If the Admiralty Constructor was unable to execute the work required, it could easily be done in private yards. Had the Government at once given an order, 50 torpedo boats of the new type could have been completed in nine months. Three months had now gone, and nothing whatever had been done. He ventured to think that the march of political events, and the clouds even now looming in the East, rendered it absolutely necessary that the whole of the Government programme should be immediately carried out. Comparing our Navy with that of other countries, it appeared that we had in the Mediterranean six first class iron-clads, and a large number of well-armed smaller vessels. France had also a large Naval Force there, and the Fleets of the Italians and other nations were powerful. Whether or not our Fleet taken altogether was superior to that of France was a debateable matter; but, at all events, it was on such an equality as it had never been the practice of this country to permit. On the East Indian and China Stations we had only two iron-clad ships, while the French had five partially-armed frigates and nine gun-boats, besides four iron-clads and a number of small vessels. It was most inconsistent with the practice of this country and the national safety to leave our vast Possessions and enormous trade in the East so totally unprotected, as it would be with such an inadequate Naval Force, in the event of war suddenly breaking out. Referring to the proposed increase in the Navy, the noble Lord expressed the opinion that the provision of torpedo boats was utterly inadequate. With a much greater coast line than other European countries, we had a far less proportion of torpedo boats. A large number of these vessels should be ordered at once. He would ask what provision we had for docking vessels of the first class on foreign stations? There were docks in the hands of private firms in Bombay, and a small dock at Trincomalee; but really the only dock we had in that part of the world was at Hong Kong, and in the present state of intercourse between France and China considerable difficulties might arise at that port, which would prevent our making use of it. Such a state of things ought to be thoroughly considered by the noble Earl. It was true that there were some docks in the Colonies; but they did not belong to this country, and we should not be able to claim the entire use of them at any time. The noble Earl at the head of the Admiralty had made no addition personnel of the Navy. In 1814 this country could muster 140,000 sailors; but at the present time, with all our Reserves, we could not muster more than 80,000, many of whom were untrained, whereas France had an enormous Reserve Force in every port, and, besides her Navy, had a Reserve of 70,000 trained men. The men were to be had in this country, and we ought to be able to lay our hands upon a much larger proportion of men than were attached to Her Majesty's ships at present. Then there was the question of the Intelligence Department. Last year, replying to the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown), the noble Earl had told them that the Intelligence Department of the Navy were doing good work. He hoped that they had considered the work which the Russians were doing at Vladivostock, where they were making a Naval Station of the first class. With reference to the Colonies, he thought it was a great pity that at the present time, when the Colonies were showing their patriotism, nothing was being done by the Admiralty to encourage them in their gallant efforts to protect their shores. They were left to themselves, while this great Empire was so much indebted to them for their gallant conduct. With regard to our ships themselves, he contended that some of the vessels given forth as fighting ships could not possibly be considered safe to fight in, although he would not now go into the question of the danger or safety of ships with unarmoured ends. In conclusion, he begged to ask the noble Earl the Questions of which he had given Notice.

THE EARL OF CLANWILLIAM asked Her Majesty's Government, What guns above 43 tons weight had been ordered by the Admiralty, and which of them had not been supplied, with the cause for any delay? The noble Earl said that nothing had been done by the Government to redeem the promise made by the First Lord of the Admiralty last December. There was only a small increase shown in the totals for ship-building. Guns which had been ordered in 1879 were not even now all furnished. The Benbow, with two 110-ton guns, the Rodney, Howe, Camperdown, and Anson, with four 63-ton guns each, the Edinburgh, with four, and the Hero, with two 43-ton guns, and the Impérieuse and Warspite would all be kept waiting for their guns. The Returns that had been placed before the House were misleading. In those Returns the Colossus was stated to have been finished, whereas the fact was she had no guns; they were not finished. What was the use of iron-clads without guns? The arrangements for furnishing guns to the Navy were solely due to the want of the necessary plant at Woolwich for making guns. If they had the necessary plant they would be independent of the private trade. He did not object to private firms getting orders for guns; but he thought that we ought to be able to make our own guns if the private trade could not make them. The whole Service was disgusted with the state of affairs. He only spoke as a Naval Officer, and felt sure he was expressing the feelings of all his brother officers, who knew how behindhand they were, and that in case of war they ought to be twice as strong as at present.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, that he would answer the Questions put to him by the noble Viscount (Viscount Sidmouth) as well as he could, although they had extended much beyond the scope of the Notice given, and travelled over almost every subject connected with the Navy. However, he would take the Questions as they came. In the first place, the noble Viscount asked what progress had been made in carrying out the additions to the Navy which were announced last autumn. Not a moment had been lost in carrying out the programme that was announced in December last. Some persons seemed to think that ships could be built almost as quickly as a speech could be made; but that was, of course, out of the question. In the first place, the decision had to be come to as to the type of ship to be built. He had explained in December that the Board of Admiralty had considered, with the greatest possible care, the different type of ships to be laid down. Having arrived at their conclusions, orders were given, before the statements were made on the 2nd of December in both Houses of Parliament, to prepare the detailed designs for the different classes of vessels. The designs were completed in the following order:—For the new Scouts on December 31; for the belted cruisers on February 27; and for the iron-clads on February 28. He could assure their Lordships that the time taken for preparing the drawings and specifications of those ships, so far from being long, had been exceptionally short; and it was to the very great credit of the Constructors' Department of the Admiralty that so short a time had been taken in preparing the specifications and elaborate drawings that were necessary for the contracts for those ships. The Committee that was presided over by Lord Ravensworth went out of its way to make a representation to the effect that the specifications and drawings for ships which the Admiralty put out to contract should be much more complete and elaborate than was formerly the case; and, accordingly, the designs to which he was now referring had been prepared in the most complete and elaborate manner, and there had been no waste of time at all in regard to them. Unless the designs and drawings were most carefully prepared when the contracts for the ships were taken, there would be constant applications for explanations and otherwise, so that the construction of the ships was delayed. Therefore, he had no hesitation in saying that anyone who had any practical knowledge of shipbuilding would tell them that the Constructors' Department deserved great credit for the rapidity with which they had prepared the designs and specifications of the different classes of ships. Extra draftsmen had been employed, and every possible pains had been taken that not a moment should be lost. The Admiralty, also, had lost no time in approving of the invitation of tenders as soon as the drawings were made. They approved of the invitation of tenders for the new Scouts on the 31st of December, and the tenders were invited on the 5th of January, to be delivered by the 24th of February. This allowed the firms making the tenders a longer time than usual, and was done in consequence of the recommendation of the Committee to which he had before alluded, to the effect that plenty of time should be given to the shipbuilders to inspect the designs before they prepared their tenders, with the object of inviting them to make any suggestion that occurred to them in respect to the designs before the contract was actually made. The tenders for the Scouts were received on February 24, and they were accepted on February 27. The Scouts were to be built in 14 months. The tenders had not yet been received for the iron-clads and the belted cruisers. The designs for the belted cruisers were completed on the 27th of February, and those for the iron-clads on the 28th of February. The tenders for the belted cruisers and iron-clads were invited some time before the drawings were absolutely complete, and they were due on April 16 and 17. Nothing, then, could be more unjust than to blame the Constructors' Department of the Admiralty for any delay whatever. He must say he thought that before making the statement he had made, that nothing had been done by the Admiralty to carry out the programme explained last December, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Clanwilliam) might have taken the pains to look into the Navy Estimates and see whether his statements were accurate. The noble Earl, who had himself been a Lord of the Admiralty, said he found no proof in the Estimates of the programme that was announced in December being carried out. Now, there was no less a sum than £800,000 taken in the Estimates for this year for the carrying out of that programme. He had himself mentioned in December that a sum of £800,000 would be spent this year in building ships by contract. The whole of that appeared in the Shipbuilding Estimate for this year; and if the noble Earl had taken the pains to look he would have seen it there. He regretted that the noble Earl should, considering his position, have given an impression that was absolutely without foundation in fact. The noble Viscount (Viscount Sidmouth) had asked him whether the Admiralty still intended to adhere to the terms of the announcement he had made last autumn, or to proceed at once still further to increase the strength of the Naval Forces. Now, the announcement he made in December last referred to a particular point; and to one only—namely, that of shipbuilding. The whole of the discussion was confined to that particular point, and he was far from saying then that there were no other calls upon the Admiralty—no other calls for the expenditure of money on the Navy, and that the Naval Estimates should be confined strictly to the sums that had been spent during the last three or four years, or that no other increase should be made in the Naval Estimates than an increase in shipbuilding. He had just said that in the Naval Estimates for this year there was an increase of £800,000 for building ships by contract and carrying out the programme which he announced to their Lordships in December, and which he thought at the time was received with general approval. Besides that, the Naval Estimates this year showed a further increase of £700,000 over the Naval Estimates of last year, in addition to the £800,000, making, on the whole, comparing the Naval Estimates of the year to come with those of last year, omitting Supplemental Estimates from the comparison, an increase of about £1,500,000. The noble Viscount did not seem to be satisfied. He was sorry for that. All he could say was that the Board of Admiralty had carefully considered the whole case to the best of their ability, and they came to the conclusion that it would be desirable to make a very considerable increase in the provision for the Navy. The noble Lord had referred to the question of the personnel of the Navy. The late Board of Admiralty had, he thought, unwisely reduced the number of boys admitted into the Service. The effect of that had not been altogether satisfactory; and, therefore, the present Board had been obliged to increase the number to remedy the defects of the previous injudicious reduction. That was one reason why they had this year to make an increase of the personnel. Besides that they had thought it right to increase the number of Marines in consequence of some of that gallant force being employed in the operations in Egypt. There would be an increase of 1,000 seamen and Marines besides boys to keep up the proper numbers. In addition to the shipbuilding by contract, the Admiralty were pushing on with the ships that were building in the Dockyards, and they hoped in the course of the year to complete four iron-clad ships. They thought—and everybody who had attended to the matter thought so, too—that it was very desirable not to delay the completion of the iron-clads. That had been the policy of the Board of Admiralty. The noble Viscount had alluded the other night to a Return moved for last year, and now in the hands of their Lordships. The noble Viscount would see from the Return that the policy of the Board of Admiralty had been to increase considerably year by year the expenditure for the construction of ships. On page 12 of that

Return it would be seen that the increase had been from £1,500,000 in 1880-1, to £2,000,000 in 1883-4, and that increase had been sustained during the coming year. It had been thought right and necessary to increase the number of iron-clad ships, and therefore the Admiralty had increased the number very considerably. This had been done for the reasons which were explained last year, and which he need not repeat now. Besides that increase, however, it was considered desirable that at the present time, and in the existing circumstances of the country, a further increase should be made in the shipbuilding of the Navy, so that there should be a still greater superiority in the Navy of this country than at present existed. He entirely dissented from the view of the noble Viscount in reference to the position of the British Navy. The Board of Admiralty held that our Navy was largely superior in power to the Navy of France, or that of any other Power, as it ought to be, and as it must be, in the hands of any Government responsible for the safety of the country. There was no justification, therefore, for such statements as those which had been made in their Lordships' House or elsewhere. This was the opinion of the responsible advisers of the Government, and it was the opinion which he maintained, and which he believed would be maintained by anyone who impartially and quietly investigated the matter. The noble Viscount compared the Fleets in different parts of the world. He (the Earl of Northbrook) held that the strength of the Navy of a country was not to be weighed by a comparison between the number of ships nations might have in different parts of the world at the same time. At the present time the French had a war with China. Would the noble Viscount say that in consequence of that war it would have been right that the English Admiralty should have raised the strength of the China Squadron to the same strength as that of the French?

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: Certainly.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, he believed no one would seriously advocate such an opinion, for the reason that for a nation to immediately raise its Forces because another Power happened to be at war to the same strength as that other Power would be the most certain way to create jealousy, and in all probability to lead to hostilities. Therefore the Board of Admiralty did not think it necessary, in consequence of the French war in China, to raise the strength of the China Squadron to the same strength as that of the French. The noble Viscount gave his view of the merits of the different ships the Admiralty had laid down. All he could say was that, with great respect to the noble Viscount and his experience at sea, he held that the responsible advisers of the Admiralty, and the Naval Members of the Board of Admiralty, were better judges on the whole, and were more likely to secure the confidence of their Lordships and the country, than the simple dictum of the noble Viscount. He could not himself pretend to judge of the technical merits of ships; but he had, as a civilian, the best advisers that this or any other country could possess in such a matter. He did not believe that there had been any abler men engaged in the construction of ships of war than Mr. Barnaby, the Chief Constructor of the Navy, and his staff. An instance was afforded the other day of the reputation of that Department of the Admiralty. Sir William Armstrong and Co. wished to add to their other business that of shipbuilding. Where did they go in order to obtain a head for their shipbuilding department? They went to the Admiralty and engaged Mr. White, of Mr. Barnaby's Department, as head of their shipbuilding department. At the present moment the Board of Admiralty had Naval Constructors second to none in the service of any other nation. The designs of the ships referred to had been produced by those officers, and they had been brought to him on the responsibility of the Controller of the Navy, Rear Admiral Brandreth, an officer who possessed the confidence of the Navy, and had been in charge of one of the most important Dockyards. They had met with the approval of the Naval Members of the Board of Admiralty, and he put authority against authority on this matter. He did not himself profess to have any technical acquaintance with the construction of ships. He relied entirely on authority, and he said that the authority the Admiralty had as to the merits of the different classes of ships they had ordered was, to his mind, sufficient to justify the confidence of the country. That was his answer to the noble Viscount's criticism as to the ships being of a worthless character. In regard to the noble Viscount's remarks on the number of torpedo boats, he desired to point out that the noble Viscount had misunderstood some observations made by him last December on the value of torpedo attack. In placing before their Lordships certain views on this point, he said that the value of torpedo attack was likely to increase. In saying that, however, he did not mean alone, or even principally, attack by torpedo boats; but that instead of placing so much confidence in large iron-clad ships, it might be preferable to see ships of a smaller class—ships of the ram class firing torpedoes—in substitution of the very large and expensive ships which were now built. He entirely agreed, however, with the opinions expressed by the French Minister of Marine that it would be premature at present to give up building iron-clads, because so long as they were built by other nations, so long as the protection given by the compound plates was sufficient to keep out the fire of the best guns now made, those large ships must probably constitute the most important element in the Fleets of the world. On that occasion he also stated that he quite understood nations of very inferior naval power to Britain—Russia and Germany, for example—spending large sums of money in buying and building a great many torpedo boats, for the reason that torpedo boats were mainly a defensive weapon. That was the reason why he explained to their Lordships that the Board of Admiralty thought it desirable to build a good many ships of the Scout class—which were sea-going vessels—to carry torpedoes, and also the torpedo rams. He explained, on that occasion, that this was the reason why the Board did not attach so much importance to the torpedo boats as the noble Viscount appeared to do, for the torpedo boats could not be considered as sea-keeping vessels, and would not be able to accompany fleets to sea for long voyages. As part of the extra provision for 30 torpedo boats, the Government had ordered 10 already. They desired, moreover, to get more firms to undertake their manufacture than was at present the case. At present there were but two or three firms accustomed to build torpedo boats; and it would be a great advantage to the Admiralty and the country if they could induce other firms to take up the building of torpedo boats. Besides the 10 boats referred to, the Government had, therefore, invited other firms to build five at their own risk, so that they might become accustomed to the construction of this class of boat. The noble Viscount also made observations in regard to machine guns. The reason why the Admiralty had deferred ordering shell guns of this kind was that by a little delay they expected to get a much better pattern of gun. This, he was glad to say, they had succeeded in doing; and in the Army Estimates for the coming year provision would be made for a considerable number of guns of the description to which the noble Viscount alluded. The Admiralty already had a number of machine guns, but not machine guns that fired shell. The noble Earl (the Earl of Clanwilliam) had asked a question as to the supply of large guns for the ships now building. Eight 63-ton guns had already been ordered, four for the Rodney and four for the Howe, to be delivered in June, 1886, and 63-ton guns for the Camperdown and Anson would be ordered in the autumn. Three 110-ton guns had been ordered for the Benbow, and would be delivered in the course of the present year. There was no doubt that there had been a most regrettable difficulty in supplying breech-loading guns for the Navy. When Mr. Smith left the Admiralty in 1880 he expressed his regret on this point. It was unnecessary to discuss whose fault this was. Certainly, we had been behind other nations in this respect; but we were now rapidly remedying this defect. Lastly, the noble Viscount had asserted that the Board of Admiralty were hostile to the efforts of the Australian Colonies to increase their Navy. That was quite an error.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: I only said that the Government did not encourage the Colonies.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, if the noble Viscount, or anyone else, would point out how the Admiralty could assist the Australian Colonies in their patriotic efforts to strengthen their Navies, Her Majesty's Government would be only too happy to co-operate. The Admiralty had assisted them already.

both in the purchase of ships and by lending officers; and he could assure their Lordships that no effort should be wanting on his part to assist these Colonies in their most praiseworthy efforts. For reasons that he explained last December, Her Majesty's Government had determined to make certain additions to the Navy, and measures had been taken for the purpose of carrying out the scheme then submitted to Parliament. He could assure their Lordships that the Board of Admiralty were quite as anxious as the noble Viscount could possibly be to maintain the superiority of the British Navy.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON remarked that, in reference to the speech which had just been delivered by the noble Earl opposite, he desired to say that, assuming the national necessity for a greater increase in the rate of ship-building for the Navy than was represented by the sum of £800,000 which the noble Earl opposite had mentioned, he saw no reason why that sum should not be increased to £1,600,000. With regard to the question of delay, he was bound to say that from the Papers which had been laid on the Table he had come to the conclusion that no steps whatever had been taken by the Admiralty with a view of giving effect to the proposals of last autumn. A Return had been laid on the Table within the last few days which was so instructive that he wished to call attention to it. It was a Return of the ships that had been laid down during the last five years; and he found from that Return that there were no less than 61 ships, large and small, comprised in it, and of those no less than 30 remained uncompleted. This did seem a very serious condition of things. Among the latter, leaving out of consideration the smaller vessels, were the Collingwood (9,150 tons), the Arethusa (3,750 tons), and the Phaeton (3,750 tons), which were laid in 1880-1; the Rodney (9,700 tons), the Warspite (7,390 tons), the Impérieuse (7,390 tons), the Amphion (3,750 tons), the Calliope (2,770 tons), and the Calypso (2,770 tons), which were laid down in 1881-2; and the Benbow (10,000 tons), the Camperdown (10,000 tons), and the Howe (9,700 tons), which were laid down in 1882-3. Of those vessels which had been laid down during those five years, it was uncertain when the Camperdown, the Howe, the Auson, of 10,000 tons, and the Hera, of 8,000 tons, would be completed. This uncertainty was fraught with great danger in comparing our Navy with that of foreign countries. In the same Return the speed of the different ships was given. He found that, with regard to the 61 ships he had referred to, of those having an estimated speed of 17 knots none were completed; of those having an estimated speed of 16 knots the Leander alone was completed; of those having an estimated speed of 15 knots or of 14 knots none were completed; while of those having an estimated speed of 13 knots four partially protected sloops were completed, and two others were nearly ready. On this point, therefore, this Return disclosed a very unsatisfactory state of things. With regard to torpedo boats or ships no mention was made in the Return; but the Scout, of 1,130 tons, would be completed in June of this year, and the Fearless, of the same tonnage, would be completed in February next; while two gun and torpedo ships, of 785 tons, were to be completed at a period which was uncertain. What was the Admiralty programme for 1885-6? There would be commenced in the Dockyards two armour-clads, the tonnage and type of which had not yet been decided upon; while it was intended that there should be built by contract, although they had not yet been ordered, two armour-clads, five helld cruisers, and six new Scouts. There was an absolute blank in the programme with regard to the 10 first-class torpedo boats which it was intended should be built. With reference to what the noble Earl opposite had stated as to the strength of the English Navy, he had understood it to be generally admitted in all recent discussions on the subject in the other House of Parliament that the English Navy was not in the condition in which it ought to be—namely, equal in force to that of France joined to the Navy of any other Foreign Power. Our expenditure on torpedoes was entirely inadequate. It was a remarkable fact that, while we were not spending this year £100,000 upon torpedo boats, Germany was devoting £240,000 to that arm of the Service alone. As regards guns, he did not know that anything had been done which altered the position in the autumn. The guns made were good enough, provided only they had plant enough and were not dependent on private resources. He regretted that he had not heard anything said in reference to our coaling stations. He had before urged their paramount importance to this country; and it was impossible for any First Lord of the Admiralty to dispute how essential they were to our commerce and Navy—they could not, in short, keep the Navy afloat, or give adequate protection to our commerce, if the coaling stations were not placed in a more satisfactory condition. He would have been glad to hear that active steps were being taken to make our coaling stations more secure against attacks; but he feared that nothing had been done, particularly to the most important station of all—he referred to the Cape of Good Hope. The real truth was that that which lay at the root of all these and other matters was the great fear—the terror—which haunted all Governments—the spending of money. He had heard the most absurd argument used—“Tell us what the aggregate expenditure is, and if that expenditure exceeds ours you are, pro tanto, wrong.” There could be nothing more absurd than that. With a much larger population, and with an enormously increased trade, they were content to spend at a much lower rate for their assurance, and were, in his view, living in a fool’s paradise. His own belief was that the solution of their difficulty lay in the direction of a capital expenditure, whether by loans or terminable annuities. He doubted, failing that, whether there was any other course which would satisfy the mind of the country, and give them that assurance which they desired and to which they were entitled. It had been suggested that a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire into the adequacy of their naval strength and general means. He had no very great faith in Commissions, and for the reason that, if they really examined properly, they consumed a great deal of valuable time and personal labour, and at the end of the inquiry the Reports were pigeon-holed and became comparatively valueless. He would rather see a Joint Committee of both Houses. The recommendations of such a Committee would be more difficult to set aside than any other species of recommendations. Lastly, he wished the Board of Admiralty would ask for what they wanted, and not for what they thought they could get. He feared it was that system of paring and pruning and cutting down the Estimates in order to meet the supposed temper of the House of Commons which was largely responsible for the mischief. He had more than once urged the creation of a Departmental Body, which would combine effectively the naval, military, and Colonial elements of this question. This would save an enormous interchange of correspondence which now arose, which wasted such a large amount of time, and which, ultimately, would lead to a miscarriage. The present was one of those serious moments when the question could be best pressed upon the attention of the Government. They had their difficulties with France; they had the difficulty as to their Indian Frontier, where a single chance collision of outposts might involve them in hostilities; and they had the extreme tension in their relations with Germany. It was not only in the South Pacific, and in distant parts of our Dominions, that we had cause for anxiety. Blue Books before the House, as well as the singular communication they had that evening had from the Foreign Minister, made it plain how painfully strained our relations with foreign countries were. If anything more were wanted to confirm that view, it would be the fact that Her Majesty's Government had thought fit to call upon the Reserves. This one point should be kept in mind—that any military difficulty in which we might be involved meant the necessity for a great Navy. We should not now be able to act with our Navy as we did during the Crimean War. That state of things was at an end, and any military difficulties in which this country might now be involved unquestionably meant naval difficulties of a very large and complicated nature. He should like to see the naval arrangements of the country carried out in such a manner as to show foreign nations that we were determined to be fully prepared for any emergency; and it should be remembered that, when the arrangements to be adopted had once been decided, delay in carrying them out meant not only additional danger, but, in the long run, great additional expense.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH, in reply, said, he did not agree with the statements of the First Lord of the Admiralty (the Earl of Northbrook); and he should be prepared to prove, at any time, that the Navy of France was nearly on a par with that of this country, both as regarded guns and armour-plated ships; and he complained that the noble Earl would not face the difficulty.

THE EARL OF CLANWILLIAM explained that he had referred to the very small increase in the Estimates—only about £800,000 shown in the totals at the end—considering all that was required to be done by the Board of Admiralty.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, that it would not be in accordance with the practice of the House that he should make a second speech. He wished only to explain that provision was taken in the Army Estimates of this year in respect to the defences of coaling stations, and that at two of those stations the work was actually being carried on.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS
BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir James M'Garra-Hogg.)

MR. RITCHIE rose to move—

"That this House regrets that the Bill contains no provision to confer powers on the Metropolitan Board of Works to carry out the recommendation of the Select Committee on the Metropolitan Board of Works (Thames Crossings) Bill, 1884, to the effect that two crossings being immediately required a subway at or near Shadwell should be constructed by the Metropolitan Board of Works."

The hon. Member said, he should have preferred that his hon. and gallant Friend should have followed the usual practice of making a statement in moving the second reading of the Bill; but he was not surprised that, under the circumstances, his hon. and gallant Friend had not adopted the usual course. What he Mr. Ritchie, proposed to ask the House to do was not so much to object to the Bill, or anything it contained, as rather to express regret for what it did not contain. As far as the propositions in the Bill were concerned, he had not a word to say against them. The Motion which he had placed on the Paper expressed regret that the Bill included no provision or power within it to enable the Metropolitan Board of Works to carry out what was admitted, on all hands, to be a very necessary communication between the two sides of the River Thames, and which had been strongly recommended by a Parliamentary Select Committee which sat only last Session. It would be unnecessary for him to take up the time of the House by any lengthened remarks as to the absolute necessity and great urgency of establishing permanent communication between the two sides of the River below London Bridge. It was unnecessary to go over ground which had so often been gone over before, or to show that a large mass of the labouring and industrial population of London, living upon an area which extended for three or four miles East of London Bridge, were without any means whatever of crossing from one side of the River to the other. The question had been the subject of much discussion before; and in every quarter of the House it was admitted that the East End of London was unfairly handicapped in consequence of this want of communication. As long ago as 1882 the engineer of the Metropolitan Board of Works recommended that three permanent crossings should be made—one by means of a High Level Bridge at or near the Tower, a second by a subway at Shadwell, and a third by means of a subway or tunnel at Blackwall. Not only did the engineer of the Board recommend that the requirements of the East End of London should thus be met, but he also submitted full plans of the means by which he proposed to provide the accommodation which he considered necessary, after a careful investigation had been made by him into the whole subject. The plans and estimates submitted by Sir Joseph Bazalgette were for the construction of a High Level Bridge at Tower Hill, and subways at Shadwell and Blackwall. It would not be correct to say that the Metropolitan Board of Works ever adopted the Report of their engineer. But his hon. and gallant Friend would not consider that he Mr. Ritchie went too far when he said that the proposal of the engineer of the Board was, to say the least of it, favourably regarded by the Metropolitan Board; and, indeed, more than once, they gave as a reason why the Board did not proceed to carry out the plans suggested by their own engineer that they did not think they had sufficient funds at their disposal to permit them to entertain so large and important a scheme. They hinted, however, that if they could induce the Government to renew the Coal and Wine Duties for another period of years they might probably then be in a position to carry out the suggestions of their engineer. But it soon became known that Her Majesty's Government did not propose to renew the Coal and Wine Duties, so that any idea of carrying out this important system of crossings by that means was given up by the Metropolitan Board of Works. They had received propositions without number from the East End of London asking them, if they did not see their way to the carrying out of the entire scheme of their own engineer, but found themselves only able to proceed with one part of it, that the crossing decided upon should be in a more central position than those proposed by Sir Joseph Bazalgette. It was pointed out that if only one crossing was to be made, that ought to be one that would be most convenient for the three miles of district at present without accommodation. The utmost importance was attached, in the interests of the population, to the central position of the subway, if the full scheme of Sir

Joseph Bazalgette were not to be carried out. But, notwithstanding the representations made to the Metropolitan Board of Works by deputations and otherwise, the Board declined to consent to the wishes of the inhabitants, and put them entirely on one side. All the public Bodies in the East End of London, with one exception, were absolutely unanimous in deciding that the subway at Shadwell was that which ought to be constructed. But, notwithstanding that fact, the Metropolitan Board of Works, although they came to a resolution that one scheme only should be proceeded with, resolved that it should not be a tunnel at Shadwell—that, in point of fact, it should not be any one of the three schemes suggested by their own engineer, but that it should be a tunnel or subway from Wapping to Bermondsey known as the Nightingale Lane Tunnel. That scheme was unanimously opposed by the East End of London, quite as unanimously as the Shadwell scheme was recommended by the Local Authorities. It was felt that, as the question was one which directly affected the interests of a large body of the inhabitants of the Metropolis, it ought not to be dealt with by an ordinary Private Bill Committee, but by a Hybrid Committee, where all persons who were interested might be heard and evidence fully taken. A proposal to that effect was made by himself (Mr. Ritchie) and brought forward in the House, but objected to by his hon. and gallant Friend the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg). The House, however, thought that it was a reasonable proposal and consented to it, and the hon. Baronet the Member for Glamorganshire (Sir Hussey Vivian) was appointed Chairman of the Committee. After a long, patient, and very careful inquiry, this Hybrid Committee, having heard all the evidence laid before them on the subject, unanimously came to the conclusion that the public Bodies and deputations which had waited on the Metropolitan Board of Works, and recommended them to proceed, not with the Nightingale Lane scheme, but with the Shadwell scheme, were right. They, therefore, threw out the Bill of the Board of Works. But they felt that the evidence they had received was of so important a character, and that the whole question was of such vital interest to the Metropolis, that they asked leave of the House to make a special Report, in addition to the ordinary Report it was customary to make as to the merits of a Private Bill. The Committee, in this special Report, stated that there were two objects to be served—one was the relief of the congested traffic of London Bridge and the district North and North-East of the Tower and Bermondsey, while a second object was to meet the requirements of Mile End, Shadwell, Bethnal Green, Limehouse, Poplar, Bow, Bromley, and Hackney, also the largely increasing traffic between the factories of the Silver Town Estate and West India Docks, Millwall, and Victoria Docks on the North, and Bermondsey, Rotherhithe, the Surrey Commercial Docks, and Deptford on the South. This Report applied to a stretch of four miles East of London Bridge, containing 1,500,000 people. To secure these objects the Committee recommended—

“That two crossings are immediately required, and should be sanctioned by Parliament. One a Low Level Bridge at Little Tower Hill; the other a subway at or near Shadwell, which would be central, and would best meet the wants and wishes of the inhabitants East of London Bridge.”

The Committee concluded their Report as follows:—

“Your Committee cannot avoid expressing a hope that the Corporation of the City of London may be induced to undertake this great and useful work (a Bridge) contemporaneously with the construction of a subway at Shadwell by the Metropolitan Board of Works.”

It would thus be seen that the Committee entirely agreed with the Local Bodies and deputations which had waited on the Metropolitan Board of Works, and that they entirely concurred with the Metropolitan Board's own engineer, who had two years before recommended the very work which the Select Committee of the House of Commons, after hearing evidence, also felt themselves bound to recommend. It was a somewhat remarkable fact that the Report of the Select Committee met with more approval than the Report of almost any Select Committee for years. It was not only approved by the Local Bodies in the East End of London and by the Corporation of the City of London, but by the whole of the Press of the Metropolis. It was felt that the Report was a fair

one, and that it dealt adequately with the necessities of the case. In regard to the action of the City of London, it must not be forgotten that the Bridge upon which the City was about to commence operations was not within the area of the City at all, but outside of it; and he was bound to give the highest praise to the Corporation of the City when he felt that they were not bound to take the construction of a Bridge into consideration at all. They followed a different course, and at once referred the Report of the Select Committee to a Committee specially appointed to inquire into all the circumstances, and to suggest what action was, in their opinion, necessary to enable the Corporation to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee. The Committee sat without delay, and, after full inquiry, reported in favour of the recommendations of the Select Committee, and it was only yesterday that the House read a second time a Bill promoted by the Corporation of the City of London for carrying out the first of the proposals originally suggested by Sir Joseph Bazalgette—namely, the construction of a Bridge near Tower Hill, which was not to cost the ratepayers of the Metropolis one single penny. He maintained that action like this on the part of the Corporation of London evinced a public spirit which the House, he was sure, would cordially approve. It was only another evidence, added to many other evidences, which the City of London had invariably given of their great desire to meet the wants and wishes, not only of the inhabitants of the City proper, but of the larger portion of the Metropolis situated outside the area of the City. And now he would endeavour to show what the action of the Metropolitan Board of Works had been. He believed that the Metropolitan Board also referred the Report of the Select Committee to a Committee of their own about the middle of July, but, unlike the action of the Corporation of London, no Report emerged from the Committee until the 7th of November, exhibiting a marked contrast to the speedy and energetic manner in which the Corporation of London had taken up the recommendations of the Select Committee of the House of Commons. Ultimately, the Metropolitan Board of Works, notwithstanding the views that were placed before them by many deputations upon the subject, declined to proceed with the recommendations of the Select Committee. And why? He gathered from the discussion which took place at the Board that they did not believe the City of London was in earnest in regard to the construction of the Bridge, a fear which, he was glad to say, had been altogether falsified by the result. In the next place, the Metropolitan Board were of opinion that the Select Committee was not a strong Committee; and, further, they did not see why they should be dictated to by a Committee of the House of Commons. As he (Mr. Ritchie) was a Member of the Select Committee, he would not say much about the Committee generally; but he would point out that they had in the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Sir Hussey Vivian) a Chairman of such strength as was not often equalled, and certainly could not be exceeded, upon any Committee of that House. He had the authority of that hon. Member for saying that he had rarely, if ever, presided over a stronger, or, indeed, as strong a Committee. It his hon. and gallant Friend the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James McGarel Hogg) had addressed the House when moving the second reading of the Bill, he might probably have enlightened the House as to the reason why the Board of Works had not proceeded to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee, but, unfortunately, by the course which his hon. and gallant Friend had taken, he (Mr. Ritchie) had been precluded from knowing what the case of the Metropolitan Board of Works was. He found that, in the Report which was made by the Committee of the Metropolitan Board, one or two reasons were given. The first was that it would be objectionable—to construct a railway immediately under the bed of the River, for which purpose it would be necessary to form a caisson, and thereby interfere to a serious extent with the entrances to the London and to the Surrey Commercial Docks, or to construct the Tunnel at a much greater depth, involving the use of machinery and of working and lifting the traffic on both sides of the River. That having regard to the stringent conditions as to the navigable waterway, which were sought to be imposed upon the Board last Session in connection with their Bill for a railway at Nightingale Lane by wharfingers and others interested in the navigation of the River, as well as the wharfingers adjacent to the site of the works, and to the objections raised by the Conservators to the interruption of the River traffic by cofferdams, the Board is of opinion that the opposition to the formation of a shallow subway at Shadwell by cofferdams would be of a formidable character."

What did those reasons amount to? If they were of any value at all, they would, of course, with equal force apply to any scheme. They equally went to prove that it would be impossible for the Metropolitan Board of Works to make any subway there at all; and he would ask why these two objections were not brought forward last year, when the Board were themselves before Parliament? They included a provision in their Bill for enabling them to pay proper and adequate compensation to the Conservators and wharfingers for any interference with their property; and if in this case any difficulty were to arise in that respect, it could be got over in precisely the same way. He might say, also, in reference to that declaration, that the objection existed just as strongly in 1882, when the engineer of the Metropolitan Board of Works recommended the construction of this very subway. The same difficulty was raised by the wharfingers and the Conservators as to the obstruction of the River traffic by the construction of the subway; and if there was one thing on which the Committee last year were more unanimous and agreed upon than another, it was that if the Metropolitan Board of Works, provided that their scheme was a scheme in the public interest, and one which was necessary in order to serve a great public purpose, desired to carry out this plan, they ought not to be deterred from proceeding with it by objections such as those which had been raised by the wharfingers or the Conservators. No doubt, some temporary inconvenience must be suffered while works of this nature were in progress. It was felt that in carrying out a great public object some little temporary inconvenience must have to be put up with; but such little temporary inconvenience was no reason why the works should not be carried out. If the wharfingers or Conservators could show that they were likely to sustain inconvenience of a serious character, it would have been possible to insert Wharfinger Clauses in the Bill to provide compensation for them for any injury they might suffer in consequence of the carrying out of the works. What the East End of London was now unanimously asking for was that the Metropolitan Board of Works should undertake a scheme that was approved by everybody. Nevertheless, they preferred last year to promote a scheme which was approved by no one, setting aside the proposal which originated from their own engineer, and which had received the unanimous consent of all the public Bodies concerned. It was unnecessary for him to urge the great and pressing need for this important public improvement. The House knew very well that improved means of communication had always developed the traffic of the Metropolis to an enormous extent, and there was no part of London where it was more necessary that something should be done to improve the condition of the traffic. Nevertheless, the Metropolitan Board of Works, in their present Bill, made no provision for a permanent communication by means of a crossing or a subway; but they did propose to make provision for establishing free ferries across the Thames at Woolwich and Greenwich. It was recognized that that would be a purely temporary accommodation, and it was recognized by no one more than the engineer of the Metropolitan Board himself, who pointed out, in reference to a Report in 1882, suggesting that ferries should be made for local traffic, that the establishment of ferries would be a serious mistake, as, for instance, in the case of New York, where it had been found impossible to conduct the traffic by means of ferries. So far as he could understand, the ferries proposed to be established by the Bill were simply a temporary means of communication, which could not and ought not, for a single moment, to stand in the way of that permanent communication for which the East End of London for a long series of years had been languishing, and would continue to languish, unless Parliament would bring some pressure to bear upon the Metropolitan Board of Works. It might be asked why it was that he came down to the House to propose the Resolution he had placed upon the Paper. His answer to that was that all matters affecting the Metropolis had always been considered by Parliament to be matters with which it might fairly be asked to deal. In such an enormous area, with such a vast population, and with such important public interests, it had long been held that all matters affecting the Metropolis ought to be treated much more as Imperial questions than a mere measure promoted by an ordinary Corporate Body. If the proposal he had placed upon the Paper were assented to by the House, expressing regret that the Metropolitan Board of Works had not seen its way to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee of last year, he desired to point out that it would in no way affect the position of the Bill. The only effect it would have upon the Bill would be that the Bill itself would have to be set down for a second reading on another day—perhaps Monday; and, therefore, it would be seen that if the suggestion in opposition to the Resolution were that the only effect of carrying it would be to delay the second reading of the Bill, the real result of adopting it would only be to delay the progress of the Bill for a day or two. He hoped the House of Commons would express a strong opinion that, after the careful recommendations which had been made in the Report of the Select Committee, it was the duty of the Metropolitan Board of Works to take up the question; and he hoped and believed that the result would be that next Session the Metropolitan Board would come forward with a proposal for the construction of this subway. He deeply regretted that they were not coming forward with that proposal now. One word more, and he would have done. Yesterday a deputation upon this subject waited upon the right hon. and learned Gentleman, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Sir William Harcourt. He, Mr. Ritchie, was asked whether he would accompany that deputation; but he declined to do so for two reasons—first, because he did not see what the Home Secretary could do in the matter except what he would probably do now—namely, give them a word of sympathy in regard to the wants and requirements of the East End of London; and, secondly, because he knew very well that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would readily take advantage of the presence of the deputation to read them a lecture on London Government. Therefore, as he would have been unable to follow the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and reply to the arguments made use of, he thought it was better that he should not accompany the deputation. He now found that what actually took place was exactly what he had anticipated. The Home Secretary, while expressing sympathy for the East End of London, took advantage of the opportunity—as he always took advantage of every opportunity—to read the deputation a lecture upon the apathy with which the scheme he had brought forward last Session for the reform of London Government had been regarded, and to tell them, further, that if they had not got subways, bridges, and crossings it was entirely their own fault. At the same time, he failed to see, from the remarks of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, what proof there was that, if the House had passed the Bill introduced by the Government last year, the people of London would have been one whit better off in this respect. In fact, he was very strongly of opinion that if they had had that Bill they would have been much worse off, because he remembered that one portion of the Government proposals was to abolish the existing Corporation of the City of London; and, at any rate, as that Corporation had not been abolished, the public had obtained this advantage from the existing state of things in the East End of London—that the Corporation were promoting the construction of a Bridge which, if Parliament consented to their proposals, would not cost the ratepayers generally one farthing. That, he maintained, was a very great advantage indeed, and even if it were not so the right hon. and learned Gentleman forgot, and many other people always appeared to forget, that London was not like Glasgow, or Liverpool, or Manchester—one homogeneous whole, but that it was composed of what might be regarded as half-a-dozen large towns, with aims entirely different, with objects wholly distinct and separate, and with hardly a single thing in common. Therefore, if the Bill of the Government had been passed, what chance would they have had in the East End of London, with the small influence they were likely to possess in a Central Board, of inducing the authorities to spend millions of money in opening up communications across the River? If they had a Corporation of their own, of course they could have dealt with the matter themselves; but even then the result might not have been satisfactory, because, although the necessity for having these communications was admitted on all hands, there were a good many persons who would not be so anxious to pay for them. He did not wish, however, to enter into a discussion of the question of London Government; but he would venture to express a hope that, notwithstanding the fact that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary was not very much pleased with the people of London for not having adopted his scheme, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would say one or two words in sympathy with the wants and requirements of the East End of the Metropolis. He believed that such a declaration from the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have a good effect upon the Metropolitan Board of Works, and that next year they might be prepared with a Bill to give the people of the East End of London that which they were now asking for.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House regrets that the Bill contains no provision to confer powers on the Metropolitan Board of Works to carry out the recommendation of the Select Committee on the Metropolitan Board of Works (Thames Crossings) Bill, 1884, to the effect that two crossings being immediately required a subway at or near Shadwell should be constructed by the Metropolitan Board of Works,"—(Mr. Ritchie),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG said, his hon. Friend had complained that an unusual course had been taken in moving the second reading of the Bill without entering into any explanation with regard to it. He thought that the speech of his hon. Friend, as well as the Resolution which he had moved, afforded ample justification for him (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg, for having said nothing until he heard what his hon. Friend had to say on behalf of himself and the Resolution. The Resolution now before the House, if not one of direct censure, certainly involved an indirect censure upon the Metropolitan Board of Works, although he dared say that his hon. Friend did not mean that. He (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg), for one, entertained the greatest possible consideration and respect, not only for that House, but for all the recommendations made by the House or by its Committees; but he ventured to say that Committees of the House of Commons were not always infallible, even if they were of the stupendous strength of the Committee of last year, as described by his hon. Friend. The Metropolitan Board of Works had had some experience of Committees; and he might say they found that sometimes a Committee of the House of Commons passed a strong Resolution in one way, and if the same Bill was introduced in another Session that Resolution was entirely reversed. That was certainly the experience which the Metropolitan Board of Works had acquired; and although they were anxious to treat the recommendations of the Committees of the House of Commons with every possible respect, it was the duty of the Metropolitan Board to go carefully into the recommendations of the Select Committee of last year, and to dissect them thoroughly. They had done so, and the result was the Bill which he held in his hand. He would not trouble the House with specifying every subject that was dealt with in the Bill, further than to say that it included subjects of the greatest possible importance to every district in the Metropolis. He would go at once to the points which had been raised by his hon. Friend with regard to the Report of Sir Joseph Bazalgette. That Report was made to the Metropolitan Board of Works when they wanted to ascertain the best means of establishing a communication between the two sides of the River below London Bridge; and he might here say that they always had, and did still, most thoroughly sympathize with a desire that existed, not only in the East End, but in other parts of the Metropolis, to have this communication established. The Metropolitan Board of Works had already proved their sympathy, because in 1879 they brought in a Bill to enable them to erect a High Level Bridge. That Bill was thrown out, and last year they brought in a Bill for the construction of a subway at Nightingale Lane. That Bill was also thrown out, and now they were bringing in a Bill for establishing and regulating ferries across the Thames at Woolwich and Greenwich. The reason they had not applied for subways was this—when their engineer was directed to report upon the subject, the Board of Works hoped that Her Majesty's Government would see their way to continuing the Coal and Wine Duties. He was sorry to say that they had not done so, and he regretted the step they had taken. He thought they had displayed a want of intelligence in not having taken advantage of the opportunity afforded to them. As a matter of fact, they refused to do anything of the sort; but when Sir Joseph Bazalgette was told by the Board to report, he suggested several schemes, all of which, if they could have been carried out, would have been of manifest advantage to the public. The cost, however, would have been very great. No doubt, when Sir Joseph Bazalgette reported with regard to the communications across the Lower Thames, he suggested, as his hon. Friend behind had stated, that there ought to be a bridge at the Tower, and two subways at Shadwell and Blackwall. That was quite true; but when the Metropolitan Board of Works found that they had not got the money for the construction of a bridge and two subways, they were obliged to reconsider their position. Unfortunately, it was very difficult for him, without a map to explain the matter clearly to the House, but those who were conversant with these localities would know that what would have been a great public convenience with two subways and one bridge, would not have been a convenience at all if there was only to be one subway. Therefore, the engineer of the Board of Works was directed to consider what would be the best means of communication below Bridge for the public generally, in the event of only one subway being provided. It must be borne in mind that the Metropolitan Board of Works could not take into consideration the wants of one district alone. They were bound to think of every locality concerned. They had studied the interests of all, and they maintained that the subway proposed to be made under the Bill which was brought in last year was the one which was best, and which, if constructed, would have been most conducive to the public interests. He was sorry he was obliged to leave the deliberations of the Committee on which he had had the honour to serve on account of stress of business elsewhere; but he could not withhold his opinion that the Committee were not right in what they did in rejecting the Preamble of the Bill, and that the recommendations which were come to afterwards were adopted without due consideration and without hearing the wharfingers. That statement might not meet the approval of the Committee; but he would point out to the House that a Motion was moved in the Committee itself by his hon. Friend opposite the Member for Wenlock (Mr. Brown), which proposed to add the words—

That Amendment was rejected; but it was evident that some of the Members of the Committee thought that the case of the wharfingers ought to have been considered more than it was. His hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets Mr. Ritchie had gone to a great deal of trouble in quoting a Report of the Metropolitan Board of Works in answer to representations made to them by various Vestries and District Boards. The engineer of the Metropolitan Board went most carefully into the question of the subway recommended by the Committee which his hon. Friend thought ought to have been made, but the Report of the Metropolitan Board of Works was as follows:

“To construct a subway immediately under the bed of the River, for which purpose it would be necessary to form a cofferdam, and thereby interfere to a certain extent with the entrance to the London and the Surrey Commercial Docks, or to construct the Tunnel at a much greater depth, involving the use of mechanical means for lowering and lifting the traffic on both sides of the River.”

That Report called attention to the importance of abstaining, as far as possible, from interfering with the traffic on the River, and that point was pressed strongly upon the Board by various persons who were interested in the traffic of the River. In addition they had this fact, that the House of Commons and Committees of the House were very jealous of any proposal that was calculated to interfere in any shape or form with the traffic of the River. If the recommendation of the Select Committee that a subway should be constructed at or near Shadwell had been carried out, it would have been necessary to construct the tunnel at an enormous depth, which would have involved the use of hydraulic power, and the Board were confident that not only would the cost be excessive, but that the House of Commons would not consent to pass the scheme. His hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) had alluded to the fact that the Corporation of the City of London had kindly undertaken to make a bridge at the Tower. All he could say was that he believed they were perfectly right in doing so; and, instead of complaining of the Metropolitan Board of Works for not taxing the ratepayers unnecessarily, he thought they ought to be applauded for the course they had pursued, seeing that the City of London was now going to do the work out of their own funds. Under such circumstances, the Metropolitan Board of Works, as guardians of the public purse, would certainly have done wrong if they had undertaken this work at the expense of the ratepayers. The bridge would now be constructed by the Corporation of London without expense to anybody. But the undertaking of the City of London to construct this bridge had considerably changed and modified the place where the subway should be constructed, because if they were to have another crossing they must look lower down the River for a subway. The proposal of the Board of Works was to establish steam ferries, which he maintained would be very useful to the inhabitants on both sides of the River, and he did not see why they should not be permanently kept up. The inhabitants of Woolwich and Greenwich were quite satisfied, and these steam ferries would give accommodation to hundreds of thousands of working men who desired to cross from one side of the River to the other. He thought it was an act of presumption for the persons who waited yesterday upon the Home Secretary to arrogate to themselves that they represented everybody and everything. He did not propose to deliver a lecture upon London Government; but he might state that the Board of Works had also received a deputation from working men, who had represented their case in a very proper spirit. He had expressed to them the same sympathy which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt) had expressed, and he wished it was in the power of the Metropolitan Board of Works to do something for them; but he did not happen to be the Head of a Board of Guardians, or of a Relief Committee. The position he occupied was that of Chairman of a Body which was accountable for every penny of the public money they expended, and who were looked after in the most extraordinary and careful manner by the auditors. Therefore, with all their sympathy for the East End of London, they found it impossible to spend the money of the Board in relieving the necessities of these distressed people. There were many other things he should like to bring under the notice of the House; but he could not believe that the House would consent to carry this extraordinary Resolution, involving as it did a most undeserved vote of censure upon the Metropolitan Board of Works, who in this very Bill were trying to help every part of London—North, South, East, and West. He would reiterate that the case of the East End of London had been thoroughly and amply considered by a Committee of the Metropolitan Board of Works; but they could not confine their operations to one single district. It was their duty to consider the Metropolis at large, and he repudiated the idea that they would ever consent to give more consideration to one part of the Metropolis than another. The Board had a difficult duty to discharge, and they had endeavoured to discharge it to the best of their ability. The requirements of the East End of London had been considered in every shape and form, and they would be still further considered as far as was possible. He therefore hoped that the House would read the Bill a second time, and reject the Resolution which had been moved by his hon. Friend.

Mr. FIRTH said, he thought that the hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down had laid down, in excellent terms, the principle on which the Metropolitan Board ought to proceed, and upon which he thought, in this matter, they were proceeding. The suggestion made by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) was that the House should pass practically a vote of censure upon the Metropolitan Board for not including in their Bill this year a proposition to erect crossings over the Thames which would probably have involved an expenditure, charged on the whole of London, of a very considerable amount. With regard to the arguments used by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) as to the necessity of these communications, they were all agreed; but it was also requisite that that necessity should be supplied by an expenditure of money. And then came the question, "How was the money to be raised?" Whenever it was proposed to spend money, the principle was laid down that those who had to supply the money should give their consent. It appeared from the statement of the hon. Member opposite that the Report of the Select Committee of last year had been referred to a Committee of the Metropolitan Board of Works, with whom rested the discretion of fulfilling the condition as to supplying the money. Of course, it was highly desirable, when a scheme was proposed which would involve a large expenditure of public money, that some authority in which the public were duly represented should first give their consent to it. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) praised the Corporation of the City of London for its generosity, because, for instance, in their Tower Bridge Bill, they proposed to charge a Trust Estate—the Bridge House Estate—with the sum of £70,000 for the purpose of building the bridge. He did not object to that Bill being passed; but with respect to the suggestion that the Metropolitan Board of Works should expend a considerable sum in re-erecting the opinion being taken upon it of those who would have to provide the money, he thought it was a most curious and a suggestion altogether. He failed to see why a vote of censure should be passed upon a spending body because they declined to spend the money of the inhabitants of the Metropolis upon a project of which they did not approve. References had been made to lectures on Local Government, but the only point connected with London Government in-involved in this case was the desirability of having in existence some directly representative Body who should control the expenditure of the money of the ratepayers. He had no wish to say anything personal to the hon. Member opposite; but he thought that a considerable amount of blame rested upon the hon. Member's shoulders for the condition of things which he condemned that day, and which he proposed to remedy by moving a vote of censure upon the Metropolitan Board of Works. He (Mr. Firth) should certainly oppose the Motion.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) deprecated very much the introduction into the discussion of lectures upon London Government; but the hon. Member had done something more practical than deliver a lecture upon London Government, because he had brought forward a Resolution which was properly described as a vote of censure, and a vote of want of confidence in one of the principal Bodies engaged in conducting the government of London. That was something that went a little further than a lecture, because the hon. Member wanted the House, by a direct vote, to condemn the Metropolitan Board of Works for the mode in which they conducted their own business. It was not necessary that he (Sir William Harcourt) should deliver any lecture on the government of London; because, if the House should by this vote assent to the Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, it would entirely condemn the present government of London by a vote of censure upon the Metropolitan Board of Works. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets said that if the London Reform Bill of last year had been passed they would not have had the new bridge which was to be constructed by the Corporation of London; but he (Sir William Harcourt) did not know why the work should not have been undertaken by the new Municipal Council, which would have charge of the Bridge House Estate of the Corporation, just as much as the Corporation had now. The hon. Member had asked for an expression of sympathy on his (Sir William Harcourt's) part with the East End of London. Certainly, that expression was freely granted to the constituents of the hon. Member in the East End, and he had said so yesterday. It was granted all the more because they could not help themselves. They had no choice in the matter, and the Home Office could not help them. The Governing Bodies of London, whether good or bad, were the only persons from whom they could get help. How was Her Majesty's Government or the House of Commons to take the administration of the details of this work out of the hands of those to whom it had been intrusted? The Metropolitan Board of Works had power to raise the money to do the work, and they ought to be able to judge what work should be done, and what money should be spent upon it. If they were unable to judge of that, he did not know who could. How could a Legislative Body take out of the hands of an Administrative Body like the Metropolitan Board of Works the details of the administration in which they were engaged? How could they say to the Metropolitan Board of Works—"We think that you are not fit to undertake such work; but we insist upon your doing it, and we insist that you shall raise £2,000,000"—which he was told this work would cost—"and expend it in a certain way?" How could they say to this Legislative Body whose duty it was to raise the money, and to whom the whole administration of it was confided—"You shall spend £2,000,000, and raise the money by means of rates, whether you think it right to do the work or not?" He ventured to say that no Government and no Legislative Assembly would ever consent to say anything of the kind. The Metropolitan Board of Works had arrived at a decision. He did not say that they were right in the decision they had arrived at; but he had not himself spoken of them in the terms of condemnation used by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie). On a former occasion, the hon. Gentleman spoke of the Board of Works as if they were perfect, and now he was the first to condemn them.

MR. RITCHIE begged the right hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was alluding now to a former debate which took place in that House. He had expressly stated that he by no means considered the Board of Works perfect, and he had also expressed the opinion that there was a large necessity for reform in their constitution.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was glad to find that the hon. Member was not what he believed him to be—namely, a trusty champion of the existing constitution of the London Government. The hon. Member must be perfectly aware that in other towns the richer portion of the population contributed to the wants of those who were not so fortunately circumstanced. The hon. Gentleman himself spoke of Glasgow and Liverpool as homogeneous. Had the hon. Gentleman ever been in Liverpool? Did he mean that all parts of Liverpool were exactly the same? Because, if so, he was altogether wrong. There were poor parts which corresponded with the East End of London, and so also in Glasgow; but in Liverpool and Glasgow there was a system of government by which the superfluities of the wealthy could be brought in in aid of the wants of the poor, and that was what was required in London. It could, however, only be done by having a proper representative Body, representing both sections of the people, to manage the details of the administration and to raise the money that was required for the wants of both. The Metropolitan Board of Works was a representative Body. He supposed that the hon. Gentleman did not think that it was a representative Body, and that was why he asked for a vote of want of confidence. With regard to this particular proposal, he could not himself undertake to pass a general vote of censure. Before doing so, it would be necessary to enter into a detailed examination, and that was not a duty which fell within the province of the Government. The Legislature had already decided the matter by constituting the Metropolitan Board of Works. There was one argument which everybody could understand, and that was that very large sums of money had been expended on the upper parts of the River in freeing the bridges; and the people below Bridge were entitled to proportionate consideration and outlay in respect of their means of getting across the River. No doubt, the money hitherto spent upon the River had been mainly for the benefit of those who inhabited the districts extending over the upper parts of it, and which affected what might, generally speaking, be called the heart of the population of London. Similar considerations to those which had applied to the accommodation afforded above London Bridge did not apply to the lower part of the River, and consequently there had been a suggestion that subways should be constructed under the River for the benefit of the Eastern part of the Metropolis. He should have thought that the Metropolitan Board of Works would have done well to have considered the requirements of the East End of London; and he should have thought that the construction of the subway which had been recommended would have had some claim upon them for their favour. But he understood that the Metropolitan Board of Works had proposed a subway, and so far he could not see that they had failed in the discharge of their duty. Whether the subway ought to be made in the place proposed by the Board of Works, or at the place proposed by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), he had no means of judging.

MR. RITCHIE remarked that a Select Committee might inquire.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he could not see how anybody outside the Metropolitan Board of Works could determine what work was to be done, or what amount of money should be expended. By all means, if the Metropolitan Board did not understand their work, remove and change them; but he did not believe that either the Government or the House of Commons could undertake the work of the Board. Therefore, he went back to the point with which he commenced. The Motion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets Mr. Ritchie was practically a vote of censure upon the Metropolitan Board. He shared to a great degree in that want of confidence in the existing government of London, and he was very much disposed to vote with the hon. Member in a Motion of this kind, which might lay a good foundation for the proposition that a great and sweeping change was necessary. Therefore he would not say that if the hon. Gentleman went to a division he would not vote with him. But, on the other hand, he must point out the extreme difficulty of endeavouring to force the Metropolitan Board of Works to undertake any particular work, and raise the money that was necessary for carrying it out.

MR. BRYCE said, he would only say one or two words in endeavouring to show the House how simple the issue was against the Metropolitan Board of Works. The Metropolitan Board had admitted that communications were needed, and they had twice brought in a Bill which had gone before a Select Committee of the House, and been rejected on each occasion. The Board had further reported, through their own engineer, that these communications were necessary; and in that state of the facts the Board brought forward a proposal which went before a Committee last year, and as the Committee rejected it in favour of another proposal, the House, without further information upon the matter, must take it that the decision of the Committee was right. Whenever a measure was rejected by a Select Committee, the House was disposed to assume that the decision of the Committee was not to be disturbed. In this case there had been a long investigation, and he believed that the Committee, which was a strong one, had arrived unanimously at a clear decision. In that state of facts, the Metropolitan Board of Works in the very next year came forward with a Bill in which they took no steps whatever to give effect to the suggestions of the Select Committee. Having already admitted that the communications were necessary, having the decision of a tribunal of the House that they were needed, the Board of Works deliberately refused to take any action in the matter. Therefore, he thought that a very strong case indeed had been made out for condemning the inaction of the Metropolitan Board. To what cause that inaction was due he would not stop to discuss; but he wished to remind the House that there was a very strong feeling in London upon this subject. The East End of London had been altogether neglected, while hundreds of thousands of pounds had been expended upon communications in the upper part of the Thames. Under these circumstances, he confessed that he drew the conclusion which was not drawn by the hon. Gentleman opposite—that not only had the Metropolitan Board acted in this case with very little regard to the interests of the people of London, but that the case for a reform of London Government which the feebleness or wilfulness of that Board disclosed was very strong indeed.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that as he was Chairman of the Select Committee of last year, it was only fitting that he should say a few words on this question. He had no desire to censure the Metropolitan Board of Works. It was very unfortunate, he thought, that in a question of this kind, which seriously affected the material interests of 1,500,000 people, the question of censure upon the Metropolitan Board of Works should have been introduced at all. What the House had to do was to see that justice was done to the inhabitants of the Metropolis as far as they were able, and in supporting the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) he did not desire to convey any censure upon the action of the Metropolitan Board. All he desired to express was a strong opinion that the Metropolitan Board of Works ought to take measures to afford facilities for the communication across the Thames of large bodies of the people who lived East of London Bridge. The case stood thus—something like 1,500,000 people resided East of London Bridge, in a space about four miles in length. The proposition of the Metropolitan Board, last year, which came before the Select Committee, was to construct a subway at a cost of £1,900,000, or, in round numbers, of £2,000,000, at a point only one mile East of London Bridge. Therefore, it was clear that the population, for three miles below, would be very inadequately accommodated. And the Metropolitan Board proposed to do this without consulting the wishes of those who resided North of the River Thames and East of London Bridge. It was a very painful fact that a serious opposition was raised to the Bill before the Committee by every public body North and East of London Bridge. He felt that to be a very important matter. The Committee had before them what he might almost call the scandal of an enormous expenditure of money going on on account of disputes between the Metropolitan Board of Works and the whole of the public bodies representing the inhabitants of the North-East of London. A great many eminent counsel were employed in the case, and the investigation of the Select Committee lasted for 20 days. For his own part he had approached the question, as he was sure every Member of the Committee approached it, with an entirely unbiased mind. If he had any bias at all it was the belief that a Body like the Metropolitan Board of Works would have duly weighed and considered the question before they came to Parliament to authorize the expenditure of so large a sum of money. But as the investigation proceeded it became evident that they had not done so. The evidence proved that the consideration of the case by the Metropolitan Board of Works was of an extremely brief and perfunctory character. The Committee had it in evidence that it was on the 8th of October, 1883, that they instructed their surveyor to report as to the best means of crossing the River Thames below London Bridge. That Report was brought up on the 15th of October; on the 22nd it was approved, and on the 26th it was adopted. Therefore, only one week elapsed during which the engineer of the Metropolitan Board of Works could consider this most important question, and only six day days elapsed before the Report of the engineer was adopted by the Board of Works. Where £2,000,000 were being spent and 1,500,000 people accommodated, greater consideration should be given to the case than had been given to it by the Metropolitan Board of Works. When the matter came to be investigated, they found that the proposal of the Metropolitan Board was a mere compromise. They had to consider the question of the remedying of congested traffic at London Bridge and the accommodation of a large population stretching down the Thames for four miles; and when they endeavoured to meet these two cases they effected a compromise—and compromises, as hon. Members knew, were as a rule very bad things. It became evident that no one was satisfied with the arrangement which had been proposed by the Metropolitan Board of Works. The whole of the population interested were opposed to it, and it became evident that not only would this £2,000,000 have to be expended, but that a further £2,000,000 would have to be raised for the construction of a subway lower down the river. They had reason to believe that the Corporation of London, with funds which they had at their disposal—the Bridge House Estate Funds, which could only be devoted to Metropolitan bridges—would construct a bridge where they were now proposing to construct it—at Tower Hill. That bridge would deal with the difficulty and the obstruction and congestion of traffic on London Bridge. It would be within half-a-mile of London Bridge, and remedy that portion of the difficulty. Then it became more evident that a subway ought to be constructed lower down the River, and the Committee had suggested that that should be made—that a subway should be constructed at Shadwell, where the surveyor of the Metropolitan Board of Works had proposed to construct a subway. The Committee had reason to believe that there was no substantial difficulty in the way of the construction of such a subway, and therefore they ventured to suggest that this would be the right way of solving this difficult problem. The Metropolitan Board of Works might complain that two Parliamentary Committees had considered the proposals they had made, and had rejected them. He (Sir Hussey Vivian) felt sure that last year's Committee had rejected the proposals submitted to them on very good grounds. The Committee thought that it would be in the interest of the Metropolitan Board if, after the very protracted and careful investigation they had conducted, they could make such a suggestion as would probably be carried by Parliament when next proposed. Therefore it was that they suggested that a tunnel should be constructed at Shadwell, and he very much regretted that the Metropolitan Board of Works had not availed themselves of the suggestion, and proposed to carry out that or some analogous scheme. He believed it due to the great body of ratepayers living to the East of London Bridge that this communication should be made. The expenditure on the bridges above London Bridge had been very heavy indeed—about £1,300,000 having been expended in freeing bridges from tolls. In order to do this, the ratepayers of the Metropolis were taxed. The ratepayers in the East of London did not escape, but were taxed with the rest on account of the bridges above London Bridge, though they got very little or no benefit from them. The Committee over which he presided had certainly thought it was incumbent on the Metropolitan Board of Works to meet the wants of the people living to the East of London Bridge, and he must say that he regretted that that matter had not been dealt with. He supposed it could not be dealt with now, because the necessary Parliamentary Notice could not be given; but he trusted that if this discussion had no other result, it would, at any rate, have the effect of bringing strong pressure to bear on the Metropolitan Board of Works to induce them to carry out such a work as the Committee had suggested, and as he believed it was their duty to carry out, for the benefit of the inhabitants of the North-East of London.

MR. MARRIOTT said, there was no Question before the House—as might be gathered from the speeches which had been delivered—in relation to a Bill for the better government of London. The only question was, whether the Bill of the Metropolitan Board of Works of this year was a right one or a wrong one? Now, with regard to these bridges, the Metropolitan Board felt as much as any one else the wants of those who lived in the East of London, and desired as much as anybody to meet those wants with regard to means of communication between the two shores of the Thames. In 1879 the Board brought in a Bill for the purpose of affording that communication, and they brought in another last year; but both measures had been rejected by Parliamentary Committees. He did not wish to blame the Committees—he would not say whether they were right or wrong in the course they had taken; but they had rejected them, and what had occurred this year? Why, the Corporation of London had brought in a Bill to construct a bridge below London Bridge, and those who had the charge of the money of the ratepayers of the Metropolis said that they would not move in the matter of a subway. If they did propose such a scheme, what would happen? Why, there would be two Committees sitting in the House, one considering the measure brought in by the Corporation of the City of London, and the other inquiring into the merits of the scheme promoted by the Metropolitan Board. There would be two Committees. Why two Committees? The Committees were not acting together, and they could not do so. What the Metropolitan Board said was that they would not propose any bridge, but would propose means which would be a great advantage to the poorer classes who lived on the North and South sides of the Thames. They proposed to establish two free ferries, which would be, no doubt, of immense benefit to the inhabitants of Woolwich, Poplar, and Greenwich. With regard to the tunnel, it was a very serious matter, and would require an enormous amount of scientific opinion. It interfered with a great many rights; and whether they had a Central Government for London or not, it would not simplify the passing of such a scheme, because it would still be necessary to come to the House of Commons and submit the proposal to a Parliamentary Committee before they could obtain sanction to it. It was not the City of London or the Metropolitan Board of Works that stood in the way of the improvements; it was the House of Commons itself which had declined to allow the Metropolitan Board of Works to do what it proposed to do on a former occasion. The Metropolitan Board of Works, looking at the present position of the question, considered that it would be desirable, while experiments were going on, to supply these ferries. No doubt, the House would be of opinion that no vote should be passed throwing upon them work which they could not possibly perform this year; and he therefore thought that, so far from deserving a vote of censure, they had endeavoured to meet the wants of the people of the East of London, and had exercised a wise judgment in the action they had taken.

Mr. A. H. BROWN said, that the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down had shown some arguments why the Metropolitan Board of Works should not be called upon to promote a Bill this year for the construction of a bridge below London Bridge. The fact was, as anyone who sat on the Committee of last year knew, that below London Bridge there was an enormous population growing up and rapidly developing manufacturing interests, all of whom felt most intensely the want of sufficient communication across the Thames. Then it had been said that it was as well to save the pockets of the ratepayers, and that the Metropolitan Board of Works should not be asked to make this tunnel for the benefit of Shadwell. That would have been an argument to use last year; but it was no good now. Last year the Metropolitan Board of Works came down and asked Parliament to sanction the expenditure of £2,000,000 for the purpose of providing efficient means for crossing the Thames; but now they refused to come to the House for any sum of money for the same purpose. Everyone who knew anything about the district was well aware that there was a great and increasing traffic on the River at the point in question, consequent on the increased population in the neighbourhood. There was only one Authority in London which could take the matter in hand, and that was the Metropolitan Board of Works; and therefore he regretted that they had not proposed to construct a tunnel at Shadwell this year, Shadwell being, in the opinion of the engineer of the Metropolitan Board of Works, the right place for it.

Mr. RITCHIE said, that his object had been to obtain an expression of opinion. He was satisfied with the expression of opinion which had been given, and he would not, therefore, ask the House to divide upon the Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member withdraw his Motion?

Mr. RITCHIE: Yes.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—ALLEGED MISCONDUCT OF EMERGENCY MEN AT CLARE ISLAND, CO. MAYO.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Irish Government are aware that the Emergency men quartered on Clare Island (county Mayo) are in the habit of obtaining and consuming liquor at a public-house on Sundays, in contravention of the Sunday Closing Act, without any notice being taken of the practice by the police; whether the resulting intoxication has recently led to several disorderly and dangerous acts, one being the discharge of a revolver, by an Emergency man, at a dog, to the peril of the owner of the dog, who was standing by at the moment, and another being "a stand-up fight," in the presence of a number of persons, between an Emergency man and a policeman; whether the police have information that the Emergency men are suspected of plundering hen-roosts by night; and, what steps will be taken to deal with the circumstances stated, and also with the fact that these Emergency men are in the habit of carrying and displaying fire-arms?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: In The Western People newspaper of the 21st ultimo, there were published an anonymous letter and a leading article which taken together contained all the specific charges against the police and Emergency men in Clare Island which are included in this Question. Inquiry was at once made by the police authorities with the result that there was shown to be no foundation for the charges, with the exception that it did appear that one of the Emergency men some time ago fired his revolver at a dog which had been sent to drive away some sheep that he was taking to the pound; but it is not true that the owner of the dog was near, or in any danger. The man was cautioned as to the use he made of his revolver; and with this exception it did not appear that there had been any display of their fire-arms by the Emergency men, who are reported to be well-conducted.

EGYPT—THE COURBASH.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in The Globe of 3rd March, to the effect—

"That, without the usual delays and formalities attending the action of the tribunals, four men belonging to the village of Matarch were courbashed, the reason given being 'the increasing influence of the native population towards Englishmen,' and an alleged assault by some of the villagers on two unarmed Hussars; whether inquiry will be made as to the nature of the provocation given by the Hussars; how is it they went about unarmed, and, whether the punishment inflicted on their alleged assailants was not in direct contravention of the undertaking to abolish the courbash?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked, Whether there is any truth in the circumstantial statement published in The Standard of the 3rd March, and substantially repeated in several journals, that an alleged assault, in a village in Lower Egypt, was punished by the Egyptian Military Police by way of lynching, without trial; the village being surrounded, a statement implicating certain persons extorted from the Sheiks by threat of immediate flogging, and the persons so implicated being tied to a tree in front of the Mosque, and flogged, first with a stirrup leather, and then with a courbash, by the Military Police; and, if he is not informed, whether he will at once inquire and ascertain whether such things have happened under the reformed régime; particularly whether what was done was a mere rough reprisal by British Military, or was really the act of the Military Police, enrolled under European officers for the express purpose of maintaining the Law; and, if in the latter case, he can give an assurance that the Police officers will be adequately dealt with?

MR. MCCOAN asked, Whether it was not the fact that the only tribunal to which the men assaulted could have carried their case was the Court of the Cadi, in which Christian evidence was not admissible?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: In reply to my hon. Friend, and to a similar Question put by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, I have to state that the Foreign Office have as yet received no information with regard to this occurrence; but they cannot undertake to exercise minute supervision over the administration of Egypt. Inquiry will, however, be made as to the facts. I cannot answer the Question of the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. McCoan).

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIAN ADVANCE ON INDIA.

MR. CHAPLIN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Government received, several months ago, important information with regard to the advance of the Russian Forces towards Herat and the Frontier of India, from a high official and military authority in India, to the following effect:—

"Russia can, in from 60 to 100 days after the orders are spread from the War Office, put 95,000 regular troops in position from which we can hardly drive her, and from which she can undertake the invasion of India at her own convenience, and with a very fair prospect of success ; ”

whether the same authority did not make urgent recommendations in regard to that advance ; and, whether Her Majesty's Government considered that information to have been reliable ; and, if so, whether he is able to state, consistently with the public interest, what steps, if any, Her Majesty's Government have taken in consequence ?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : I understand the hon. Gentleman's Question to refer to a Memorandum which was privately circulated in India by the Quartermaster General, but which has not been officially submitted by him to the Government of India. In these circumstances, the Government decline to express any opinion upon the subjects discussed in the Memorandum. Even if it were desirable in the public interest—which I certainly do not think it is—it would not be possible to make any statement as to the steps which have been taken by the Government of India in regard to these matters.

MR. CHAPLIN : Do I understand from that answer that the noble Marquess has received the information to which I have referred ?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : I have received the Memorandum, which I presume has also been received by the hon. Gentleman in the same manner.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND) — LEGISLATION.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When the Government intend to introduce a Bill dealing with Reformatory and Industrial Schools in Ireland ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The Irish Government and the Home Office have been in communication on the subject of legislation for carrying out certain suggestions of the Royal Commission on Reformatory and Industrial Schools which extended to the United Kingdom ; but I am not in a position to say anything as to the introduction of a Bill on this subject.

EXPLOSIVES ACT, 1876 (IRELAND).

MR. DEASY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is compulsory on Public Boards in Ireland to appoint Inspectors under the Explosives Act of 1876 ; and, what responsibility do those Boards incur by making such appointments ?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, it was the duty of the Local Authorities to appoint Inspectors under the Explosives Acts, and if they did not perform that duty they would have the responsibility which attached to Public Bodies which refused to perform the duty imposed by Parliament. In order to facilitate the matter, and not to put the Local Authorities in Ireland to unnecessary expense, the Government of Ireland had, he believed, signified their permission that the Constabulary might be employed as Inspectors if the Local Authorities thought fit to do so.

MR. DEASY asked, whether the same responsibility would attach to the constable appointed as would to a private individual if a private individual was appointed ?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT : So I understand. He would be the Inspector appointed by the Local Authority.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND).

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, On what legal authority he founds his statement of the 2nd instant, that magistrates in Ireland are entitled to do what the magistrates of England are prohibited from doing, by a Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice (13th June, 1882), namely, forbidding a lawful assembly or procession, because information had been shown that such assembly or procession, if held, would tend to a breach of the peace ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The Question of the hon. Member does not quite accurately recite what I stated. I did not say that magistrates in England are prohibited from stopping processions. Magistrates in both countries, in the exercise of their discretionary powers for the preservation of the peace, are bound to have regard to the law as laid down in their respective countries. Without laying down any abstract proposition of law on the subject, I stated that the law in Ireland, as interpreted by the highest Court there, justified the action of the magistrates in the particular case of the intended procession in Derry.

Mr. Chaplin

BOARD OF TRADE—PAY OF LIGHT-KEEPERS, GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. SEXTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, What is the allowance made to light-keepers in England as good conduct pay, and if this allowance is of a fixed amount, or increases according to length of service; what allowance is made to light-keepers in England for fog signal duties, and if it is permanent or only during continuance of fog; what is the allowance to light-keepers in England in lieu of gardens where no land is attached to stations; what is the allowance to female assistants at single light stations on the English coast; what is the extent of the inequality existing in this service between England and Ireland in respect to those several allowances; why the inequality exists; and, whether it will be ended?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN said, he had a very long answer to the Question; and, if the hon. Member would permit him, would send it to him in writing.

NAVY—THE ROYAL YACHT—VICTORIA AND ALBERT.

Mr. GOURLEY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the repairs of Her Majesty's Yacht, Victoria and Albert, have been completed; if so, will he inform the House the total amount expended upon the hull, engines, cabins, and general outfit; also the intended complement of officers and crew, together with the probable annual cost for wages, provisions, fuel, and other stores; and, if he can state how often, and in what service, the yacht is to be employed; also if it be correct that the Lords of the Admiralty have authorised a large sum to be expended in the erection of a special shed for the storage of coals for the Queen's yachts?

Sir THOMAS BRASSEY: The repairs to the Victoria and Albert will be completed in a fortnight. The original Estimate as stated to Parliament was £55,000; the actual cost will be £58,000. The chief items in the additional expenditure are alterations of the bridge, which were desirable for the safe navigation of the vessel, and an improved fire service. The complement of the yacht and tenders is 157, or, including 75 riggers, 232. The details of the annual cost were given to Parliament in a Return ordered by the House in 1883.

The net amount is £7,968. The crew are continuous service men, all of whom are available in time of war for the general service of the Navy. The full pay of the officers is the chief item in the extra net annual cost. No sum has been taken in the Estimates for a coal shed. It is impossible to state beforehand on what services the yacht may be employed.

NAVY—SHIPBUILDING—PRIVATE SHIPBUILDERS.

Mr. GOURLEY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he will be good enough to inform the House the number and description of ships for which he has accepted tenders from private shipbuilders; whether the lowest tenders have in all cases been accepted alike for ships and machinery; and, if it is correct that the Admiralty have declined allowing builders, who have not hitherto built torpedo boats, to tender for this type of craft without first building experimental specimens at their own cost?

Sir THOMAS BRASSEY: Tenders have been accepted for six Scouts. In their invitations calling for tenders for shipbuilding, the Admiralty expressly state that they do not bind themselves to accept the lowest tender. They accept, in all cases, the tender which is considered best for the Public Service. It happens in this instance to have been the lowest. It has been thought desirable that the recent invitations to tender for 10 first-class torpedo boats should be addressed to those firms who have the greatest experience in the special work required; but the Admiralty are anxious to encourage a more general competition, and they propose to invite firms to build experimental boats on their own design, which they will be prepared to accept on condition that a minimum speed is realized.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—MEETINGS OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE—INTRUSION OF THE POLICE AT CASHEL.

Mr. JOHN O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether two policemen intruded themselves at a meeting held in Cashel on the 22nd February last, which was presided over by the Very Rev. Dean Quirk, Parish Priest of Cashel;

whether the Very Rev. Chairman strongly protested against the intrusion; if the policemen still remained, stating they had authority from their superior officer to attend the meeting; and, whether the Government approves of policemen forcing themselves on lawful and peaceful meetings; and, if not, whether they will issue instructions to prevent a repetition of such conduct?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: A sergeant and constable were directed to attend this meeting of the local branch of the National League, and request admittance. They entered the meeting without any objection being made, and, therefore, did not formerly request admittance. On the Chairman asking their authority for being present, the sergeant produced the written order, which showed the condition on which he was directed to attend. Although remarks were made on the presence of the two policemen, they were not expressly asked to retire, and the sergeant thought he was justified in remaining. I consider that this was an error of judgment, and that they ought to have withdrawn when the meeting objected to their presence.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will be good enough to state why he thinks it necessary that policemen should intrude themselves upon these peaceable meetings of the National League?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: According to the published report in the newspaper of a previous meeting there was a direct incitement to violence in one of the resolutions.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: Arising out of this Question, I have to ask the Chief Secretary if he has received a letter from the Very Rev. Dean Quirk, who presided over the meeting, in which the following occurred:—

"Now I have to complain of this most unwarrantable and, to us, most offensive proceeding. I am determined that there shall be no violation of the law, and all present are similarly disposed. One of your predecessors, Mr. Trevelyan, said that police should not attend National League meetings unless there was some special reason for their doing so."

He would ask whether the Stipendiary, Captain Clarke, had any authority for instituting such a system of espionage over a respectable body of Irishmen; and, whether the English Government believed it would tend to promote the interests of law and order?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Yes, Sir; I have received that letter from the rev. gentleman, to which I have replied. I have given in my answer to the hon. Member, and the other hon. Members who have addressed me to-day, an answer tantamount to that addressed to the rev. gentleman.

MR. DEASY: I would wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if a warrant in such cases discloses the reason for the intrusion of the police?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: No, Sir; it does not disclose the reason.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — APPOINTMENT OF ROMAN CATHOLICS, CO. CLARE.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will state the number of Catholics appointed to the Commission of the Peace in county Clare within the past two years; if Colonel Lloyd, recently appointed Justice of the Peace for Knock District, county Clare, is a stranger and a Protestant; and whether he is aware that the district is almost exclusively Catholic; if it is a fact that the only property he has in the county is about sixty acres of land, which he rents; and, whether the Irish Government purpose to redeem their pledge of last year, to appoint to the Commission of the Peace in Ireland a just proportion of eligible Catholics?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I understand 11 gentlemen have been appointed to the Commission of the Peace in the County Clare within the past two years, three of whom are believed to be Roman Catholics. Colonel Lloyd is a Protestant, and the district in which he will serve has certainly a very large Roman Catholic population; but it is inaccurate to describe him as a stranger, or as having only 60 acres of land. He has a residence, and farms about 250 acres in the county. The Lord Chancellor, with whom the appointment of county magistrates rests, is most anxious, whenever he properly can, to redress any religious inequality on the Magisterial Bench, and thus carry into practice the declaration made by the late Chief Secretary.

MR. KENNY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that he only farms 60 acres of land in the district, and that there are Catholic gentlemen who farm 1,000 and 2,000 acres of land who have been refused appointment by the Lord Chancellor on account of their religion?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not know anyone—I am sure that no one would be—excluded by the Lord Chancellor on account of religion. If the names are submitted to the Lord Chancellor, he will inquire as to the most suitable.

MR. KENNY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Lord Lieutenant of the county refuses to send forward the names of Catholic gentlemen sent to him?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: If the names are sent forward direct to the Lord Chancellor, he will take care to inquire into them.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE COMMONERS AT ST ALBANS.

MR. BRYCE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to the prosecution of certain of the inhabitants of Saint Albans for pulling down the fences of an inclosure made upon a large strip of roadside waste or common land, in violation of what they conceived to be their rights; whether he is aware that the Bench of Magistrates inflicted fines upon these people, most of whom were working men, amounting, with damages and costs, altogether to a sum of £111 7s. (of which £30 was subsequently remitted; whether he is aware that the fences have been re-erected at their own expense by some of the defendants; and, whether, under the special circumstances of the case, and considering that the defendants acted on behalf of what they believed to be public rights, he will advise the remission of the fines not yet paid, and direct the amounts already paid to be refunded?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I carefully inquired some weeks ago into this case. It is true that the fines imposed were large; but the Chairman of the Bench reported to me—and here I wish to draw special attention to the important words in the hon. Member's Question, "that the defendants acted on behalf of what they believed to be public rights"—that the judgment of the Court was based on the remarkable fact that the defendants were shown to have been given two legal opinions adverse to the mode of proceeding which they adopted. Therefore, the Court came to the conclusion that the defendants were not justified in the course which they took. Appeals were lodged on behalf of the defendants, but they have not been proceeded with; and, under those circumstances, I thought that I ought not to interfere.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — MR. VAUGHAN MONTGOMERY, J.P.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Vaughan Montgomery, J.P. against whom an abortive prosecution was directed, is to be retained in the Commission of the Peace?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Lord Chancellor inquired into this case, and called upon Mr. Montgomery for an explanation of his conduct in connection with a claim which he made to vote at the Cootehill Poor Law election last year. Mr. Montgomery having failed to give a satisfactory explanation, the Lord Chancellor deemed it his duty to remove him from the Commission of the Peace. This decision was communicated to Mr. Montgomery on the 24th of January last.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE IRELAND, BILL.

VICOUNT CRICHTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If that portion of the Irish Judicature Bill dealing with the District Registrars of the Court of Probate was submitted to the Judge of that Court before its introduction into this House, in accordance with the pledge given last year by the late Chief Secretary, in reply to a Question, that any Bill dealing with such Registrars would be so submitted; if not, why was this pledge not fulfilled; and, whether any, and, if so, which, of the Judges were so consulted?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I find that my right hon. Predecessor did say in March last year that the Judge of the Court of Probate would be consulted as to proposals which were then in contemplation affecting the District Registries of his Court. The Lord Chancellor had previously communicated to the Judge the intentions of the Government on this subject, and the proposals then in view are embodied in the present Bill, which deals with the whole judicature. The precise statement of the late Chief Secretary was overlooked; but the Government will be quite willing to consider any objections which the Judge of the Court of Probate may now offer to the proposals of the Bill in the points referred to.

MR. GIBSON: Is it intended to submit these parts of the Bill to the Judge of the Court of Probate for his approbation?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not know whether it is intended that the Bill should be submitted to him as it is now before the House. If the Judge of the Court of Probate has any observations to make, they will be carefully considered.

ORDNANCE SURVEY—THE SALE OF ORDNANCE MAPS.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is true that the Government have granted to one firm of booksellers a monopoly of the sale of ordnance maps in England for a term of years; and, if so, what consideration has been given for this privilege, and why were not open tenders invited from the trade for so valuable a concession?

MR. HIBBERT: A temporary arrangement has been made to the effect stated, under pressure of circumstances, until January 1, 1887, when the new general arrangements will come into force, after public competition. Messrs. Stanford were selected because they already did the largest business in ordnance maps. The trade remains in the same position as before, Messrs. Stanford being bound to give the same discount to them as was allowed by the Office of Works.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — OVER- PRESSURE IN BOARD SCHOOLS—DR. CRICHTON BROWNE'S REPORT.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether any action has been taken by the Department, or the London School Board, in consequence of Dr. Crichton Browne's Report, presented last year to Parliament; and, whether anything is likely to be done to mitigate the evils of over-pressure therein declared to exist?

MR. MUNDELLA: The London School Board is at present conducting a searching inquiry into the allegations made in Dr. Crichton Browne's Report, all of which relate to London schools. The Education Department has taken no steps in consequence of that Report, inasmuch as long before anything was heard of it provisions were introduced into the Code which, by general testimony, have done all that the Central Government can do to prevent over-pressure.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—SCHOOL BOARD TAXATION.

LORD ALGERNON PERCY asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether, before moving the Education Estimates, he will lay before Parliament a separate statement of the Local Taxation imposed by School Boards throughout Great Britain?

MR. MUNDELLA: I shall be very happy to give the noble Lord the statement he requires as soon as the audited accounts have been furnished to the Department. There are still a large number to come in; and I hope they will come in before I make my annual Statement.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS— EXPENSES OF CANDIDATES — LEGIS- LATION.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Attorney General, When the Government intend to set about the fulfilment of their promise, made last year, to initiate legislation on the subject of the expenses of candidates at Parliamentary elections; and, whether they mean to bring forward a distinct measure, or to include their proposals on this subject in any Bill now before the House?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, he had not forgotten the promise made by the Prime Minister last Session that there should be some legislation on the subject of candidates' expenses at uncontested Parliamentary Elections. He was sorry to say, however, that a good deal of agitation was now being raised to increase the expenses of Returning Officers at elections in view of the extension of the hours of polling, and the Under

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

Sheriffs had taken such action that he thought it necessary to listen to what they had to say before doing anything.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE IRELAND — ASSAULT ON DENIS MURPHY, CASTLEISLAND, CO. KERRY.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What are the facts connected with the wounding of Denis Murphy at Castleisland, county Kerry?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have not yet received a full Report on this subject, and will ask the hon. Member to be good enough to allow me to postpone answering his Question for a few days.

EGYPT THE NILE RAILROAD.

Mr. CHAPLIN asked the Secretary of State for War, If he can state what are Lord Wolsley's proposals, of which he spoke on Tuesday, with regard to the continuance of the Nile Railroad, and whether Her Majesty's Government have yet made up their minds on the subject; whether it is the fact that the making of about 220 miles of Railway, in different sections, along certain parts of the Nile between Wady Halfa and the south end of the Hannoth cataract, would afford the means of continuous communication either by rail or by water, navigable for steamboats or other large boats, the whole of the way from Siout to Ambukol at all seasons of the year; was such a railroad commenced by the ex-Khedive of Egypt, and were large quantities of rails and other materials transported beyond Wady Halfa, and deposited on the banks of the Nile for its construction; can he say whether there is any of that material left on the Nile, and still available for that purpose; has the whole of the route necessary for such a railroad along the banks of the Nile, and again from Ambukol across the Desert to Khartoum, been already thoroughly surveyed by a competent engineer, and are the facilities for making it infinitely greater than for making a Railway from Suakin to Berber; were the Government advised by Lord Wolsley to make any part or parts of the railroad along the Nile for purposes of transport last year; and, can he say when it is proposed to despatch the reinforcements, asked for by Lord Wolsley, to Korti?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Lord Wolsley originally proposed to continue the Wady Halfa Railway—which was completed when we commenced operations from Angash to Sarras—to a more southerly terminus at Absarat. Later he has restricted his proposals to an extension from Sarras to Ferket, about 62 miles to the southward, and above the Dal rapids. Of this extension 15 miles have been already constructed. He also requires light tramways to be laid at Fatmeh and Kaibar, where there are cataracts. It is believed that with this assistance there will be a practicable route by rail and water available at all seasons as far as Korti. The ex-Khedive commenced the Wady Halfa Railway, and laid the rails as far as Sarras, leaving at Wady Halfa 16 miles of rails. These have been utilized in the extension of 15 miles to which I allude above, and no other materials remain available on the spot. The route has been surveyed for the purpose of a permanent railway, involving heavy rock cuttings, possibly some tunnels, and one or more bridges across the Nile. The line required by Lord Wolsley is a surface railway, and the facilities for its construction—the presence of an enemy in the neighbourhood excepted—are probably less than those for the construction of the line from Suakin to Berber. Last summer Lord Wolsley recommended the extension of the railway towards Ambukol, which was sanctioned; but the work was stopped by him on the 28th of October in consequence of the dearth of native labour. Subsequently operations were resumed, with the result I have already mentioned. Lord Wolsley does not wish to have reinforcements on the Upper Nile before the autumn. We have been in almost daily communication with Lord Wolsley on the subject; but have only just received the information necessary for coming to a decision, which will be arrived at without delay.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Will the cost of this railway be a charge on the taxpayers of this country, or on the finances of Egypt?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am afraid it will be a charge on the taxpayers of this country.

Afterwards,

MR. CHAPLIN asked the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War a Question arising out of that put by him just now with reference to the Nile Railway. He understood the noble Marquess to say that facilities for making a permanent railroad along the Nile would be less than the facilities from Suakin to Berber. What he wished to know was, Whether that observation applied to the making of a purely military line along the Nile?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes, Sir; I think so; but it is only a matter of opinion. I adhere to that opinion. At Suakin we have a base on the sea to which all our necessary plant can be forwarded without any great difficulty. At Wady Halfa the base is a considerable distance inland; and it is necessary to forward the plant first to Cairo, then from Cairo to Assiout, and finally by water transport a considerable distance to Wady Halfa.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)—THE BATTLE OF TAMAI—MR. CATHIE, R.N.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether Mr. Cathie, a gunner in the Royal Navy, who was recommended by General Graham for bravery at the battle of Tamai, has as yet received any recognition for his services on that occasion?

MR. CAINE (who replied) said: The notice of Mr. Cathie in Major General Graham's despatch is in these words—

"Brigadier General Buller also specially noticed Mr. R. A. Cathie, gunner, of Her Majesty's ship Sphinx."

This favourable mention of Mr. Cathie in the despatch will not be lost sight of; but it is not proposed to confer upon him any special mark of recognition.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Will there be a reward of any kind?

MR. CAINE: No reward of any kind, beyond the recognition he has received with the despatch.

NAVY—ORPHANS OF WARRANT OFFICERS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he can state when the Admiralty will come to a decision on the subject of granting a compassionate allowance to the orphans of Warrant Officers in the Royal Navy?

MR. CAINE (who replied) said: In dealing with the question of the grant of compassionate allowances to the children of Warrant Officers of the Navy who lose their lives in the service of the Crown, the Admiralty have thought it expedient to consult the Secretary of State for War, similar claims being under consideration in the Army. I trust that an early decision will be arrived at.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS NOT SUPPORTED BY PRIVATE SUBSCRIPTIONS—SCALE OF FEES.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, If he will state the number, if any, of voluntary schools which have no income from private subscriptions, but which are supported by school fees and Government grants; and if he will state the scale of fees usually adopted in those schools?

MR. MUNDELLA: I cannot at once supply the information asked, as the Return will require the examination of the balance-sheets of 19,000 schools; but I shall be very happy to settle with the hon. Member the form of a Return which will give such information at the expiration of a year. I think it should refer to all schools—Board and Voluntary.

MINES REGULATION ACT—USWORTH COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. BURT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will appoint a competent legal gentleman to represent the Home Office at the Coroner's inquiry into the explosion at Usworth Colliery?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, a competent legal gentleman had already been appointed.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)—LISTS OF CASUALTIES.

MR. BRYCE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, considering the delays which have occurred in publishing the lists of casualties to non-commissioned officers and privates serving in the Soudan, and the anxiety of the relatives of these soldiers as to their safety, the War Office can arrange to have complete lists of killed and wounded published in England as soon as they are received from Egypt; and, whether he will impress on the military authorities in the field the importance of supplying such lists of casualties to private soldiers, as well as to officers, as soon as they can possibly do so without risk of error?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: There is no avoidable delay in the publication of these lists. They are telegraphed from abroad as soon as the information can be collected after an action, and they are published at home directly the names and numbers can be verified. This process takes longer in the case of men than of officers, as the verification of the former has to be made from the pay lists of the regiments, where there are often several soldiers of the same name. In the case of officers, The Army List at once settles any question of identity.

EGYPT WAR IN THE SUDAN)— WATER SUPPLY—PIPES AND PUMPS.

COLONEL STANLEY (for Mr. W. H. SMITH) asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is the fact that an experimental pipe-water service was laid down at Aldershot last year and tested, in order to ascertain the feasibility of supplying water by pumps from Suakin on the road to Berber; that the pipes and pumps were supplied by English makers, and that the experiment was entirely satisfactory; but that no opportunity was afforded to those manufacturers to tender for or to supply the pumps which are required for the water supply from Suakin, and that without calling for any tenders in England the pumps have been ordered from New York?

MR. BRAND (who replied) said: Experiments on a small scale were made at Aldershot with apparatus made by English makers, but supplied by Mr. Tweddle, an American gentleman, who has had great and recent experience on petroleum lines. The trial proved successful, and resulted in Mr. Tweddle being intrusted with the supply of pipes and pumps for the first 50 miles. The pipes have been obtained in England; but Mr. Tweddle preferred to operate with pumps from New York, which had the additional advantage of being ready to hand. It has already been stated that it is not contemplated by the War Office to use American apparatus for other sections. As this question has attracted considerable attention, I may, perhaps, be allowed to add that at the time engines of a similar class were working on this identical system in America, and I thought it desirable to purchase one of these engines in order to secure a pattern.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked whether it was the case that no pumps or engines of that character were to be obtained in England?

MR. BRAND said, the Government were aware these pumps existed in New York, and had been used by New York gentlemen, and Mr. Tweddle certified that they would answer the purpose for which they were required. Under the circumstances, the Government considered it the best plan to purchase engines that had been used in New York.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the hon. Gentleman had not answered the Question. It was not whether the engines were known to exist in America; but whether the Department thought they could not be got in England?

MR. BRAND said, that although considerable interest attached to the experiments at Aldershot, which were described in the public Press at the time, the Government were never informed by any English manufacturers that they had the particular pumps wanted in their possession. It was the intention of the War Office, having got the pattern, to employ English manufacturers in future.

MR. STAVELEY HILL asked whether all the pipes to be employed were to be purchased in England?

MR. BRAND: Yes.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)— MARTINI HENRYS FOR THE YEOMANRY.

MR. MONTAGUE QUEST asked the Secretary of State for War, When there is any prospect of the Yeomanry being armed with the Martini-Henry Carbine instead of the Snider; and, whether there are not a sufficient number in store to enable them to be provided with those arms at once?

MR. BRAND (who replied) said: There is a fair supply of these carbines in store; but the Secretary of State is not at present prepared to sanction their issue to the Yeomanry.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACT — REPAYMENT OF LOANS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to the Minute which the Treasury have resolved to issue, altering the terms on which loans are to be given for the purposes of the Labourers' Act, What will be the amount of the annual instalment payable, for each of the terms of years to be adopted by the Minute, in respect of each £100 borrowed?

MR. HIBBERT: The annuity for 35 years would be £4 16s. 2d. or thereabouts; for 40 years £4 13s. 4d.; and for 45 years £4 12s. 5d.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—MURDER OF FRANCIS HUGHES, KEADY, CO. ARMAGH.

MR. DEASY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is intended that the three Orangemen charged with the murder of Francis Hughes, a Catholic, within a few perches of the Orange Hall at Keady, county Armagh, shall be tried at the assizes of Armagh, in which county the jury panel is very largely composed of members of the Orange Society; and, whether it is intended to change the venue so as to ensure an impartial trial?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The Attorney General for Ireland has this matter under consideration at present.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND) — CASE OF THOMAS LYDON.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Were charges of drunkenness and assault brought against the Recess police by Thomas Lydon on the 31st October 1884; why was not a sworn inquiry granted, as demanded, and were the charges forwarded; did the police at Recess then bring two charges against Thomas Lydon, and were the cases dismissed; did the police then bring a charge against Thomas Lydon in connection with illicit whiskey, and was it dismissed on the merits; did the police appeal in the latter case, and did the Recorder of Galway attribute partiality to the Bench who dismissed the case, consisting as it did of two resident magistrates; was Lydon then convicted; and, will the Government obtain from the resident magistrates their opinion on the case, and consider the advisability of remitting the fine?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: This Question, which obviously involves local inquiries in the West of Ireland, only appeared on the Paper to-day; and I must ask the hon. Member to be good enough to postpone it until Thursday next.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—CONSTITUTION OF THE BOARD.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Honourable Charles Bourke is to continue Chairman of the Irish Prisons Board; whether it is the fact that Captain Barlow and Sir John Lentaigne are to retire; and, whether it is intended that an English medical man is to go to Ireland periodically to report on Irish prisons?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Mr. Bourke will retain the office of Chairman of the Prisons Board. Captain Barlow is about to retire; but Sir John Lentaigne will continue, as at present, an unpaid member of the Board. It is not the intention of the Irish Government to employ an English medical man, as suggested in the Question. Dr. McCabe, at present an Inspector under the Local Government Board, will be appointed medical officer to the Prisons Board.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (SCOTLAND)—SCOTCH FISHERIES COMMISSIONERS.

MR. MUNRO-FERGUSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the recommendations on the subject of fisheries made in the Report of the Crofters Commission, it is intended by the Government to take any action on that branch of the Report; and, whether those localities named by the Commissioners as requiring piers or harbours will be inspected by official engineers, in order that they may report on the practicability of giving effect to those recommendations?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: This is a matter which will have to be considered in connection with the Report of the Piers and Harbours Committee for Scotland. The suggestion of my hon.

Friend, that the other places referred to in the Report should be officially examined, I think well deserves consideration.

EGYPT AND THE SULTAN—SPEECH OF PRINCE BISMARCK IN THE REICHSTAG.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the important statements made by Prince Bismarck in the German Reichstag on Monday, and especially to the following passage:—

"Being further asked whether I would not give my opinion as to what might be done, I said, If I were an English Minister I would not advise the annexation of Egypt, but, at the same time, I admitted that it was necessary for England to establish a certain security of position in this connecting link between her European and her Asiatic possessions. In my opinion, however, I said, she could only gain this position through the Sultan, and thus avoid coming into contact with Turkey. Therefore, said I, if I were an English Minister, I would seek the mediation of the Sultan, in order through him to obtain a position in Egypt by means of which English interests would be safeguarded."

and, whether, in order to safeguard the vital interests of England in Egypt, Her Majesty's Ministers will adopt this counsel?

MR. GLADSTONE: Perhaps I am entirely behind the world in not having seen the text of the speech of Prince Bismarck. With regard to the suggestion in the Question, I may say that at all times in the regulation of our proceedings in Egypt—under circumstances of great difficulty—we have been very desirous indeed, and continue very desirous, to recognize the rights of the Sultan. That is the principle on which we proceed; but as to the application of it, of course I reserve a discretion on behalf of the Government according to circumstances.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

SIR FARDLEY WILMOT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will afford him facilities for bringing on his Motion for a Select Committee on Irish Manufacturing and Productive Industries, now standing on the Paper for Tuesday 10th March, and the appointment of which was promised by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in the Autumn

Session, when the matter was fully discussed in debate?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am unable to give any facilities to the hon. Member until after the Parliamentary Elections Redistribution Bill has passed. I am not aware that at the present moment there is any very particular necessity for departing from the usual course in order to give the hon. Member an opportunity of testing the opinions of the House upon the Motion he has obtained. He will have, doubtless, opportunities of availing himself of the facilities given him by the Ballot. I perfectly understand the feeling of the hon. Member on the subject, and shall be happy to see what can be more particularly done should he address me a Question on the subject later on. What we propose on Monday is to begin with the Supplemental Army Estimates in Supply. The remainder of the Civil Service Estimates will be taken after the Army Estimates, if time permits; but, at any rate, we shall not continue Supply beyond 11 o'clock, in order that we may then bring on the Motion of the Under Secretary of State for India with respect to the Indian troops.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I should like to understand whether the Vote of Credit will be brought on before the Budget. Another Question I might ask is, when we may expect the communication with regard to the arrangements for the final administration of Egypt?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think it may be taken for granted that the Vote of Credit will be taken before the Budget; but I do not think it is likely either of them will be taken before Easter, owing to the great pressure upon the time of the House. I am not able to name a day when the arrangements in regard to Egyptian finance will be before the House. I am bound to say that the House and right hon. Gentlemen opposite who put Questions on the subject at a very early date have exercised very great patience. I make that admission freely; and I certainly had not the smallest expectation at the end of November, when Questions were put on the subject, that so long a time would be occupied in the settlement. The House is aware that we are dependent upon others, whom we have no right to call to account by reason of the despatch or slowness of their proceedings; but I feel confident that when Papers are submitted to the House they will show that there has been no slackness or delay on the part of the Government. However, if the delay should continue much longer, I must admit it may become a question whether we should not depart from the usual rule, and produce Papers even without the consent of others concerned.

MR. COURTNEY asked if the Supplementary Estimates were to be the first Order on Monday, which included a sum of about £100,000 for the proposed railway? He would like to know whether they would have by Monday morning the promised Papers for the Suakin-Berber Railway?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he could not tell whether Papers would be in the hands of Members before Monday; but he would see whether it could be done. He was not aware that any Paper had been promised, except that containing the arrangement entered into with Messrs. Lucas and Aird.

MR. COURTNEY inquired whether the Supplementary Votes with respect to the railway works would be postponed, if the Papers were not produced on Monday?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he thought the sums required for the construction of the railway were included in the Supplementary Estimates, and he did not think it would be possible to separate them.

REDISTRIBUTION OF SEATS (IRELAND) —REPORTS OF THE BOUNDARY COMMISSIONERS.

MR. SMALL asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, in view of the manner in which the Boundary Commissioners in Ireland have divided several counties by townlands, not adhering to either barony or parish boundaries, and of the great dissatisfaction occasioned thereby, and also in view of the very small scale on which the maps inserted in the Report have been drawn, he can see his way to furnish Members with maps of the contentious counties in Ireland on the scale of six inches to the mile, reproduced from the townland ordnance maps, showing thereon the proposed divisional boundaries?

Mr. Gladstone

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I am not aware that there is any great dissatisfaction occasioned by the adoption of townlands as the unit for division, where it was necessary to do so for the purpose of equalizing the population. The townland is a well-known area, and does not, like parishes, overlap either counties or baronies. The scale adopted for the maps is the same as that adopted for both England and Scotland. The size of the 6-inch maps altogether precludes their being furnished to Members, as suggested. For example, the townland map of Donegal is about 36 feet square, and that of Antrim 30 feet by 24 feet. In fact, the maps would be 24 times the size of those in the Report.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)—OB- SERVANCE OF THE RULES OF CIVILIZED WARFARE.

In reply to Colonel NOLAN,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the responsibility of bringing about an observance of the rules of civilized warfare in the Soudan must be left to the General commanding, who would surely use all efforts to secure such observance.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRAWLING—THE REPORT.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he could explain how it was that the Report of the Royal Commission on Trawling was in The Times on Wednesday, and all the Scottish papers yesterday, and had not yet been delivered to the Members of this House; and, whether the blame rested on the printer at the Home Office?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he must inform his hon. and gallant Friend that there was no printer at the Home Office. When Reports of Commissions were presented, they were printed under the direction of this House. If his hon. and gallant Friend had given him a day's Notice, he would have inquired into the matter; but he would now ascertain for him what had happened in regard to this Report.

REDISTRIBUTION OF SEATS (SCOT- LAND)—BOROUGHs AND BURGHs.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Before we go into Committee on the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill, I should like to ask the right hon. Baronet who is in charge of the Bill, the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he could not arrange a conference of English and Scotch Members with the view of some compromise in the spelling of the word "borough," so as to avoid, in connection with Bills applying to the whole of the United Kingdom, the shocking mispronunciation of the word "burgh" as applied to Scotch burghs by Members of this House?

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) (re-committed) BILL.

(Mr. Gladstone, The Marquess of Hartington, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Attorney General, The Lord Advocate, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman)

[BILL 49.] COMMITTEE.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.] [FOURTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Main Question (3rd March), "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" for Committee on the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill.

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. PARNELL: I cannot allow this stage of the Bill to be taken without expressing the strongest protest in my power against the deliberate system of jerrymandering which the Boundaries Commission in Ireland has been guilty of with regard to certain of the Ulster counties, and also with regard to the City and County of Dublin. I confess that I was very much disappointed at the nature of the action taken by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke). I expected from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) the partizan defence which he made the other day of the proceedings of the Boundary Commission. Demoralized as the right hon. Gentleman must have been, more or less, by his contact with Dublin Castle officials, nothing else could have been expected than that he, a leading Radical in England, the exponent for many years of the rights of the people to self-government and to full representation, should have changed his skin when he went over to Ireland, and should have become there a Tory of the Tories. But from the President of the Local Government Board certainly I expected better things. I did not expect that he would have devoted his great and distinguished talents to a special pleading defence of the proceedings of the Irish Boundaries Commission; and I should have hoped that he would have contented himself with pointing out the necessities of the case and of his position; the fact that a compromise had been arrived at between the Head of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition; and that the Government were, therefore, bound by the details settled by the Commission, imperfect and unfair and one-sided as many of those details undoubtedly are to the Catholic population of the North of Ireland. We complain of the jerrymandering of certain counties in the North, because it was impossible for the Commission to act unfairly with any constituencies, except the City and County of Dublin, outside Ulster; and because we do not complain of the proceedings of the Commission outside the Province of Ulster, the Government are not entitled to claim from us any gratitude or appreciation of the proceedings of that Commission. Wherever in an Ulster county it was possible for them by any device, no matter how barefaced, to obtain for the English Party—I call them the English Party in Ireland, because I think that more correctly designates them than the title of the "loyal minority," which they have assumed—a seat, though the Catholic population was in an overwhelming majority, as in Donegal, they did so. Wherever it was possible, on the other hand, for them to deprive the Catholics of a seat where they were the small part of the population, they did so. They were not guided by the precedents which they set up for themselves—they went upon one rule in one county, when it suited the English Party, and they followed an exactly contrary rule in other counties. In fact, the Irish Boundaries Commission only too well fulfilled the prediction which the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board ventured upon at the close of last Session, when he said that it was impossible to find men free from political bias for the services in question. The Irish Boundary Commissioners have shown themselves entirely regardless of that spirit of fair play which has, so far as I am able to learn, distinguished the proceedings of their brothers in England. How is the North of Ireland situated with regard to the division of political Parties? The Catholics of the Province of Ulster number close upon one-half of the entire population. There was only a difference of 2 or 3 per cent in the respective boroughs of Catholics and Protestants. Allowing, for the sake of argument—although I shall not allow it any further—that the English Party—the Whigs and Tories—can claim all the Protestants in Ireland as belonging to their fold, and we claim, as we undoubtedly can do—all the Catholics as belonging to us, the representation of Ulster should have been very nearly evenly distributed between the two English Parties on one side, and the Irish Party on the other. What has been the result? Out of 33 Members the English Parties will take something like 23, leaving only 10 to the Catholics. Now, it is manifest upon the face of it that such a scheme as that cannot be fair to the Catholics of the North of Ireland; and a very noteworthy fact is that in the only Province where it was possible for them to act unfairly the Commissioners have made the largest number of alterations—in fact, made all the alterations which have been made, with the exception of those made in the City and County of Dublin. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) disputed the accuracy of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy's) figures as to the number of alterations, and said that the number of alterations outside Ulster was larger than that given by my hon. and learned Friend. But the right hon. Gentleman forgot, in his anxiety to defend a weak case, to inform the House that the alterations outside Ulster were merely nominal, and in some cases involved only the change of name. In Mayo the Island of Achill was added to one division instead of the other. Inside Ulster every alteration made had an effect upon the balance of political Parties. It was scarcely candid of the right hon. Gentleman to make a point of so technical a character, and to put forward merely technical alterations as evidence of the inaccuracy of my hon. and learned Friend's statement. That statement was perfectly accurate, so far as the arguments of the Nationalist Party are concerned. Seven alterations were made in Ulster, of which six were in favour of the English Parties, and one partially in our favour. In the three other Provinces there are 70 Members; whereas in Ulster there are only 33. But in those three Provinces there were only two alterations of any account, and those had reference to the City and County of Dublin. These two constituencies are the only constituencies outside Ulster where it was possible for the Commissioners, by deviating from the original scheme, to punish us and serve their friends. The bias of these Commissioners has been rendered very evident by the details which have been given by my hon. Friends the Members for Sligo and Monaghan (Mr. Sexton and Mr. Healy). I cannot think that the Commissioners could have taken it upon themselves to act as they have done, unless they got a hint from some higher quarter. We have the fact of the published letter of the Marquess of Salisbury, who, being in a position of greater freedom and less responsibility than any Member of the Government, did not think it necessary to cloak his views in any way; and he wrote, after the publication of the original scheme of the Boundary Commission with regard to Ulster, to his discontented Conservative friends that the future position of what he called the "loyal minority in Ulster" would depend very much upon the spirit in which the Boundaries Commissioners approached their work. I do not think that the Boundaries Commissioners would have felt themselves bound to regard the hint from the Marquess of Salisbury; and I shall believe, until the contrary is shown, that they would not have ventured upon such daring and one-sided action as has been theirs without a hint from some high quarter or personage in Ireland that the Government would stand by and defend their action, as, in fact, it has been defended by the President of the Local Government Board and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. I do not wish to go into the details of the jerry-mandering in the North of Ireland, which have been sufficiently explained by my hon. Friends; but I will give one or two salient facts with regard to each county which will show the direction and the nature and extent of this jerry-mandering. Take, for instance, the County Antrim. We had lately a very interesting debate on the representation of minorities, and the position of the

"loyal minority" in Ireland was brought forward as a forcible argument on behalf of the scheme which was proposed in favour of proportional representation, at all events, in Ireland; and I am convinced that under the very best and most favourable system of proportional representation which could be devised you would not secure for the English Parties in Ireland so large a representation as has been secured for them by the proportional system of the Boundaries Commission. What will the House say to the County Antrim, entitled, under the redistribution scheme, to four Members? In Antrim a population of 50,000 Catholics will not have a single Member to represent them. Has the Catholic minority in the county of Antrim no claim for consideration upon the lines which have been adopted? Take, again, the county of Armagh. Forty-seven per cent of the population of Armagh are Catholics, and all the Catholics have been put into one division, so as to make it absolutely certain, so far as the Boundaries Commission could make it, that out of the three seats to be allotted only one should be Catholic. Take the case of the county of Tyrone, entitled under the scheme to four Members. One parish, containing 21 Protestant townlands, has been taken out of one barony and added to another, so as to secure that the Protestants of Tyrone should have representation; although in the case of the County Antrim, where there were 50,000 Catholics, the Commissioners, with equal care and solicitude, contrived that for them there should be no representation whatever. Take the case of the county of Londonderry, entitled to two Members. Well, there has been gross unfairness. The Solicitor General for Ireland, at the preliminary inquiry which was held after the publication of the scheme, objected by counsel to the divisions; and it has been contrived in such a way that, although there are 47 per cent of Catholics in Londonderry, they shall not have the slightest chance of gaining one of the seats; indeed, the divisions, as shown on the map issued by the Boundaries Commission, are a curiosity in themselves for those who are anxious to study geography. By the original scheme the Catholics were massed in one of the divisions; but in order to secure that both seats in the county of Londonderry shall go to the English Parties, the Catholics have been taken away from the Catholic division, and Protestants taken away from the Protestant division of Coleraine barony and added to the Catholic division, so as to make matters sufficiently sure. In the original scheme of the Commissioners, for the county of Londonderry there were 37,000 Catholics in the Catholic division, the total population of which consisted of 70,000. It was manifest that if the division were left so that 37,000 Catholics would outnumber the 33,000 Protestants, it would carry one of the divisions for the Irish National Party. Therefore 3,000 Catholics were taken away and transferred to the Protestant division; and a certain number of Protestants were taken from the Protestant division and transferred to the Catholic division, so as to make things absolutely and entirely safe. Fancy the Whigs and Tories dividing the county between them as the result of a combination which we have heard of recently! The case of Donegal is the exact converse of what occurred in Antrim. Donegal is almost exclusively Catholic, and the same tactics have been adopted as in the other counties I have mentioned. There are 85 per cent of Catholics in the county of Donegal. [LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Seventy-five per cent.] I am willing to accept the noble Lord's figures. The correction of the noble Lord leaves the case of Donegal practically untouched as regards the relative proportions of the two Parties. The fact remains that whereas in the case of Antrim, where a fourth of the population are Catholics, the Commissioners managed that they should have no representation, in the case of Donegal, where a quarter of the population are Protestants, of all sects, the Commissioners have contrived so to jerry-mander the boundaries that they shall have a Conservative Representative. In doing so, they have forgotten the principle which the President of the Local Government Board insisted upon as his defence in reference to the County Down, when he said it would not have been right for the Commissioners to cross a lake a mile wide. In the case of Donegal, in order to jerry-mander, they have crossed Lough Swilly, which is 20 miles wide. With regard to the county of Dublin, any one who looks at a map will see that they have run in and out and roundabout in a most extraordinary way, so as to give the Protestant or the English Party a good chance of securing one of the seats to which they are not entitled. In regard to the City of Dublin they have acted still more unfairly. In the Bill the boundaries of the City of Belfast are extended so as to increase the population very materially, and to give to Belfast four Members, the present number being only two. The boundaries are extended in the case of Belfast, in accordance with the Report of the Hexham Royal Commission, which recommends that the boundaries shall be extended for municipal purposes. That Hexham Commission also investigated the case of Dublin, where a similar extension of boundaries was sought for municipal purposes. The extension of the boundaries for Parliamentary purposes, following the example of Belfast, was pressed upon the Government and upon the Commissioners; but it was refused. If the Parliamentary boundaries had been extended in the case of Dublin, the city would have been given six Members instead of four. On the basis of the Report of the Commission referred to, Dublin is entitled to an extension of boundaries similar to that which has been given to Belfast. I fail to see any satisfactory reason why Dublin should be denied the proper extension which has been conceded in the case of Belfast. The Commissioners have not been content to deny to Dublin the extension given to Belfast, but they have materially departed from the original scheme; they have broken up the wards; they have crossed the river; and they have committed the most extraordinary freaks, so as to secure that parts of the city where there is a very slight majority of the Nationalist Party shall be leavened by an infusion of electors belonging to the English Party. They have also taken away from some parts of the city a portion of the Nationalist strength, and thrown it over to quarters where there is a considerable proportion of electors belonging to the English Party. The cases of Ulster and of the City and the County of Dublin are the only instances in which it was possible for the Boundary Commissioners to treat the Catholics and the Nationalist Party unfairly, and they have done their best to prove once more that it is impossible for an English Government in Ireland to act with fair play to the majority of the people. Some better treatment is due from the Government to the Catholics of Ulster. Those people are the descendants of a sorely oppressed race. They are the survivors of a deliberate attempt to exterminate, by the plantation of Ulster, the Catholics of the North; and if they have increased and multiplied there again it is a striking tribute to the vitality of the Celtic race. Notwithstanding all the efforts made to diminish their numbers, the Catholics of Ulster are now almost equal with the Protestant population of the district. They have survived persecution and triumphed over unjust laws. That which has been done by the Boundary Commissioners will be remembered by the Catholics of Ulster in the near future, when they join hands with the rest of their countrymen throughout Ireland in the impending struggle for the Constitutional vindication of their rights, a struggle which I hope will be the last. This population is entitled, in all the circumstances of the case, to better treatment than they have received. It is all very well to talk about the necessities of representing English Parties; the so-called loyal minority in Ireland will have been abundantly represented. And it does not deserve exceptional treatment at the hands of Parliament. The loyal minority, as they call themselves, have done more to perpetuate disaffection and embarrass and endanger the Empire than every Fenian agitator from New York to San Francisco. England placed them in Ireland in days gone by as the English garrison, and well have they served their patrons. The garrison so persecuted and so exterminated the people that England was compelled to manacle and hinder them by special legislation, and was compelled to send over and maintain in Ireland vast garrisons of armed men for their protection. At the present moment they had 33,000 valuable soldiers in Ireland for the sake of its so-called "loyal minority;" and would the loyal minority go to Egypt for England and fight the battles there? Would it go to India and protect England from Russian encroachments on the Afghan Frontier? Oh, no; that did not enter into the calculations of these men. No doubt there have been, and there are still, brave men amongst them; but, on the whole, they have shown themselves to be a selfish and an inconsiderate race, mindful only of their own ends, and little regarding the interests of the Empire. The Catholics of Ulster have been practically deprived of representation in Parliament. Until my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) was returned there was no Catholic Member for the real Ulster Province. It is not fair that the Catholics of Ireland should be treated as they are. I trust that the able way in which our case has been presented by my hon. Friends the Members for Monaghan and Sligo (Mr. Healy and Mr. Sexton) will have an effect upon the conscience and mind of the House, and that it will be able to remedy the injustice that has been done us when the Bill gets into Committee.

Mr. SHAW LEFFEVRE said, the hon. Member for the City of Cork had used strong language; but he was not in the House on Wednesday afternoon, when his case was stated by the hon. Members for Monaghan and Sligo (Mr. Healy and Mr. Sexton), and he did not hear the reply of the President of the Local Government Board to those two hon. Members. He had now spoken with great force; but he had not added a single fact to those brought before the House on Wednesday, nor was it possible to add much to the reply which had been already given. What was the charge they had made against the Boundary Commissioners of Ireland? They alleged, in the first place, that Earl Spencer gave hints to the Commissioners contrary to the instructions given to them publicly; and that, in pursuance of those hints, the Commissioners had dealt with the question unfairly, and had jerrymandered the districts in Ulster for the benefit of the Loyal Party, and against the interests of the Nationalist Party. Anyone who knew Earl Spencer—and, indeed, any right-minded man—would say at once that it was impossible that he could have acted the part which was attributed to him. It was totally impossible that Earl Spencer could have given to the Commissioners privately hints different from those he gave to them in his commission. It was unnecessary to ask Earl Spencer a question on the subject; but he had received a letter from Mr. Piers White, one of the Commissioners, in which he said—

"The Commissioners never had the slightest communication, directly or indirectly, from Earl Spencer or anyone else in the Irish Government as to the mode in which our duties were to be discharged beyond the public instructions."

He had received similar communications from two other members of the Commission. Everyone who knew the members of the Commission would admit at once that it was totally impossible that they could have acted otherwise than in strict accordance with the public instructions which had been issued, and he hoped they would hear no more on that point. His right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board stated, on Wednesday, that the official schemes of the Commissioners were merely tentative; that they were prepared without any local knowledge of the districts to which they applied; and that they were submitted merely with a view to inquiry.

Mr. HEALY: How was it that they suited the three Southern Provinces?

Mr. SHAW LEFFEVRE said, his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board explained that in the Southern Provinces the Nationalists were so completely in command of the constituencies that it did not matter which boundary was adopted. That accounted for the fact that the changes were not so numerous in those Provinces as in the Province of Ulster. The hon. Member for the City of Cork had stated that the Commissioners in Ulster had given but one decision in favour of the Nationalist Party. He thought the hon. Member was wrong, and that Down was not the only case. In the case of Armagh objection was taken to the Commissioners' scheme by all parties—Mr. HEALY: Nothing of the kind.—and the decision arrived at by the Commissioners was more in favour of the scheme of the Nationalists than that of any other Party. He had gone carefully into these various schemes with the President of the Local Government Board; and he would undertake to say that every one of them might be defended on their merits. When these schemes came to be discussed in Committee, the Government would undertake to prove that in every instance the Commissioners had acted rightly according to the instructions given to them, and they could not be accused of having decided unfairly against the Nationalist Party. He denied that any jerrymandering had taken place in the interests of the Protestant Party of Ulster. With regard to Donegal all Parties, including the Nationalists, objected to the Commissioners' scheme, and the main objection was, that the two southern baronies had been separated. The Commissioners decided to re-unite the baronies in question in one division, and any independent person who looked at the map could see that the other divisions must follow as a matter of course. The hon. Member for the City of Cork was not correct in stating that Lough Swilly was 20 miles broad; it was not more than four miles across at any part. Looking at the division of Donegal, he contended that it was a legitimate one, and one which thoroughly carried out the instructions of the Commissioners—namely, that the divisions should be compact, and that the pursuits of the people should be considered. The people living on either side of Lough Swilly were fishermen, and most of them spoke the Irish language. Much had been said with regard to the decisions of the Commissioners in the case of Dublin County, which had been divided into two divisions. The Commissioners had in this case followed exactly the same plan as was adopted in England and Scotland, especially in the neighbourhood of London. The hon. Member for the City of Cork complained of the conduct of the Commissioners in not extending the boundary of Dublin while they extended the boundary of Belfast. In the case of Belfast the Bill itself proposed to extend the boundary, adding to the borough those parts which the Municipal Boundaries Commissioners of 1881 recommended should be added, and the Commissioners had somewhat extended those limits. With regard to Dublin it was impossible to extend the boundary without adding places which would practically entitle the city to another Member. It was not within the powers of the Commissioners to extend a boundary so as to entitle a place to an additional Member. The hon. Member for the City of Cork, he believed, complained that the Dublin decisions of the Commissioners would have the effect of giving a seat to the Loyalist Party. That was a conclusion very different to that which had been arrived at from a Loyalist point of view; for he believed it was generally considered by the Conservative Party in Dublin that their hopes of returning a Member had been extinguished. The hon. Member for the City of Cork, however, went on to say that he considered that no process of proportional representation would possibly have given the Loyalist Party so large a representation as they would have under the Commissioners' decision, and that in Ulster alone they would obtain 23 seats, besides two from the University and two from Dublin County, or 27 in all. The Protestants formed one-fourth of the whole population of Ireland; and as they hoped that a not inconsiderable portion of the Catholics might remain, as they probably would remain, among the Loyalists, he thought they might assume that the Party was entitled to one-fourth of the number of Members returned by the country, which would be 26 or 27. He hoped the Loyalist Party would be as well off under the Bill as the hon. Member supposed. While the hon. Member for the City of Cork had, probably, taken an exaggerated view of the case, he did not himself take so gloomy a view as some hon. Members opposite above the Gangway. Taking Ireland throughout, and considering that it would be divided into one-Member districts, the Loyalists would secure a fair, though, perhaps, not the full, representation as they were entitled to. There were three counties in Ulster—Donegal, Cavan, and Monaghan—in which the Catholics formed no less than 74 per cent of the population; and if these three counties were taken away, the Protestants formed a considerable majority in the remaining six counties of Ulster. The hon. and learned Member for Monaghan did not take exactly the same view of the number of Members the Loyalists would be able to return. The hon. and learned Member put the number at 23, including the two University Members. Again, he said that was short of the number to which the Protestant Party were entitled by their numbers. [Mr. HEALY: I never said the Protestant Party.] Well, the Loyalist Party. The hon. Member for the City of Cork argued as if the Protestant and Loyalist Party were alike. [Mr. PARNELL: The English Party.] The hon. and learned Member for Monaghan stated the other day that, in his view, the proposal of the Government with regard to the number of Members given to Ireland was just and fair. It did not appear that the hon. and learned Member and his Friends were acting in the same spirit of fairness towards the Loyalist and English Party in Ireland, for their claim was that the 23 Members of the Loyalist Party should be reduced to something like 16 or 17. He did not think that the House would alter the scheme in the direction in which the hon. Member for the City of Cork pointed. There was no change which could be made in that way which would not be open to the charge made against the Commissioners of jerrymandering in the interests of a Party.

MR. PLUNKET said, he had thought that that evening the House would have proceeded calmly with the consideration of the Bill in Committee; but the hon. Member for the City of Cork Mr. Parnell had chosen, for purposes of his own, to make a most violent and unprovoked attack on what he truly called the Loyalist minority in Ireland. This debate had been prolonged in order that the hon. Member for Cork might make that speech—a speech the obvious purpose of which was to prejudice and intercept the discussion of those matters of detail which must turn up by-and-by in Committee, and to produce, by anticipation, upon the House the impression that he and his Friends had been treated with the greatest harshness and oppression in the matter of the Franchise and Redistribution Bills. The hon. Member seemed to think that his Party were entitled to the deepest consideration and gratitude of the Members representing England, Scotland, and Wales, and that the Loyalists were entitled to nothing but the severest treatment that could be heaped upon them by way of revenge. It would be impossible to discuss the former question in detail on this occasion; he would only say in general that he could confirm, as far as his information went, the views put forward by the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. He was assured by his friends, who were well acquainted with Ulster, that, so far from getting any advantage, they were placed at the greatest possible disadvantage by the course taken during the last few weeks; and with regard to the County and City of Dublin, with which he was intimately acquainted, he could speak from his own knowledge. But as to the latter part of his speech he must say that the statement of the hon. Member for the City of Cork exceeded, in perfect sang froid and audacity, anything he had ever heard even from that hon. Gentleman before. The Party which the hon. Member called the English Party was as decidedly an Irish Party as that of the hon. Member himself; but they happened to be the loyal Irish Party. It was not possible to draw the line of the loyal faction and the Separatist Party conterminous with the lines of Protestant and Catholic Ireland; for whilst there could not be found in all Ireland, he believed, 100 or 200 Protestants who were in favour of separation, there were multitudes of men of the Roman Catholic religion who were as loyal as any others. Outside of Ulster there were 300,000 and odd Protestants; and, according to the views of the hon. Member, they had no right even to one seat for Dublin. Why, they were entitled to five or six seats instead of one. And that was the great grievance that the hon. Member brought forward, and the great complaint he made against the action of the Commissioners. He Mr. Plunket did not desire to dwell further on this point; but they knew that, while the Protestants were one-fourth of the population of Ireland, and the whole Loyalist population was certainly one-third, if they took the well-to-do Catholics, who were Loyalists almost to a man, they were not going to get anything like a proportion of Members to which they were entitled, even according to their numbers, under this redistribution scheme. What, however, he wished more particularly to call attention to was another part of the speech of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, which was as gratuitous and unjust a reproach as was ever directed against the Loyalist minority in Ireland. Would it be believed that the hon. Member appealed to the Members for England, Wales, and Scotland, for more favourable treatment of the Nationalists, on the ground that they were entitled to the gratitude of the Members in question and their fellow-countrymen, while the Loyal or English Party in Ireland were not entitled to any gratitude at all? The hon. Member asked—"What have the Loyalists, what have the Protestants ever done for you? What has Ulster done? Think of all the troops that are sent to protect Protestantism in Ireland. Have any of them ever gone to fight your battles? Have any of them spilled their blood for you?" In face of the facts, such language was presuming on the supposed ignorance of the audience to whom it was addressed. What were the facts? He did not believe that there were now more than two regiments in all Ulster; and the Army in Ireland was not there to protect the men of Ulster, who were well able to take care of themselves, but to protect loyal people who were scattered throughout the rest of the country. And as to volunteering, he was glad to know, as a fact, that one Militia regiment in the North of Ireland had already volunteered to go out and take part in the war in Egypt. Who were those whose lives had been sacrificed in the Soudan? What were the names connected with their struggles and difficulties there?

MR. HEALY: Officers or privates?

MR. PLUNKET: Privates as well as officers. Of the 11 officers who fell at Abu Klea, five or seven, he did not know which, were Irishmen. Stewart and Wolseley — were not these Irish names? Gough, Darley, and the others — did they not know them well? And did not the hon. Member know that it was an Irish regiment which was foremost when a prize was offered for the first which arrived at the place of danger? What right had the hon. Member for the City of Cork to claim gratitude for his friends in Ireland at the expense of those whom he called the English faction? Was not Power, the companion of Stewart, a Celt, if there was one? Yet at this time, when his fellow-countrymen, Catholic and Celtic, as well as Protestant, were exposed every day to deadly peril, when Irishmen were daily adding new lustre to the Irish name, the hon. Member for the City of Cork and his Friends, at every meeting of their followers, were calling out for cheers for the Mahdi.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he did not know where the occasion came from for all this indignation on the part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket), except upon the assumption that he had been touched by the spear of truth, and smarted under it. It was the fact, and there was no use denying it, that the gentlemen who called themselves the loyal minority in Ireland had taken the main part in making the country ungovernable by England. The loyal minority had been petted, pampered, and indulged by successive Governments, to the detriment of the majority. How long would they be loyal if they received the treatment which was dealt out to the majority of the Irish people? How long would they be loyal if they had to submit to confiscation and religious persecution? Their loyalty was conditional upon their remaining lords and masters in Ireland, under the protection of the strong arm of England. Which was it better for England, that there should be a loyal minority or a loyal majority in Ireland? He could tell the House that there would never be a loyal majority in Ireland until those who were known as the loyal minority were brought to their senses. Arguments were urged there about the necessity of fully representing the loyal minority; but he would say what about the 2,000,000 Roman Catholics in England — what representation were they to get? The game of the so-called loyal minority had been played by the Boundary Commissioners, who had tricked the Nationalist majority. Their first schemes were impartial, because they were drawn up in London without local knowledge; but when they went to the North of Ireland, and learnt the views of the Tories, the Commissioners at once accepted the suggestions of the Emergency men and the Orange Party.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to a matter brought before the House on Wednesday by the hon. Member for Roxburghshire and the hon. Member for Edinburgh. What was said in the debate on Wednesday by the Chancellor of the Duchy had created great uneasiness amongst the Scotch Members. It seemed to indicate on the part of the Government their intention to give no effect to the proposals which the Lord Advocate submitted to the Scotch Members. These Members felt very grateful to the Lord Advocate for the pains which he had taken in preparing the scheme for the re-grouping of the Scottish burghs. They had devoted two whole days to the discussion of the scheme; and although there were some points on which difference of opinion arose, yet the scheme, as a whole, was very generally approved of. In those circumstances the Scotch Members thought it very strange indeed that the Government should desire to depart wholly from the proposed arrangements. SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No, no! Well, he was very glad to know it was not the intention of the Government to do so; but that was certainly the impression produced on Wednesday. The Chancellor of the Duchy said the proposals were so connected together as to form a kind of puzzle, and if one piece fell out the whole scheme dropped to pieces. The right hon. Gentleman surely could not have read the proposals of the Lord Advocate —

MR. TREVELYAN explained that what he did say was that some of the proposals would involve the fate of others; and he endeavoured to justify that by pointing out that it would be extremely difficult to take one part of the plan and leave the other parts.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE thought that was exactly what he had said.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he was referring to some of the proposals.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, he was happy to have had the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, and to be assured that the impression produced on his mind and the minds of many Scotch Members was an erroneous one, and that the Government really saw their way to carry out some of the proposals. There were several of those proposals as to which the opinion of the Scotch Members was all but unanimous, and there could be no difficulty in carrying these out. There were others which involved debatable questions, and he could understand there would be some difficulty in giving effect to these; but that was no reason for setting aside others that were simple. He trusted, after what was said, that the Government would see their way to put some of the proposals on the Paper shortly. Scotch Members had been expecting to see them on the Paper; and he knew the intention of many of these Members was, that if the Government did not put them down they would themselves do so on their own account, in order that they might be discussed by the Committee. He trusted, however, to see them down on the Paper to-morrow.

MR. BERESFORD said, that as some reference had been made to Armagh

County, he should like to remark that he was present on the occasion of the visit of the Commissioners. They had their map, and it was found that they had not allowed a sufficient number of inhabitants to No. 2 division of Armagh. They were, in fact, 6,000 short of this, and the discrepancy was so great that, of course, it had to be rectified. There was also a Petition from the inhabitants of Ballymore praying to be included in the Mid-Armagh district, which was duly considered. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had talked of the plantation of Ulster. Well, it was probably owing to that plantation that the hon. Gentleman himself came to be an Irishman. If not, how could he account for the estates of Mr. J. Parnell in County Armagh—which, by the way, was reported to be the most rack-rented property in Ulster.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I rise to Order, Mr. Speaker. Is the hon. Member in Order in going into the ancestry and landed possessions of the hon. Member's Mr. Parnell's family?

MR. SPEAKER: The remarks of the hon. Member were becoming irrelevant.

MR. BERESFORD said, of course he bowed to the Speaker's ruling; but, as the hon. Member for the City of Cork had talked about the plantation of Ulster, he Mr. Beresford was showing that the hon. Member must originally have come into Ireland in that way. He did not believe there was a drop of Celtic blood in the hon. Member. The hon. Member had also thrown a doubt on the bravery of the men of the North of Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) had sufficiently made answer on that point; and he would only add one name that had been omitted—a name that was a household word in the North of Ireland, and a name which was heard with pride all over the United Kingdom—that of Charlie Beresford. The loyal minority had to complain that instead of being unduly represented they would not be as sufficiently represented as they ought to be in future Parliaments.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR, in reply to his hon. Friend the Member for Kilnarnock Burghs (Mr. Dick-Peddie), said there was every desire on the part of the Government to place before the House those portions of the proposals to which he had referred.

and which were found to have had prevalent or very general assent. There were certain parts as to which it was found that that condition did not exist; and, consequently, there were some of the proposals which would not be submitted to the House by the Government, and, as the Chancellor of the Duchy had said, that would also involve, so far, the fate of certain others by a certain measure of re-arrangement. But those portions as to which there had been, and still was, as the Government believed, a general assent would be put on the Paper, and possibly certain modifications made in some of those which were involved more or less in some of those portions which would have to be dropped. That was all that the Government would do. Of course, it would be quite open to any hon. Member to put on the Paper such further additions in the same direction, or in a different direction, as they might think fit, and they would be duly considered.

MR. RAMSAY thanked the hon. Member (Mr. Dick-Peddie) for bringing forward this matter as to the grouping of the burghs in Scotland, and the re-arrangement which was brought before the conference of Scottish Members. He thought it would have been a very strange thing if the views of the Scottish Members regarding the arrangements for Scotland had failed to be carried out by the Government; because the Scotch Members met for the purpose of considering the schemes that were laid before them, and in the majority of cases they approved of them. What met with general approbation should surely be carried out. For example, in the case of the five burghs that he had the honour to represent, each of them had agreed to the proposition that had been made to dissolve the group, or rather to take the returning burgh Falkirk from the group, and to connect another burgh in Lanarkshire with three other burghs which he at present represented in the county, and to form these four Lanarkshire burghs into a group. He had presented Petitions from the members of the Liberal Association in these burghs in favour of this proposal, and they had the assent also of various Town Councils. Therefore, he was glad that the misapprehension amongst Scotch Members as to what was stated by the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Trevelyan) should have been removed in this casual way.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND called the attention of the House to the County of Wicklow, which was divided by the Boundaries Commission into East and West Wicklow, whereas it would be more fairly divided into North and South Wicklow. A great deal had been said about the representation of the "loyal minority" in Ireland. There were 2,000,000 of Catholic Irishmen in England, and they would not be able to return more than one Member to represent them. Except in one division of Liverpool the Catholic Irish minority in England would be unrepresented.

MR. C. S. PARKER said, he was most unwilling to delay even for a few minutes the Speaker leaving the Chair; but there was a point of principle in regard to redistribution of seats in Scotland which could only properly be discussed, he thought, at the present stage. Generally, he thought, Scotland would not trespass much on the time of the House in Committee, because Scotch arrangements were mostly recent, and did not require much re-adjustment. But one part of their electoral system was of an ancient and archaic character—namely, the groups of burghs, which were wholly unsuited for the present time. The question he wished to raise was, in dealing with these groups of burghs, which they had not to deal with in England or Ireland, how far were they placed under restrictions of principle by the understanding that had been come to by the two Front Benches? These burghs were arranged in the most singular manner. He might illustrate it best by referring to the case of his own county. The burgh of Kilmarnock, in Ayrshire, having a population of about 26,000, was conjoined with the capital of Renfrewshire, the capital of Dumbartonshire, and one of the largest towns in Lanarkshire. Again, in the same county, the burgh of Ayr was combined with the capital of Argyllshire and with one town in the extreme North and another in the extreme South of Argyllshire. It was generally agreed that such a combination should be broken up; but when they came to re-arrangement, then arose this difficulty of principle. It seemed to be argued on behalf of the Government that in the re-arrangement they were not to include in a group any burgh which had not at present Parliamentary representation, nor might they add a surrounding district from the county. Then, what remained? A satisfactory arrangement became extremely difficult under such narrow restrictions; and it seemed to him that, the case of Scotland being different from that of England and Ireland, abstract principles which had been arrived at in regard to these two countries should not be applied so rigorously to Scotland. In Ayrshire they had a population which made four quotas, entitling to four Members. They had at present a Member for North Ayrshire, one for South Ayrshire, one for the Kilmarnock, and one for the Ayr Burghs. Surely it seemed a most reasonable arrangement that, in place of distant outlying burghs, they should either give Kilmarnock two or three neighbouring burghs in the county within a few minutes of it by rail, making up a quota, or that they should carve out from the county a district of which Kilmarnock should be the centre. They should deal with the burgh of Ayr in the same way, and in that case they would give to Ayrshire the four Members to which its four quotas entitled it. But if they proceeded otherwise they would have this difficulty. They had a town like Kilmarnock, with a population of 26,000, far above the number that retained representation in England and Ireland, which was a returning burgh, and the Lord Advocate proposed to combine it with Ayr, also a returning burgh, with a population of more than 20,000. If these burghs were of the same character something might be said for this proposal; but Kilmarnock being essentially a manufacturing town, and Ayr being a county town, with agricultural interests connected with it, both the towns objected to that combination, and if an abstract principle were laid down against adding any population not already included in a group, they would be driven to remain under the old-fashioned arrangement. This was a point of principle; and he begged to protest against its being considered that the point of principle had been settled on the second reading, or in the course of the present debate. It should be open to them, on the individual cases as they arose, to propose that one or other of these towns, such as Kilmarnock or Ayr, might be conjoined with neighbouring burghs, or with the neighbouring district in its own county.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he wished to make one remark with reference to observations that fell from the hon. Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. Elliot), who the other day referred to a meeting of Scotch Members, convened by the Lord Advocate, in the Committee Room upstairs, respecting the question of redistribution in Scotland. The hon. Member on that occasion expressed an opinion that the majority of Scotch Members, or, as he went on to say, of Scotch Liberal Members, were in favour of the Lord Advocate's scheme. He regretted that the hon. Member should have made any allusion to Scotch Liberal Members, or that he should have mentioned Liberals at all; because he always considered that a meeting to which the Lord Advocate summoned Scotch Liberal and Conservative Members alike was entirely a non-political meeting. If it was not a non-political meeting, then he thought it would never do to have these meetings at all for the consideration of great Imperial questions. They sat for two days, he might say, in camera, and none of the proceedings were allowed to transpire; and he therefore regretted that any Member who was present should state what were the views of either the Liberals or Conservatives on the occasion. Another point he wished to refer to was that just alluded to by the hon. Member who had just sat down—namely, the way in which this redistribution scheme would affect the county of Ayr, one division of which he had the honour to represent. He might tell the Prime Minister, whom he saw in his place, that the scheme was not popular even with the Liberals of the county of Ayr; because the leading Liberal organ of the county had, week after week, made strong statements against this redistribution scheme, and it went on to suggest that if the House of Commons would not listen to reason an appeal should be made to the calm judgment of the House of Lords, as they called it. The reason why the Liberals objected to the scheme for the county of Ayr was, because it restricted the representation of Ayrshire, which was considered as too much restricted already. Ayrshire, after Lanarkshire, was the most populous county in Scotland, having, at the last Census, a population of 217,000, but now increased to 220,000. Whereas it had now two county Members, and a preponderating influence in returning two burgh Members, it was actually proposed to restrict its representation to two county Members and one burgh Member. It claimed the right to four Members, having a population, as he had said, of 220,000. If they contrasted the treatment which the county of Ayr received with that accorded to the county of Fife, they would see the vast difference between the two, and the justice of what both the Liberals and Conservatives of Ayrshire were saying; because, whereas the county of Fife had a population of only 171,000 at the last Census, it was to have a representation of four Members. That seemed almost inexplicable. But if they went a step further, and took the St. Andrew's group of burghs, which had a population of 19,000 or 20,000, that small and comparatively insignificant group was to retain a Member; while the large burgh of Kilmarnock, which had been from time immemorial a returning burgh, was to be merged for the future in the burghs included in the Ayr group. That had caused great discontent in the burgh of Kilmarnock, and he hoped, at least, that part of the scheme would not be carried out. Then the hon. Member for Fifeshire Mr. Preston Bruce said everything did not depend on numbers. Now, he thought it was precisely on that point they were claiming additional Members for Scotland. If they considered the population of Scotland, it was properly entitled to some 12 or 15 additional Members entirely on the ground of population, and he did not understand that these Members were to be given irrespective of population. He would respectfully point out to the Prime Minister and the Government that it was not sufficient to give these additional Members for Scotland; but that it was also the duty of the Government to see that these Members were properly apportioned and distributed.

MR. M'MAHON said, when they came to consider the Bill in Committee he would call attention to the divisions of Dublin City and County. Leaving to one side the political aspect of the case, the divisions made by the Commissioners would be a great inconvenience.

Major General Alexander

Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preliminary.

Clause 1 (Short title).

SIR JOHN HAY, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 6, after the word "the," to insert "increase and," said, that if the Amendment were adopted, the Act would be cited as "The Increase and Redistribution of Seats Act." He would point out that all former Bills for the redistribution of seats had been brought forward with the object of redistributing seats which already existed. Some of the 658 seats that were appropriated for the representation of the people had been, on various occasions, removed from decayed or small constituencies and added to larger ones; but the Bill now before the Committee, if it was to be carried out according to the promises and intentions of the Government, would not only redistribute seats, but would add to their number. He spoke as a Scotch Member, and unless, by some means or other, they were assured that the 12 additional Members it was the intention of the Government to give were provided in the Bill, Scotland would certainly not be satisfied. He had suggested an arrangement by which the equalization of the number of Members for different parts of the Kingdom might have been obtained. It had been decided by the House, however, that the number of the Irish and Welsh Representatives should not be diminished in proportion to the numerical representation which obtained in England and Scotland. If the proportion of 45,300, which obtained in Wales, were applied to the other parts of the United Kingdom, England would have 560 Representatives; Scotland, 85; Wales, 30; and Ireland, 105—making a total of 780 Representatives for the House, instead of 670, as proposed by the Government. It was quite evident that the general sense of the House was against any increase in the number of Members, and the Bill itself recited that it was a Bill for the redistribution of seats at Parliamentary Elections. Therefore, in order to make the provisions of the Bill run in conformity with the title of it, it was necessary, seeing that an increase of 12 Scotch Members was to take place, that the Bill should be cited, not only as a Bill for redistributing seats, but also for increasing the number of seats. He would have preferred infinitely that the equalization should take place in the way he had before suggested; but the House had already decided against the proposal, and he was afraid that when the Committee came to discuss the clause which increased the Scotch representation, the Scotch Members would have very little chance of obtaining what they desired, unless they amended the title of the Bill so as to carry with it the determination that there should be an increase. A little further on the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) had an Amendment on the Paper which provided that the additional Members for Scotland should be obtained by disfranchising existing boroughs. As an old English Member, for he (Sir John Hay) had enjoyed the honour of sitting in the Imperial Parliament for an English constituency, he could not concur with the hon. Member in any proposal to diminish the number of English Members below the number now returned. As he had already pointed out, if the number of Members for Ireland and Wales were continued as at present arranged, the number of English Members ought to be increased to 560. That, however, was a reductio ad absurdum, and it was not to be supposed that such a proposition would for one moment be accepted by the House. At the same time, it showed how over-represented Ireland and Wales were as compared with England and Scotland; because, if England had 560 Members and Scotland 85, there would only be 13 left for the rest of the Kingdom. He would not detain the Committee by enlarging further upon the Amendment; but he confessed that he should not believe Her Majesty's Government were in earnest in proposing any addition to the numbers of the House, in order to satisfy the just claims of Scotland, unless the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill Sir Charles W. Dilke accepted the Amendment he had now the honour to move.

words "increase and." — (Sir John Hay).

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the right hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir John Hay) appeared to refuse to believe that the Government were in earnest about the increased representation of Scotland unless they inserted his Amendment in the clause. He could assure his right hon. Friend, however, that Scotland would receive the additional Members promised, and that the Bill was not likely to pass unless that part of the programme was complied with. He wished, however, to point out that the Amendment was not necessary in order to secure that object, because the increase of one Member instead of 12 would satisfy it, and it did not in the slightest degree carry out the pledge that 12 additional seats would be given to Scotland. As a matter of fact, it would not necessarily increase the Scotch representation, although it would put the Government in fetters and shackles. The Amendment was quite unnecessary. The number of Members in the House was not fixed by any Constitutional rule, and after the strong declarations which had been made by the Government regarding this subject, he hoped it would be found unnecessary to pursue it further. He might point out that, as a matter of fact, the House at the present moment did not consist of 658 Members, but only of 652, which was really the present number by law, and had been so for some years. It was only a matter of superstition, therefore, to attach so much reverence to the number of 658. Furthermore, the Act of 1868 took away seven seats from England and gave them to Scotland; but there was no allusion to that fact in the recitals of the Act, and he thought they ought to adopt the general rule in Bills of this kind. Even the right hon. and gallant Gentleman himself admitted the necessity of increasing the number of seats for Scotland in some form or other; but the Government, having already made declarations so complete and strong, would only weaken their position by going further.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause agreed to.

PART I.

REDISTRIBUTION.

Boroughs.

Clause 2 (Boroughs named in First Schedule to become parts of counties or boroughs).

MR. BRYCE, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 12, after the word "boroughs," to insert the words "and Universities," with the object of securing that, from and after the end of the present Parliament, the Parliamentary boroughs "and Universities" named in the Schedule should cease as boroughs and Universities respectively to return any Member, said, that the duty of asking for the disfranchisement of the Universities was a delicate one, especially when the person undertaking it was himself connected with them. He trusted, however, that the Committee would believe him when he said that he was acting in what he believed to be, rightly or wrongly, the interests of the Universities themselves; and there was no hon. Member in that House who was more filled with sentiments of loyalty, affection, and gratitude towards his University than he was towards those to which he owed his education—the Universities of Glasgow and Oxford. He altogether disclaimed being animated by any other feeling than that of wishing to promote the well-being of the Universities themselves; nor did he wish to rest his case upon the ground that the Parliamentary representation of a University was an anomaly. He saw no harm in anomalies if they were practically useful. If this representation rendered any service either to the University or to the country, let it by all means stand, however great an anomaly it might be. He also disclaimed the idea that any Party motive actuated him in bringing the subject forward. Any slight alteration which the disfranchisement of the nine University seats would make in the existing difference between the two political Parties was of too small a kind to merit much consideration. At the present moment, seven of them were held by Members sitting on the other side of the House, and two by Members sitting on that side. The reason why he moved this Amendment was because he believed it to be for the distinct benefit of the Universities themselves. He would now endeavour to justify that statement. In the first place, the existing system was bad for these seats of learning, because the possession of Parliamentary representation brought Party politics not only into the Universities themselves, but into the academical Governing Bodies of the Universities—the Senate of Cambridge and the Convocation of Oxford. That was a serious evil, because it tended to make parties in a University form themselves upon political lines. Thus it prevented persons from forming as fair and impartial a judgment on educational questions as they would otherwise do, by making them associate themselves with political sections which had nothing to do with education. Not content with introducing political issues, in some cases the evil was carried so far as to run candidates for academical appointments on Party political grounds. This not only produced bad appointments, but affected peace and good feeling within the academic body, and was felt to be so serious a matter at Oxford, that nearly all appointments had now been taken away from Convocation. It was found that the wire-pullers who managed the Parliamentary elections turned to account their knowledge of the registers, and brought up men to vote in case of appointments who were their own political adherents. The result was that appointments had been made with little reference to the merits of the candidates themselves, but solely from political considerations, or to reward political services. In fact, the disfranchisement of the Universities would leave them stronger, more tranquil, more united, and better fitted for their real educational work. But the evil of Parliamentary representation went further, for it positively falsified and misrepresented the wishes of the University itself. The Members who sat in that House as Members for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge—and it was to these Universities that he chiefly wished to direct attention—were not really Members for the University at all. They knew nothing about the University. He hoped they would pardon him for saying so, but they were the Members for a large number of persons scattered over the country, and not for the true Universities as Teaching Bodies. What was a University? The real University was a number of teachers, residing in the towns of Cambridge and Oxford, Dublin, and so forth—Heads of Colleges, Professors, Fellows, Tutors, and Lecturers. In the cases of Oxford and Cambridge the number reached about 250. Bodies of men of that kind, though small, were real bodies, possessing a corporate life and existence, each constituting a centre of culture and a distinct social entity, and perhaps worthy of Parliamentary representation. Small as it was, such a constituency would be, at any rate, exceptionally intelligent, and would be different in kind from the other constituencies of the country. But who were the voters of the technical and legal constituency? In the case of Oxford it consisted of 5,382 persons, and in that of Cambridge of 6,458. The persons who actually voted as the technical constituents were gentlemen who, at one time of their lives, between the ages of 17 or 18 and 21, had spent three years at Oxford or Cambridge, who might have devoted little or no attention to their studies while there, and who, after leaving the University, had not kept up, in most cases, their connection with it, seldom or never visiting it, and knowing little or nothing of what was going on there. Few of them took any interest in it, and if they had any tie, it was a tie with their College and not with the University. Nor was it even the fact that all of those who had taken their degree of M.A. had a vote, for the right of voting was confined to those who paid a certain sum per annum to keep their names on the College and University books. Thus the University voters were, to a great extent, men belonging to the wealthier class; and, instead of forming a large body of highly educated men, they mainly consisted of persons not substantially superior to the rest of the upper and middle classes, and by no means those who had most profited by the University or its studies. It was, in fact, a comparatively small section of the graduates who, because they kept their names on the books for the sake of this privilege, enjoyed the right of choosing Members who purported to be Members for the Universities, and, as he had pointed out, it was the richer and not the more cultivated section. How did the privilege come into existence? It was in the year 1603 that James I., by Letters Patent—whose legality was disputed at the time—gave to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge the right of returning Members. What were the constituencies at that time? They were nominally the same as now, including Doctors and Masters whose names were on the books, but in reality altogether different. In those days the elections were, practically, in the hands of those who were engaged in the active work of the Universities; because the difficulties of communication were so great that it was impossible for graduates to come up from a distance in order to record their votes in Convocation, where the Members were chosen. The constituencies created by King James I. were therefore practically constituencies of persons resident within and actively connected with the University. They were constituencies which had a genuine life and individuality of their own, which, in a certain sense, entitled them to representation. In process of time, when communication became more easy, and especially in the present century, when swift coaches began to run, and were in their turn superseded by railways, it was rendered quite possible for voters living at long distances, and in different parts of the Kingdom, to come up to Convocation and record their votes. As a consequence, the nature of University representation entirely changed; the power of returning Members fell into the hands of persons who resided away from the University, and who knew little or nothing of its working; and there sprang up conditions wholly different from those under which the representation was originally granted. That state of circumstances continued to go on until the expense of bringing the voters to the poll became so serious that people began to think it would be better to do away with the trouble of bringing them up at all; and about 21 years ago an Act, introduced by the present Lord Monk Bretton, was passed, which substituted a system of voting papers, transmitted by post, for personal voting. Now, under the present system of voting papers, a man might go and live in Cardiganshire, or Northumberland, and never revisit his University for 40 years, and, nevertheless, retain his vote as much as if he were Dean of Christchurch. He hoped this digression would not be useless, if it pointed out to the Committee how entirely altered were the circumstances which originally led to the establishment of these constituencies. He would now point out the result of the change. The University constituencies had come to be composed of a large number of persons who had little or no practical connection with the Universities at all. The majority of the Oxford and Cambridge University voters were, as was well known, country clergymen. In point of fact, the Members for Oxford and Cambridge of late years had been entirely elected and governed by the clerical interest. He did not make that a ground of accusation, for the country clergy were as well entitled to have second votes as squires or barristers; but he mentioned it as explaining the regrettable fact that the Members for Oxford and Cambridge Universities had, on more than one occasion, been altogether misrepresentative of the opinions of the University residents and the University Teaching Body. Hon. Members would recollect that down to the year 1871 a long struggle was maintained at Oxford and Cambridge for the abolition of the detestable system of religious tests which then existed. The strongest opponents they met in their endeavour to destroy that abominable system, which tormented and degraded the consciences of young men, and excluded Non-conformists from the national seats of learning, were the Representatives of Oxford and Cambridge, because, they maintained, tests represented the clergy. The consequence was that for many years University tests were continued, which nearly all the best men connected with the Universities—all the most energetic and useful teachers—were anxious to see swept away; but which the University Members, at the bidding of the clergy, who formed the bulk of their constituents, were most zealous in supporting. That would show the misuse of their electoral privileges by persons who had no real connection with the Universities. Whenever an election occurred, it was found that the wishes of the residents were opposed and overborne by the majority of the non-residents. There was a case in point, when the present junior Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot) was returned. One of the candidates then brought forward was one of the most eminent scientific men in this country, or, indeed, in Europe. He was a moderate politician—so moderate that some Liberals did not approve of him—but although he had a considerable majority among the residents, and a large majority among those who were engaged in the work of education, out of a constituency of more than 5,000 he did not get 1,000 votes altogether. Hon. Members would recollect that something similar happened not long ago in the case of the University of Cambridge. The junior Member (Mr. Raikes) was returned by a large majority, although his opponent had a majority—not a very considerable one—among the resident voters, and a decided majority among the resident teachers.

MR. RAIKES said, he might perhaps state that he was not aware what the majority of his opponent was among the resident teachers; but among the residents he had a majority of nine.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: They were, as nearly as possible, half and half.

MR. BRYCE said, that although it was annoying to the residents to find that their official Parliamentary Representatives were always opposed to the educational objects they had in view, he wished to put the case upon the more serious ground that it was an injury to the University herself that the wishes and plans of the Teaching Body—those who were concerned in and responsible for the proper work of the University, educational, scientific, and literary—should be counter-worked by the Parliamentary Representatives of the University, those persons having no knowledge of the concerns of the Teaching University, no special interest in her educational functions, no familiarity even with the arrangements of the Colleges and management of College property, simply because such Members had come more recently from Oxford or Cambridge, and maintained a closer personal connection with members of the Teaching Body. It might be said that they could get all—by inquiry in Oxford or Cambridge—the information that was necessary; but anyone could collect information, and, in fact, many other Members of the House were better informed on subjects relating to the Universities and the work of education carried on by them. Perhaps, in speaking of the interests of the Universities in having special Representatives, he might be allowed to support his arguments by a quotation from Anthony Wood, who said, in his annals of the history of Oxford, under the year 1603—

"When the King, by his Letters Patent under the Great Seal of England, granted to either of the Universities that they might elect two Burgesses to serve in Parliament, it was then commanded that two grave and learned men professing the Civil Law should be by writ chosen to serve for them as Members of the House of Commons: which grant, though for the present it was accounted a great favour to the Universities as to the prosecuting their affairs in Parliaments, yet since not, as it hath been observed by many. For whereas before most of these Members that had been students in the Universities would stand up as occasion offered on behalf of their respective mothers, now none would do that office, because it is incumbent on two, who commonly are found negligent by following their own affairs or else not able as to their parts or understanding to undergo what their places require."

This judgment of old Anthony Wood was not far from the actual truth now, and it would be far better if the interests of the Universities were left to those who knew of their present condition and practical needs, and not intrusted to the legal guardianship of nominal Representatives. He did not, however, propose that the electoral franchise should be confined to residents, for although this would create real living University constituencies, those constituencies would be open to the objection he had already stated of suffering in their educational work from political Party spirit, and would, moreover, be much too small. In these days of disfranchisement, it was hardly to be expected that the House would call into existence two constituencies, neither of which would exceed 400 electors. Hence, the only course was to disfranchise the Universities altogether; and it must be remembered that the graduates who now had University votes would not suffer entire disfranchisement by losing their University representation, because arrangements had already been made which gave the clergy the right of voting for the boroughs or counties in which they resided, and as regarded others who were not the fortunate possessors of livings, they would be entitled to a vote as lodgers. Every non-resident who now possessed a University vote, was practically certain to have another vote already, and therefore could not be deemed to be damaged by losing his second vote, while as to University residents, it would be easy to give them the right of voting for the boroughs in which the Universities stood. He was quite aware that, as far as he had already gone, he had only endeavoured to show that this apparent privilege was of no benefit, but rather an injury, to the Universities themselves. But he might be told that it was maintained not for the sake of the Universities, but for the sake of the country at large, whose interest it was to have independent constituencies, educated constituencies, constituencies which, at any rate, differed from the ordinary borough and county divisions. He knew perfectly well that that was the feeling which animated many hon. Members who had asked him privately why, being himself connected with a University and not a fanatical democrat, he should desire to bring everything down to the dead level of a dreary democracy. "Why," they said, "do away with variety? We now have a means of getting superior men representing Literature, Art, Science, and Education. The Universities are picturesque, historical, independent. Why not leave us this romantic element to relieve that monotony of equal electoral districts which we are rapidly approaching?" He might be much moved by such an argument if there was anything in the past history of the representation of these Universities to justify the merits claimed for them. But what foundation was there for the claim. As a matter of fact, no constituencies were less independent than the University constituencies. And why was that? It was because they had no local life. These bodies of 5,000 or 6,000 electors were distributed all over the country, under such circumstances that the electors of each party could never possibly meet together for consultation or discussion, and they were, therefore, at the mercy of the agents and wire-pullers of the political Party to which they belonged. Talk of Caucus dictation! There was no constituency in the United Kingdom more absolutely at the mercy of an irresponsible and unrepresentative Caucus than the University of Oxford, none upon which the Carlton Club could more easily impose a Member. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, that that was so; the experience of the last 20 years proved it. If hon. Members looked at the matter, they would see that it must be so, because the means which existed in the case of other constituencies for the electors to vindicate their freedom of choice, did not exist here. They could only communicate with one another by letter, and when the small knot of wire-pullers, in Oxford or Pall Mall, brought out their candidate and went to work, it was found impossible for independent voters to resist them successfully, as might be the case in a constituency of the ordinary kind. Anybody who knew the history of Oxford and Cambridge Elections for some years, would agree that this was so, and would add that they had been comparatively well treated by the Carlton Club; for, whereas the managers of that Club might have returned whomsoever they liked as Members for the Universities, they had given the Universities Representatives of whose personal characters none would complain. He made no attack on them, but must insist that the four Members who sat for the English Universities did not represent either Education or Literature or Science or Art. They were very estimable and, in their way, very eminent men, no doubt; but while everybody respected the great knowledge of the Forms and Usages of the House which two of the Members for the English Universities possessed, and the acquaintance with Ecclesiastical Art and History, as well as with the sentiments of the clergy, possessed by the two others, and while everybody felt that the House would suffer a loss if any one of the four were withdrawn from it, it could not be denied that not one of them did in any special manner represent Literature, Learning, Education or Science; and if any candidate was ever brought forward for the University who did represent Learning, Education or Science, he met with an ignominious defeat. For instance, Professor Henry Smith did not poll 1,000 votes at Oxford in 1878; and in the case of the Cambridge Election two years ago, Mr. Stuart, now happily a Member of the House, only obtained 1,200 or 1,300 votes. Whenever an attempt was made to put forward as a candidate for the University of Oxford or Cambridge, on non-political grounds, a man of conspicuous culture, distinguished in Literature or Science, or a great lawyer who had maintained a specially close connection with the life of the University, it was certain to be unsuccessful, because political considerations only were taken into account. Sixteen years ago, when a vacancy occurred at Oxford, an attempt was made to bring forward one of the most eminent sons of the University, distinguished first as a scholar, then as a jurist, fervently attached to the Church of England, and very moderate in his political views. What happened? The constituency was canvassed by letter for a few days, and it was found that the support which Sir Roundell Palmer was likely to receive was so insignificant in point of quantity, however respectable in quality, that his supporters at once withdrew him, and abandoned the idea of bringing forward a candidate. He might, therefore, fairly say that it was not the interests of the Teaching Universities, or of Literature, Education or Science that were considered, but that a University contest was conducted purely upon political motives; and if the aim of giving seats to the Universities was to provide for the representation of Literature, Education, Science and Art, that aim had utterly and hopelessly failed of attainment. Let it also be remembered that the House gained no new element from these seats, because the Members returned for the Universities were not Members who were new to the House. He must say that there had been one important exception in regard to the Scotch Universities, that of the Member for the Universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh, who did contribute most valuable special knowledge and experience to their debates; but if they looked at the English Universities, they would find that for a long time back, the Members who had sat for them were Members of the ordinary type, and had already been Members of the House before they were returned for the Universities. Mr. Walpole long represented the University of Cambridge, and was regarded with universal respect and, he might say, affection while he was a Member of the House; but he had been Member for Midhurst before he was returned for the University. The present senior Representative for the University of Cambridge had sat for Stoke; the present junior Member had been Member for Preston. With regard to Oxford, Sir William Heathcote, who represented the University for some years, was, in the first instance, Member for South Hants; Mr. Gathorne Hardy, now Lord Cranbrook, had been Member for Leominster; the present senior Member had represented Durham, and the junior Member one of the divisions of Kent. It would be found that no English University seat had, for a long time past, been the means of introducing a new Member to the House, and, therefore, the special object for which University seats were now alleged to have been given had not been attained. He had spoken so far of the English Universities only, not merely because they were those which hon. Members generally knew most about, but because it was on their model that seats had been given to the other Universities. If no seats had existed in connection with the English Universities, it was quite certain that none would have been given to the other Universities in other parts of the Kingdom. So far as the University of London was concerned, it was an artificial creation, if ever there was one, for it was not even a Teaching Body, and ought not to be called, in the ancient and proper sense of the word, a University at all. [Mr. R. N. FOWLER: It used to be.] That was quite true. It was once a Teaching Body, and he hoped to see it made once more a Teaching Body and a true University. But at present it was not; it was merely an Examining Body. He would pass on to the Scotch Universities. There, again, the seats had been conferred on the example and model of the English Universities. In the Scotch Universities the number of residents was extremely small, and one might say that the whole constituency consisted of persons unconnected with the teaching, and very faintly connected with the government, of the University. The number of voters for Glasgow and Aberdeen was 6,438, and for Edinburgh and St. Andrews 6,543. But these non-residents had no tie to bind them together; they were mostly medical men, scattered all over the country, who had not even the College feeling which existed among Oxford and Cambridge graduates, and they never took the slightest interest in their University, except when they received a circular asking them to vote for a particular candidate. They might as well give a man a vote for Brighton for the rest of his life, because he once happened to spend a year of his life there, as to give one to an English or Irish graduate of a Scotch University, who had lived in Glasgow or Edinburgh during the period that was occupied in taking his degree. Let them have, if they liked, a representation of professions as such—of physicians, of lawyers, of architects, of authors, of bankers, and so on; but do not give to the Members elected by clergymen in England and physicians in Scotland the artificial and unreal name of University Representatives. He felt more difficulty with regard to the two seats for the University of Dublin than he did with regard to the others, because, although they were practically mere ex officio seats for the Law Officers or ex-Law Officers of a present or late Conservative Government, as to the present Members, they were all glad to see them on the Front Opposition Bench, and they felt that the right hon. and learned Gentlemen in question might experience considerable difficulty in securing other seats in their own country. But still they gave an access to the House to men of distinction who might not so easily find their way in through other Irish constituencies. But, no doubt, there would remain a number of seats available for the so-called "Loyal" minority in Ireland; and the Irish Conservatives would be only too glad to put in the forefront such redoubtable champions as the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen. Therefore, he did not think that, so far as the University of Dublin was concerned, the cause of the Loyal minority would suffer if these seats were taken away. With respect to the number of new residents and teachers in the constituency, the University of Dublin was in a very similar position to the Scotch Universities—that was to say, the constituency consisted almost wholly of persons whose practical connection with the University had long since ceased; and it would be hard, upon any principle, to justify the allowance to it of two Representatives, because Dublin, with 4,000 voters, had two Members, while each group of Scottish Universities, with more than 6,000, had only one Member. He trusted that he had said nothing which could give personal offence to the University Members; and he hoped he had convinced the Committee that, whether he was right or wrong in his proposal, he had some substantial grounds for his belief that its adoption would be for the benefit of the Uni-

verities themselves. At present, the Universities lost something, and the country gained nothing, by the existing system of University representation. Not wishing to put his case too high, he did not maintain that any harm was suffered by the country, nor that the question was one of capital importance to it, but there was certainly no gain; and he contended, therefore, that a system of representation founded upon no solid sufficient ground, producing no practical benefit, giving second votes to persons who had no substantial claim to them, ought not to be continued. At that moment, they were going to increase the number of Members of the House when they ought rather largely to reduce that number, and there was, therefore, a special and grave reason for taking away these University seats. He could not but hope that this undesirability of enlarging the House would form a ground for inducing the Committee to give serious consideration to his proposition. Both the Government and the Leaders of the Opposition must see that the feature of their compact which excited most disapproval in the country was this particular proposal to increase the already overgrown number of Members. If they abolished University representation, they would obtain nine out of the 12 seats they required for increasing the Scotch representation, and the other three could be got from the three smallest boroughs. It was more than probable that his Amendment had very little chance of being accepted, because, although nearly all Liberals in their hearts approved of it, the Ministry might feel bound by their compact with the Opposition to resist the true interests of the Universities. Nevertheless, in those interests he felt bound to take the opinion of the Committee upon the matter. He submitted that while University representation might have been a fair experiment to try, and while there might have been valid reasons for instituting it three centuries ago, and for continuing to give it a chance for some years after 1832, it was an experiment which had been tried long enough, which had altogether failed to bring about any substantial or beneficial result, either to the country or to the Universities themselves. The time had now arrived when it became desirable to dismiss this device of the

Mr. Bryce

Stuart Kings to the limbo to which so many other of their devices had been relegated. He believed that when that happened, and no University any longer returned a Member to Parliament, no persons would be more pleased than the now misrepresented resident teachers of the Universities themselves.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 12, after the word "boroughs," to insert the words "and Universities."—(Mr. Bryce.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Perhaps it would be convenient I should say a few words on behalf of the Government, before the University Members take the opportunity of addressing the Committee. Sir, my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Bryce) began his very able speech in a Committee which was much smaller than it is at the present time; indeed, it was almost entirely a Committee of University Members. The state of the Committee was, I should think, unique in the history of Parliament, for all of the nine University Members were present. My hon. and learned Friend has spoken of University representation with considerable ability; but it is my duty to state why it is undesirable, at the present time, to disturb that representation. Speaking on a Bill which is the result of an arrangement, or of general consent, between the different Parties in the House, I must state, at once, as I have stated on a former occasion, that it is impossible for the Government to agree to the Amendment the hon. and learned Gentleman has moved. At the same time, although in this respect I do not speak the opinion of my Colleagues, I must say that, in my opinion, my hon. and learned Friend makes out an unanswerable case against University representation in the abstract. I believe it is perfectly unlikely that that representation will survive the next Conservative Reform Bill. My hon. and learned Friend has given many reasons for objecting to the University vote; but there is one reason which weighs with me more than any other. It applies equally to the freehold vote. I believe it is unwise and undesirable to give double representation in the House, because of any special qualifications; and in connection with the point, I observed that one of the University Members opposite contradicted my hon. and learned Friend when he said most of the persons who possess University votes, also possess other qualifications. ["Not all."] Well, substantially all. The fact that, in the past, a considerable number of the clergy did not possess the franchise was always one of the reasons which weighed with me in the extension of the franchise. Formerly, many curates were excluded from the franchise; but, now, under the extended franchise, almost the whole of the clergy will possess the franchise. ["No."] I believe it is perfectly true, as stated by my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Bryce), that almost all of these gentlemen will now have votes. Now, the position of the Government to this matter is simply one of objecting to the Amendment which is placed before the Committee, and which, under the circumstances, I hope the Committee will reject by a large majority. Of course, we are free to express our individual opinions, and we should feel ourselves free to vote as we please if the subject came before the House in a separate form, and I should exercise that privilege in the manner I have shown the Committee. My hon. and learned Friend has shown, conclusively, that it is not necessary to have special University representation in order to represent learning in this House. A very singular illustration of this occurred the other day. A most distinguished man (Professor Stuart), immediately after an election in which a very small minority of the residents of the Cambridge University voted in his favour, came up to London and in one of the most democratic parts of the Metropolis was elected to this House by an overwhelming majority. That shows very clearly that the right hon. Gentleman the junior Member for the University of Cambridge Mr. Baikes could, if he liked, be returned for any Conservative constituency. It is perfectly clear that special University representation is not needed in these days for the purpose of returning to this House men of education and intelligence. The days of special representation of that kind have passed. But my hon. and learned Friend has shown, I think, in his speech that, while he desires to see the opinions he holds on the subject make way in the country, as I am convinced they will, he does not expect to carry his Amendment on this occasion. I feel quite sure that he is well aware that his Amendment will be rejected by the Committee, for the Bill is one which has the general concurrence of all sections of the House. In many matters it is a compromise between various opinions; and, as we intend to stand by its provisions, I call upon the Committee to reject the Amendment.

SIR JOHN R. MOWBRAY believed he expressed the views of all the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who represented Universities, when he thanked the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), for the conclusion at which he had arrived. While they would be very happy to go into the Lobby with the right hon. Baronet, they certainly could not accompany that act with an expression of thanks for his speech. Having regard to the fact that this was a Bill brought in by the Government after consultation with the Leaders of the Conservative Party, he was extremely surprised that the Member of the Cabinet in charge of the Bill should come forward to express his own individual opinions, and say that while he hoped the Committee would reject an Amendment, the arguments by which that Amendment were supported were unanswerable, and that if the subject were brought up in a separate form on another occasion, he would be prepared to vote for the change proposed. He (Sir John R. Mowbray) wished the right hon. Gentleman the Head of the Government Mr. Gladstone had been present to hear his Colleague's speech. It was well the Committee should know how far the President of the Local Government Board had represented the feelings of the united Cabinet. Hon. Members had a perfect right to complain of the course adopted by the right hon. Baronet, because the right hon. Baronet was one of the Members of the Cabinet who was specially concerned in arranging the compromise on the question of redistribution between the two great Parties of the House. If the right hon. Baronet thought that the argument in favour of the University seats was untenable, and quite indefensible, he (Sir John R. Mowbray) would ask how the right hon. Baronet could consent, as a Member of the Committee of the Cabinet which met the Members of the Front Opposition Bench, to make so great a concession? He would not attempt to answer the speech of the right hon. Baronet, because he happened to know that they were going into the same Lobby; he would rather direct his attention to the speech of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce). It really was very affecting to hear the language in which his hon. and learned Friend introduced this proposal to the Committee. The hon. and learned Gentleman said it was a delicate duty he had to discharge. He (Sir John R. Mowbray) thought it must be a very delicate duty for a Regius Professor of Civil Law in the University of Oxford to propose such an Amendment as the Committee were now considering. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Bryce) protested he was full of affection and loyalty to the Universities; that he spoke in the interest of the Universities, and for the benefit of the Universities. But his hon. and learned Friend could not be said to represent the whole University Body; indeed, he was obliged to construct a limited University of his own, a University of teachers, of whom there were 370. It really was very affecting to hear the hon. and learned Gentleman describe the disturbances which might arise in the academical walks of Christ Church and Magdalen by the introduction of politics. Who was injured by the introduction of politics? He supposed that the hon. and learned Gentleman himself did not wish that undergraduates should not talk politics. Many men had qualified themselves to take part in the debates of Parliament by being members of the Oxford Union Debating Society. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was one of the most distinguished men the Oxford Union Debating Society had turned out. That Society had also turned out Archbishops of Canterbury, Lord Chancellors, including the one to whom the hon. and learned Gentleman himself alluded, and other Cabinet Ministers. Did the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets speak for Heads of Houses; did he think that the introduction of politics into Universities disturbed the serene repose of Heads of Houses? No; he knew quite well that there was only one Head of a House who at all agreed with him in this matter. The hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of wrangling which went on in the common rooms on political matters, and said that University Tutors and Professors had no time for the discussion of politics. It was really absurd to ask the Committee to believe that this desire for quiet and exclusion of politics was the absorbing feeling of the residents. The hon. and learned Gentleman claimed to speak in the interest of the Universities. What support had he obtained in the Universities for the proposal he now made? He (Sir John R. Mowbray) might not ordinarily represent the opinions of the residents, but he did so to-night; and he asked the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets, if he had not tried for some weeks and months past to get up some movement, some sort of organization, some sort of Petition within the University of Oxford, and if he had not found cold water thrown on all his actions? If these 370 highly-educated men wished to devote themselves to literature and education and science, and did not wish to be disturbed by Party wrangles, why did not the hon. and learned Gentleman get half-a-dozen of them, or 37, say, out of the 370, to come to that House and present a Petition, praying for release from the political life into which they were plunged? His hon. and learned Friend said also that Convocation did not represent the University, and that Members of Parliament did not represent it either. The hon. and learned Gentleman argued that Convocation consisted, to a great extent, of men who had only been three years resident in the University—from the age of 18 to 21—that they then went away, and knew very little of what went on afterwards in the University. But were not those three of the most important years in a man's life; were they not years in which a man's character was developed and fixed; and, therefore, was it not very probable that a man having spent such years of his life in the University, retained throughout the rest of his life an affection for his College or University? The hon. and learned Gentleman really talked as if the Members for the Universities knew nothing about the Universities. He

Sir John R. Mowbray

(Sir John R. Mowbray) could tell his hon. and learned Friend that he had belonged to the University of Oxford close upon 52 years; and not one of those years had passed that he had not been within the walls of the University. He was intimately acquainted with every gentleman of any note in the University; he did know something of the University; indeed, he felt that, in opposing the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets, he represented the wishes, not merely of Convocation itself, but of the 370 teachers for whom his hon. Friend claimed to speak. The hon. and learned Gentleman made one most startling statement—namely, that the Members for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge were the nominees of the Carlton Club. If one suggestion more ludicrous than another had been made, it was that the Carlton Club had anything whatever to do with the elections in the Universities. His hon. and learned Friend must know better; he must know that no man could be a candidate for the representation of a University who had not been tried in the House. Men who were elected for the Universities must be known in public life and in University life; and it was because they were known in University life that they were accepted by the Universities. Nominees of the Carlton Club? A more unwarranted statement was never made in this world. His hon. and learned Friend went back to the origin of the representation; he said the representation was given to people resident within the University, and argued that now it was no longer necessary as it was in the days when the right was first conferred. He (Sir John R. Mowbray) might inform the Committee that, in the archives of the University of Oxford, there was a very interesting letter which was read in 1604, at the first election of Members for the University, and which set out the ground of the granting to the Universities of the privilege of returning Members to Parliament. The letter was written by Sir Edward Coke, who was then Attorney General, and it was read publicly in Convocation at the election in 1604. It was dated the 16th of March, 1603, and was as follows:—

“ Having found by experience in former Parliaments, and especially when I was Speaker, how necessary it was for your University to have burgesses, and finding especially now of later times that many Bills are preferred in Parliament, and some have passed, which concern your University.”

And then it was stated that the Government had granted to the University the privilege of returning Members. Well, everyone knew that many Bills had been preferred in Parliament concerning the Universities, as Sir Edward Coke, as Speaker for many years, had observed. It was therefore very important that the Universities should have representation in Parliament. Within the last 30 years, within his own experience, several Bills concerning the Universities had been brought into the House of Commons; and, during that time, it was as important as ever that there should be Representatives of the Universities in Parliament when those Bills were being discussed. There had been the Oxford Reform Bill of 1854, the Cambridge Bill of 1856, the Tests Act in 1871, and the Universities Act of 1877. Besides these Bills, there had constantly been Motions made with reference to ordinances and statutes; and, indeed, no Session had passed without some University question turning up. In fact, that which was now proposed was altogether a retrograde step. It was only 30 years ago he heard Lord John Russell, the then Leader of the House, when introducing his Reform Bill, propose, with universal assent, to give the privilege of returning a Member to the University of London; and when Mr. Disraeli, in 1867, carried out that which was the original proposal of Lord John Russell, there was one universal acclamation that a Member should be given to the University of London. And he (Sir John R. Mowbray) believed the whole House would agree with him that they had great reason to be proud that representation was conferred upon the University of London, when they recollected that that University had been successively represented by such eminent men as Lord Sherbrooke and the hon. Baronet Sir John Lubbock; who now so worthily represented the constituency. He thought that even the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets would admit that the hon. Baronet represented literature, education and science, although, perhaps, in forming the minds of the rising generation, had not instructed the hon. and learned Gentleman that, if he would look forward to a period 20 years hence, there would be a great preponderance of laymen in the Universities? He Sir John R. Mowbray contended that really this was a very extraordinary moment to make such a proposition as this. Parliament had just, by the Franchise Act, added 2,000,000 of capable citizens to the electoral roll. He cordially agreed with the extension of the franchise; he had never objected to it, provided there was a fair redistribution of seats; but no one could deny — the hon. and learned Gentleman could not deny — that the 2,000,000 of new voters included amongst them some who were not educated and who were not at all conversant with political questions. He Sir John R. Mowbray, therefore, asked, was it reasonable that, at the present moment, they should try the experiment proposed; was it reasonable that, while adding to the electoral roll 2,000,000 of persons, a large proportion of whom were not educated and not intelligent in political matters, they should disfranchise somewhere between 20,000 and 30,000 men of the highest education and the highest intelligence — entirely independent men, men who had studied politics in their earliest days, and who were eminently capable citizens? The hon. and learned Gentleman argued that he would not disfranchise such men, because he would let them have votes for the City of Oxford. Were the graduates of Oxford University to be transferred from the high academical constituency of which they were now members to that most corrupt constituency, the City of Oxford? The corruption of that city was so well known that a Writ was not issued when a vacancy occurred a year or two ago; and yet the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets would bring the men of his own University, for whom he had such tender and kindly feelings, such affection, loyalty and regard, into the corrupt mass of the civil constituency of the City of Oxford. He (Sir John R. Mowbray) was sure the true sons of Oxford University would no more thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for that suggestion than they thanked him for his present Amendment. Now, did the hon. and learned Gentleman really mean to say that the Universities had not, for 300 years past, well discharged their duty to the country and to the Crown by the men they had returned to the House of Commons? The hon. and learned Gentleman said he did not wish to introduce personal topics, and he was very good to speak in a kindly way of the Members for the Universities; but each of the Universities was brought up in a more or less disparaging manner. Let them see what sort of men had been returned by the Universities. Had not Oxford reason to be proud of such Representatives as Selden, Sir Matthew Hale, and Sir William Scott? Were they not among the greatest jurists who ever adorned any country? Had not Oxford reason to be proud of Sir Robert Peel, and of the present Prime Minister? [Ironical cheers.] Yes; he expected that interruption, and he was not surprised at it. Oxford returned those distinguished men, and when they changed their opinions in consequence of which Oxford returned them, Oxford rejected them. But what did that rejection imply? It implied a very high spirit on the part of the University. The men Oxford rejected on each occasion were the foremost men of powerful Ministries; they were Leaders of the House of Commons; and one was associated with the Duke of Wellington and the other with Lord Palmerston. That they rejected those two great men was, to his mind, a proof of the disinterested character of the constituency. He maintained that, whether the Universities had or had not returned men whose political opinions coincided with those of hon. Gentlemen opposite, they had returned men of whom the nation had reason to be proud. The elections in the Universities had always been conducted conscientiously. The electors had always been guided by intelligence, and there never had been a suspicion of corruption. He repudiated the suggestion that the Members for the Universities were the nominees of any political Party, and felt satisfied that the feeling both in and out of the House was favourable to the retention of the University constituencies. There was nothing to justify the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets, and therefore he hoped the Committee would reject it by a large majority.

MR. ALBERT GREY said, he heard, with some surprise, the speech of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke). The right hon. Baronet declared it was his bounden duty to vote against the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), because of the compact entered into by the occupants of the two Front Benches; but he accompanied that declaration by a speech which was nothing less than a command to hon. Members sitting on the Ministerial side of the House to vote in favour of the Amendment. What was the fundamental reason brought forward by the right hon. Baronet in support of his view that the Universities ought to be disfranchised? That it was undesirable to give a double representation to certain persons because of particular qualifications. Well, he (Mr. Albert Grey) entirely agreed with his right hon. Friend that it would be very undesirable to give a double vote to any person in the Kingdom, if the Redistribution Bill about to be passed gave a security that the vote of every single elector should, as nearly as electoral arrangements would permit, count for as much as that of any other elector. If they were to have a system of fair and honest representation, which would insure to equal number of persons equal representation, then he would admit there would be a great argument in favour of the disfranchisement of the Universities. But when they were about to adopt a plan which, so far from giving true representation, would give an altogether sham representation of the people, a plan which would make the votes of one set of electors worth three or four times as much as that of another set, there was not only a very strong, but an absolutely overwhelming case in favour of the preservation of the University constituencies; the retention of the Universities was necessary to repair in some degree the inequality created by the present Bill. It was the experience of other countries—of France and of America—that, under the single-district plan, the more educated and cultivated portions of the community were swamped altogether—unable to find any representation, either in their National Assembly or in their Congress; and it had been held both in America and in France, that, if by the substitution of proportional representation the more intelligent minorities could secure the return of their own candidates, intellect would be able to return its own Representatives to the Representative Assembly, and those Representatives would wield in the Chamber an influence out of all proportion to their numerical strength. It was because he believed that the effect of the single-district plan would be to reduce the influence of the intelligent minority, that he was in favour of the retention of the University constituencies. The right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board pointed to the hon. Member for Hackney (Professor Stuart) as a proof of the fact that intellect could find representation in the most popular constituencies; but they ought not to forget the saying of Lord Palmerston—that the extension of the franchise might not result in sending a different class of Members to the House, but the difference would be this, that the same men would play to the gallery, instead of to the boxes. Depend upon it, that the men of culture who were returned by men of culture would be a very different class of Members to the men of culture who were returned by men wanting in culture. What was the object of Reform? Was it not to obtain a good House of Commons? If so, he thought the right hon. Gentleman would admit that variety in the representation was absolutely essential. They must have security for an adequate variety of representation in order to get a good House of Commons. All former Reform Bills had been framed with the object of securing this variety. In order to get a compound House of Commons, Parliament hitherto had been careful to preserve inequality of franchise and great difference in the size of constituencies; but by the Bill which was now brought forward by the two Front Benches they were about to remove these securities for variety. They were to have a uniform franchise; and they were about to make their constituencies almost identical in size; and that meant that, with the levelling agency of the Press and the railways, nearly every constituency in the Kingdom would tend to become more and more similar. They were thus about to abandon that old security

for a variety of representation and for a compound House of Commons which they had when they had an unequal franchise and different sized constituencies. He was not making these remarks as an argument in favour of the system that was being left behind. He believed there was another way of securing a compound House, a way based on absolute justice, being founded on the principle of one man, one vote, and every vote an equal value. That was a way, however, which at present was more popular in the country than, he was sorry to say, it was in the House. As, however, the House had determined not to adopt the only other alternative for insuring adequate variety in the representation, and was resolved upon establishing a system which would deprive the country of all security for a compound House of Commons, he maintained that, so far from wishing to abolish University representation, which introduced the only element of variety into their otherwise uniform plan, they ought to preserve it most carefully. While upon this point, he would like to quote two authorities, whom he was sure would be accepted as good authorities by those who sat on the Ministerial side of the House. The late Mr. Stuart Mill, who strongly favoured University representation, advocated the bestowing of additional votes upon those who satisfied a certain standard of education and intelligence, relying upon direct representation of intellect and the adoption of some form of proportional representation as the chief safeguards against the danger of democracy. Mr. Bagehot, who regretted that direct representation of intelligence was impossible, maintained, nevertheless, that it was of vital importance that whatever could be done in this direction should be done. He said

"All that can be done in this direction must be effected by a gradual extension of the principle which has given Members to our Universities. No one can obtain admission to these bodies without a prolonged course of study, or without passing a strict examination in several subjects. This is a kind of franchise not to be manufactured; it is only obtained as a collateral advantage by persons who are in pursuit of quite different objects. Such bodies, however, are obviously few, and such kinds of franchise are necessarily limited. But they should be extended as far as possible."

The arguments of his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets struck him Mr. Albert Grey as being very surprising and very inconsistent. The hon. Member objected to University representation, because men living outside the Universities swamped the votes of those who resided in the vicinity of the University itself. That he offered as a reason for abolishing University representation altogether. [SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Hear, hear!] The Secretary of State for the Home Department cheered that remark. He Mr. Albert Grey did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman was in favour of University representation or against it. Perhaps he had not made the point clear. The argument of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets was that the electors living outside the University swamped the votes of the men living in the University; therefore, University interests were insufficiently represented in the House of Commons, and therefore the Universities should not have any representation at all. His hon. and learned Friend went on to say that in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, against which his speech was chiefly directed, matters were mainly controlled and governed by clerical influence. He Mr. Albert Grey admitted that readily; but that was no argument for the abolition of University representation; it was rather an argument for the extension of the University franchise than for its extinction. It was in the power of the House to secure that the electorate of the old Universities should be framed upon the model of the electorate existing in the Universities in Scotland. If that were the case, the whole body of graduates would have a vote for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; and once that came to pass, it would soon be found that clerical influence, so far from controlling the representation, would only be a minor fraction in the constituent body. Of course, the clerical influence at Oxford and Cambridge controlled, at present, the representation of those constituencies, and why? Simply because, up to 1871, every elector for Oxford and Cambridge had to subscribe his adherence to the formularies of the Church of England; they had to do that before they could exercise the privilege of voting at a University election. At Oxford, the genius. Take the case of the University of Dublin. What was the Parliamentary history of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for that University Mr. Plunket? He was defeated for the City of Dublin, and the University gave him a refuge; and he (Mr. Albert Grey) did not think there was a single person in the House who would wish to see the right hon. and learned Gentlemen excluded from Parliament. He had now endeavoured to bring before the Committee some answers against the arguments adduced by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets, and some reasons why it was desirable not to get rid of University representation until a system of fair representation was adopted. If there was proportional representation, which would give every vote an equal value, then University representation might go; but until we got that, he should cling like a leech to every University seat. As he had mentioned the words proportional representation, let him make one suggestion to the right hon. Baronet Sir Charles W. Dilke who spoke from the Front Bench. The right hon. Baronet told them he was against University constituencies, but that he was obliged to vote for them on this occasion. If he was against University constituencies, he could not care very much what method of representation was put in force in those constituencies. They were exceptional constituencies, therefore they were the very constituencies on which an experiment might be made. Why not amalgamate the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and elect their Members by the system of proportional representation? A laugh. He made the suggestion to his right hon. Friend in earnest. It was not yet too late. On Report, let them make the Amendment. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had received a warning; and, if they wished to retain the University constituencies, they ought to adopt some system which would make them palatable to Members on that side of the House. Let him say what he thought would be the best thing to do. Let them take away a Member from Oxford and Cambridge and give it to the Scotch Universities. Let them make Oxford and Cambridge one constituency, and the Scotch Universities one constituency; and then let the Members, each constituency having three Representatives, be elected upon the single transferable vote system. Such a suggestion could very easily be adopted on Report. As the University Members were to be retained, the method of election could not be a vital matter. He hoped that, by accepting the suggestion, the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board would show he had something more than an academical sentiment in favour of proportional representation. He (Mr. Albert Grey) trusted the House might see fit, on the Report stage, to make an experiment on the very constituencies which ought, from their exceptional nature, to be made the subject of a most important and interesting experiment.

[First Night.]

Mr. J. A. CAMPBELL said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Albert Grey) referred to an argument which was used by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), in expressing his approval of a great deal of what had been said in favour of the Amendment. It was argued that University representation gave double representation, and the right hon. Gentleman was opposed to that. He (Mr. J. A. Campbell) did not follow the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Northumberland in his answer to the right hon. Gentleman; but he thought there was another answer which could be made to the President of the Local Government Board, and that was that the argument against double representation could scarcely be fairly brought forward in favour of the Amendment, inasmuch as double representation was not against the principle of the Bill they were now discussing. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), in his speech in introducing the Amendment, gave a description of a University which he (Mr. J. A. Campbell) was rather surprised to hear from one who knew the Universities of Scotland so well as the hon. and learned Gentleman did. There seemed to be an idea in his mind that a University consisted of a body of teachers only, rather than of University graduates. That was not at all the idea in Scotland. The Scottish Universities were certainly teaching Universities; they had a large staff of teachers; but it never occurred to the people of Scotland that the teachers constituted the University. His hon. and learned Friend threw rather a slight upon the Universities of Scotland as constituencies by saying that the graduates never heard of their Universities, except in connection with Parliamentary elections. That was a mistake. The graduates of the Scottish Universities were associated together for other purposes than for electing Parliamentary Representatives. They were reminded twice a year of their duties as members of the General Council; and they had to take part in elections which had nothing whatever to do with politics. It had been asked whether the Universities gained by having Parliamentary representation. Now, he should say that that was not the object for which Parliamentary representation was given to the Universities; certainly, it was not the object in view when the franchise was conferred upon the Universities of Scotland and of London. He could not speak so confidently of the franchise given in olden times to the ancient Universities of England, and he was not aware of what the case was in Ireland. But although the franchise was not granted with the object of benefiting the Universities, he could say that the possession of the franchise had been a gain to the Universities of Scotland. It came after some important measures of reform which gave the graduates a much greater interest in those institutions; it was the crowning work of that reform; and since that time—he did not say altogether in consequence of the franchise being given them—there had been a new start made by the Universities. The real question for consideration, however, was, whether the country gained by the arrangement—for representation was conferred on the Universities not for the sake of the Universities, but for the sake of the country. It appeared to him that the franchise was given to the Universities in order that there should be some Members of the House of Commons whose special duty was to attend to a certain class of interests; to attend to education and all connected with it, including the interests of the learned Professions. Other interests were represented in the House. The borough Members took the special responsibility of attending to questions of trade and commerce; and county Members were supposed to have a special responsibility with regard to agricultural matters. Well, why should not the interests of education and cognate subjects also have their special Representatives in the House? It did not follow, by any means, that there might not be borough and county Members more influential in regard to educational subjects than the University Members. He had many Members in his eye, who were much more qualified to speak for education, literature, and science than at least one of the University Members, and he did not know that there was any one better qualified to speak on such subjects than the hon. and learned Gentleman who had brought forward the Amendment. At the same time, that qualification on the part of borough or county Members was an accident; they had not been elected to Parliament on account of it, but had been returned to watch over other subjects, and upon other considerations altogether. This question must be dealt with in an impersonal manner. He would say that, although the University Members might, as individuals, have failed to come up to the standard of qualification and of service expected of them, yet it still remained true that the interests of education and of cognate subjects were of sufficient national importance to justify the election to the House of certain Members, who should be looked upon as having a special responsibility in regard to those subjects, so as to secure for them full attention from Parliament. It was in that view that he ventured, humbly, to say that University representation was valuable, and that he trusted the Committee would, by a large majority, reject the Amendment.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, he rose to support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce). The hon. Gentleman who spoke last (Mr. J. A. Campbell) had, he thought, put the matter thoroughly on the right ground. They were not concerned at all with what might have been the original motive which prompted the King or Parliament to give Members to the Universities; they were not concerned with the question whether or not the franchise so conceded had been of advantage to the

Mr. J. A. Campbell

Universities as corporations. The question they had to put to themselves was this—Was it to the advantage of the country, and an advantage to the Parliamentary representation, that there should be special Representatives in the House of the special interests or corporations which existed in the Universities? The presumption, he thought, was against those who wished to constitute special Representatives of groups of persons taken out of the general mass of citizenship. They had these University Members, and, therefore, many acquiesced in the idea of retaining them; but he did not suppose that anyone would suggest an extension of this kind of representation. They remembered that when Mr. Disraeli brought in his first draft of one of his Reform Bills in 1867, there were what were called “faucy franchises” in it. They were not to be grouped together into separate constituencies, if he (Mr. Stanley) recollected rightly; but, at any rate, the idea of giving a man a vote because he was a doctor, or a lawyer, or had taken a University degree, or anything of that sort, was not viewed with favour in Parliament. The general feeling was, he thought, that the basis of Parliamentary representation was common citizenship, and that the natural centre round which a constituency should be aggregated was a local centre—a centre of local community of interest. Well, was there any reason why these exceptional constituencies should be favoured, or should be allowed to continue to exist? Did they confer any benefits on the nation through the Representatives they were likely to send to Parliament? He did not wish to say anything discourteous—it would be improper, and not in accordance with the facts, if they were to say anything derogatory to the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who now represented the Universities in Parliament. It was not from that point of view that he would wish to approach the question at all; but they were told—the hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Glasgow had just told them—that the justification of these constituencies was that they sent Members to Parliament specially charged with the duty of watching over the interests of education. That, he (Mr. Stanley) thought, was a fair representation of the justification that the hon. Member put forward. Well, he could bear cordial testimony to the fact that, at any rate, so long as he had been in Parliament, the Members for the Scotch Universities had taken a great and progressive interest in the cause of education; and he thought it was one of the most refreshing things they experienced in their contact with Scotch Members that, irrespective of political Party, they all alike desired to promote the cause of education. It was a most remarkable thing—if he might be allowed to use it as an illustration—last Session, when a Bill was passing through Parliament with reference to the reform of Scotch educational endowments, to see hon. Members on the opposite Benches, especially the hon. Member for the University of Glasgow and the hon. Member for Bute (Mr. Dalrymple), so active in pressing on the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella), a more progressive, and a more liberal policy in the matter of education than the Government were inclined, in the first instance, to take up. Therefore, they could not help recognizing the fact that the cause of education had been generally supported by the Scotch University Members irrespective of their politics. But could hon. Members believe, for one moment, that it was because these hon. Gentlemen represented Scotch Universities that they supported the cause of education? Was it not rather because of the healthy foundation of the Scotch political character? Was it not rather to be accounted for by the love of education which, for generations, had been instilled into the Scotch character? He thought, however, that the more highly they appraised the character of the English University Members, the more they must recognize the fact that—probably owing to some inherent defect in the constituencies they represented—the attitude of those hon. Gentlemen towards education in England had been found rather antagonistic to, than in favour of, the promotion of the cause of education. The right hon. Gentleman the Representative of the University of Oxford (Sir John R. Mowbray) had told the Committee how, for many years in the House, he had had to watch over Bills affecting University education. He (Mr. Stanley) would like to ask the right hon. Member whether it was not the fact that the vigilant watchfulness which he had exercised over all the University Bills had rather the effect of postponing their passing into law, or introducing into them restrictive Amendments which the country did not approve of; and he could not help remembering the speeches delivered year by year, on the Education Estimates, by the other hon. Member for the University of Oxford, in which there was no plea for the extension of education, but rather of keeping it back in accordance with the limited means of the denominational system. He regretted to find that the influence these constituencies brought to bear on their Representatives was not an influence which made them the champions of education, a title which their own cultivation would, doubtless, have resulted in their winning, if they had had the good fortune to plunge into some democratic constituency. He felt quite sure that, if either of the two Members for the University of Oxford were representing the Conservative side in Manchester or Sheffield, the House would find them very much more in favour of an advanced and liberal elementary education, such as the school boards of those great towns had so successfully promoted, than they were now, representing the ancient Universities. As a matter of fact, it was quite idle to say that the Representatives of the English Universities represented learning or culture in any sense whatever. In the first place, as had been pointed out by the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Albert Grey), the constituencies of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge were not the graduates. The constituencies were plutocracies. The Universities, he was sorry to say, did not give their degrees in relation to merit, or in relation to advancement. The degree of Master of Arts, which entitled a man to vote, was sold for a money consideration; and yet that degree represented not one atom of educational progress beyond the degree of Bachelor of Arts. "Oh, oh!" Those who cried "Oh, oh!" probably had not had the advantage of a University education. The Universities not only "sold" the degrees—and that was the plainest word for a plain fact—but they also charged a yearly tariff for the privilege of exercising the University franchise.

Mr. Lyulph Stanley

It was not only necessary to have taken the Master of Arts degree to have the franchise, but to pay annual fees, or commute them by the payment of a lump sum. He would not say a word against any Member now in the House; but he might, perhaps, be allowed to refer to an analysis of the votes taken on the great occasion when the Prime Minister was turned out of the representation of the University of Oxford. That analysis was very remarkable—he was not speaking of a comparison between the resident and non-resident voters, but of an analysis of the University voters that had been taken. The analysis showed a perfect curve—he did not know what formula could be found to express it mathematically; but the curve descended from University prizemen, First Class men, and men who had Fellowships, through the Second and Third Classes, until they got to the Fourth Class, and then the upward curve, in favour of the Prime Minister's opponent, who was elected, reached the level of the descending curve, or those who had voted for the Prime Minister. When they got to the pass men, that curve mounted up with great rapidity, and placed Lord Craubrook—then Mr. Gathorne Hardy—in a vast majority; and he (Mr. Stanley) could not help thinking that if the person who had prepared the table had ascertained who those who had obtained their position on the roll through two or three successive plucks, they might be found to mount up even more rapidly. The electoral roll of the University represented, to a large extent, the willingness of people to go on to the Master's degree, and to pay the necessary fees. They were anxious to keep their names on the books for election purposes. In many cases, however, gentlemen were less animated by political considerations than what he might call a desire for millinery—a strong desire to wear the crimson hood, which had a better appearance in church than that which was presented by the less ornamental ermine tippet of the Bachelor of Arts. That would explain how it was that so many more clergymen than laymen were members of the Convocation of the University of Oxford. The hon. Gentleman who had spoken below him (Mr. Albert Grey) had sketched out a possible constituency of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge—an amalgamation of the two, and a new method of voting to render the representation acceptable. But he, Mr. Stanley, was sure it would be much better to abolish the four seats of the Universities altogether than to jerrymander them in that way; to subject them to arithmetical calculations, shifting votes, and arrangements, which would only lead to hopeless confusion. These constituencies were much too old to alter their ways, and to be made the subject of an experiment in proportional voting.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, it had no doubt been satisfactorily proved to him that he was an unfortunate creature, who knew nothing nor cared anything about literature, or culture, or science; and that he represented a body of people who were in the same unfortunate position; yet, with or without success, literature was a subject which had occupied a good deal of his time and thoughts during his life; indeed, if he had attended less to literature and more to politics, his success might have been greater. He would admit his want of culture; but, at all events, he would not, like the honourable and very superior Gentleman who had just spoken, treat this subject by a series of bad jokes about ermine and red heads. It would, at all events, receive serious treatment from him. The only attempt at an argument used by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) was a sort of inchoate argument, a little timid creeping thing, like a rabbit in a warren, which murmured about representation being based upon a local centre. But was not a University a local centre? The Universities were concentrated centres of learning and teaching, and, as some had said, of high thinking and low living. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) felt that; but he went wrong from not feeling something more. The Universities were not only a joint stock company for the promotion of research, entitled it might be to the representation of that research as exclusively embodied in the limited number of persons engaged in such research, but they were also the machinery by which a large class of the people, belonging generally to what was called the governing class, were able to attain that culture which was necessary to enable them to discharge their duties in life with reason, with success, and with a broad view of the proportion of things. The non-resident was not the old-fashioned country bumpkin depicted in some comedy of the last century. The non-residents were rather the mind of the country. "Oh, oh!" He would trouble the hon. Gentleman who called "Oh!" to deny that the lawyers and the doctors and other educated Professions were the mind of the country, and yet the lawyers and doctors and so forth formed a large proportion of the non-resident graduates. Anyone cognizant of University politics must know very well how large a share the Temple and Lincoln's Inn had had in settling the representation of the Universities. Even, if among the non-residents might be found country squires, whose degree was a poll or a pass one, and whose talk was of bullocks and such things, was it not something to be able to talk of bullocks with that reasonable education which any degree indicated, and which gave that average of culture which every man who was more or less a leader of his countrymen ought to possess? As for the cry of clerical preponderance, that was amply and fully disposed of by the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Albert Grey). Of course, as long as there were tests, the representation was of necessity Church of England representation; but when the tests were abolished the Universities were at once thrown open to all beliefs. The old constituency had been an excellent one; but it was limited. Now it was not done away with, only enlarged. As to the contention raised about the formal process by which the degree of Master of Arts was attained it was conveniently forgotten that the degree of Bachelor came necessarily first, and that the examinations came at that stage. After all, what was this outcry against University representation? The numerical principle as governing the distribution of seats was now to be made stronger, more consistent, and more universal than by any previous Reform Bill, and yet they were afraid of nine men out of 670. It seemed to be thought that those nine men would be more than a match for the remaining 661. The weak point of the new distribution was the risk of giving an undue preponderance to mere local feeling; and this was, to a certain extent, counterbalanced by such widespread constituencies as those of the Universities with an intellectual qualification. He had but one more consideration to urge. He would ask what sort of men had of old been returned for the Universities? He owned to some pride when he thought of such Representatives as Palmerston, or the present honoured Chancellor of Cambridge, the Duke of Devonshire. But he had greater names than these to advance. He was the successor of Bacon, Newton, and Pitt. He could not, let him say, name these without confessing how deeply he felt the responsibility of such an inheritance. Such men might be again returned for a University, would they certainly be so for the division of a county or the ward of a borough? He must resist the proposal as hopelessly reactionary and deplorably Philistine.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) is such a friend to higher education, and is such an excellent type of academic training, that the Universities may well be surprised that the blow against their representation has come from him. If we were now engaged in founding a new representative system, some of his arguments would be strong. A double vote to one man, it may be in the same town, is certainly an anomaly; but our existing representative system is full of anomalies, even in regard to double voting. This special anomaly of which he complains has existed in regard to the older Universities since 1603 for England and 1613 for Ireland. University representation was then granted by Charter, perhaps by a stretch of Royal Prerogative. But it was accepted by the House of Commons, and was ratified by the Court of King's Bench. The Universities exercised so well their privileges that Parliament extended them by statute to the Scottish Universities, and to the London University. In the long exordium of the original Charters, James I. explains that the interests of learning and of religion deserve to be represented in the House, as well as the material interests of the Kingdom. We now know more clearly than that Monarch did how much the material interests of a nation depend upon the diffusion of learning and science. This recognition of their mutual dependence is, to my mind, the only justification for the representation of Universities at the present day. Undoubtedly, University Representatives must be politicians; for, if they are not, they should not sit in Parliament. But they must be more than mere Party politicians. They are returned, or they ought to be returned, to Parliament because they are fitted to represent the higher interests of learning and science. There are numerous subjects affecting the common weal which are above the region of Party conflicts. They may, or may not, have direct reference to Universities; but they relate to their work. For instance, the primary education of the people, the secondary education of the middle classes, the relations of science to the progress of manufacturing industry, the health of large communities, are subjects depending upon learning and science, and these then become important factors in the deliberations of the House. When University Members put their Party politics in the background, and discuss such questions as these with a single desire to promote the common good, the House always bestows confidence on them, and, frequently, is guided by their advice. Is it not wise that we should have among us a few Members to whom such questions are of more interest than the struggles of Party warfare? Personally, I can state with pride and satisfaction that I have always found the House on both sides willing to allow me to share in such deliberations without accusing me of pedantry. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock), who sits on this side, as well as my University Colleagues on the other side, can state, with equal satisfaction, that they have received similar indulgence from the House when they have had occasion to address it on academic or scientific subjects. I wish to draw the attention of the House to the difference between the position of England and foreign nations as to higher education, so as to explain why it is important for this country to continue University representation. Unless this difference is understood it is, undoubtedly, a strong argument that, while our Continental neighbours promote science and learning more than we do, they have not found it necessary to represent Universities in their Legislative Assemblies. In those nations all education—primary, secondary, and University—is the special object of State supervision and control. Each nation has a separate Minister of Education, with large funds at his disposal; and that Minister is the responsible Representative in Parliament for their progress and efficiency. In our country we had no national system, even of primary education, till 1870; our secondary education is even now entirely chaotic, and is independent of State supervision; while our Universities are autonomous, and are only responsible to themselves. Even the Scottish Universities, which are the only Universities to which we give Parliamentary grants, are independent of administrative control, and do not even make Reports for the information of Parliament. It is under these different circumstances that this nation has thought it wise to have Representatives of higher education in this House. Whether we should abandon our system of Representatives of education for the centralized system of Ministerial responsibility is a question too large for discussion at present; but you must have one or other, unless England is to abandon her position among nations. ["No, no!"] For my own part, I believe that representation of higher education, rather than administrative centralization, is more consonant with our ideas and institutions. I observed that there was some dissent when I said we must have one or other system inside Parliament, so I venture to give my reasons. I doubt whether even all the Members of this House are aware of the enormous efforts which have been made in recent years on the Continent to promote University education. These efforts are founded on the conviction, in which I profoundly share, that the competition of nations, both in war and in peace, has ceased to be a competition of brute force, or of local advantages, but has resolved itself into a competition of intellect. As Jules Simon has tersely put it—that nation which has the best educated people must become the greatest nation, if not to-day, certainly to-morrow. Let me state in a few words what France is now doing for her University education. Before the Great Revolution France had 22 autonomous Universities, which gave intellectual life to the Provinces. Napoleon, with the powers of a despot, and the instincts of a drill sergeant, converted them into Faculties, and created a single University of France, which was centralized in Paris. Under this baneful centralization the Faculties dwindled away. By 1868, the subventions to the University had diminished to an insignificant sum. The war with Germany came, and France was beaten. Then the French Institute fully discussed the causes of the disaster; and came to the conclusion that the intellectual paralysis of France was due to the destruction of her higher education. France, though loaded with debt, and competing with us in iron-clads, has made surprising efforts to recover her intellectual position; for she feels that it is not by men alone, but by the intellectual and moral force of her people, that she can cope with Germany, either in war or in peace. Since 1868 no less a sum than £3,280,000 (82,000,000 francs) has been spent by France in rebuilding her provincial Colleges, and the annual subvention for their support in 1884 was, in round numbers, £500,000. Has Germany been indifferent to this remarkable development in the higher education of France? Has she merely strengthened the fortifications of Strasburg which passed over to her in the war? Germany has rebuilt the University at great cost, having equipped it with eight laboratories, the smallest of which, that for physiology, cost £14,000, and the largest, for chemistry, £35,000. It also gives to it an annual subvention of £46,000. Germany has now 21 Universities, with 24,000 students and 1,800 Professors. The annual Votes are close on £400,000, besides the extraordinary expenditure for buildings, amounting to half as much more. I have only time for one other illustration, and I take the case of the Netherlands, because its population only slightly exceeds that of Scotland, and its total revenue is only £9,000,000. Yet it has four Universities, and votes for their support £136,000 yearly; while Scotland, with the same number supported by the State, receives from Parliament £30,000 annually. You will now understand why I have drawn attention to this remarkable progress of higher education among our Continental competitors. Either foreign nations are extravagantly absurd in the attention which they give to higher education, or we are surprisingly weak in doing so little. If, however, it is possible that Continental nations may be right in believing that the competition of the world has become a competition of intellect, it is unwise at this time that you should be asked to do anything that will depress the position of our Universities in the public estimation. In the eyes of the world the suppression of University representation is not an act that would commend higher education to the people, or promote the development of institutions absolutely essential to our national progress. Unless you are prepared to imitate the system of foreign countries by substituting Ministerial responsibility for their administration and welfare, I trust that you will continue our present mode of recognizing the importance of our Universities by allowing their Representatives to share in the deliberations of the great Council of the nation. The right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) has spoken to us to-night in a manner different to that in which he spoke when the question of the reform of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge was before the House. Then, wrapped in his University toga, he spoke as a Conservative. Now, he has cast it off, and has spoken as a Radical. My right hon. Friend has advanced far in his Radicalism with respect to education, and fails to see the danger there is to the community if we show how little regard we have for the higher interests of education when it is proposed to abolish its representation in this House. I hope the House will not agree to the Amendment, and will not consent to refuse admission to the great Council of the nation of those who especially represent the interests of learning.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, he was obliged to say, though he said it with reluctance, that he felt constrained to vote for the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce). He was not likely to underrate the value of University education or the extension of University education and University influence in the country. There was, he supposed, no one who owed more to University education and University training than the humble individual who had the honour to address the Committee at that moment, and he quite agreed with what the right hon. Gentleman below him (Sir Lyon Playfair) had said on the subject as to the advantage to the House of having in it Representatives of the higher education and higher culture of the country. But, he would ask, what had that to do with the representation of the Universities? Could it be said that University representation was, in any sense, the representation of a living University? It was difficult to discuss the question without appearing to make personal allusions, and he therefore said at once that he was quite aware, and cordially agreed, that there were no Members in the House who were more respected and whose opinions were more looked up to than those who represented the Universities. But, admitting all that, he would ask, did the University constituencies at the present time represent real living Universities? Now, what was a University constituency? It was not a number of people who were engaged in teaching and were connected with the culture and education of the country at a University. It consisted of Masters of Arts, and Masters of Arts were gentlemen scattered all over the country—country clergymen, country squires, London lawyers, and people of that kind. What connection had they with that living University which was supposed to represent the learning and literature and science of the country—the body concentrated within the walls of the University itself. If the University representation were a real one—a representation of science and learning and literature—though he should look upon it as an anomaly, he should not be disposed to vote with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets. But everyone knew that the constituencies of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who represented the Universities in the House were people whose connection with the Universities consisted, for the most part, in their having succeeded in struggling through a pass degree, some 20 or 30, or perhaps 40 years ago, with a view to admission into Holy Orders—people who had no real connection with the living University, which we supposed to represent science and literature and learning. He believed it was notorious that, if they took into consideration the votes of the resident members of the Universities, it would be found that the majority of those gentlemen were not on the side which elected the present University Members to the House. It appeared to him that the conditions had entirely changed since representation in the House was accorded to the Universities. The greater facilities for communication which now existed, and the change of habits which had taken place had entirely altered the character of the University constituencies. In the days when University representation in Parliament was accorded to the Universities, the difficulties of communication and expense of travelling made it practically impossible for the non-resident Members of Convocation, who had severed their connection with the University, to exercise the franchise. The franchise in those days was practically confined to those men who were actually engaged in the teaching and learning of the Universities. They were the men whom it was intended to represent in the House. But of late years the conditions had entirely altered. Fellows of the Colleges no longer continued to reside at their University, as they used to do formerly, and the University constituencies now consisted of people scattered all over the country, who, perhaps, took no interest in, had no care for, and no connection with, the Universities, beyond the fact that they were periodically asked to fill up a voting paper for the election of a Member of Parliament. Now, he need not say that he should regret extremely the absence from the House of the right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed them (Mr. Beresford Hope), and, if he might venture to say so, of the other hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who represented the Universities in the House on either side of it; but he felt certain that those Members would speak with quite as much force, and probably with greater freedom, if they represented constituencies other than Universities. Why was this representation anomalous? Why, the constituents of hon. and right hon. Members who represented Universities in the House, in almost every instance, had a vote for some other qualification. If he (Mr. Davey) was a resident in London he had a vote for the metropolitan borough within which he resided; and if he was a country clergyman, he had a vote for the county in which his living was situated; so that the University franchise was merely a means of giving a second vote to a certain class of people. He asked by what justice, by what right, was it that any of the country clergymen, or, he might say, that he (Mr. Davey) himself, had a second vote for a University when he already possessed one as the occupier of a house in the borough in which he resided? In olden times, he could quite understand that it was right that the Universities should be represented, because the constituents, for the most part, consisted of resident members within the Universities. These gentlemen were excluded from the franchise in the city of Oxford and the borough of Cambridge, and it was but just and right that they should return their Members, otherwise there would have been no representation for them in Parliament. But now the constituents had facilities for voting, in the shape of voting papers, great facilities for travelling and communication, and were not resident members of the Universities. The resident members did, in a sense, represent science and literature, and learning; but that could not be pleaded in the case of the non-residents scattered all over the country, who were already represented by other qualifications. The right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) had—with justifiable pride—referred to his distinguished Predecessors in the representation which he adorned; but it had occurred to him (Mr. Davey) that that was rather an unfortunate topic to touch upon. The right hon. Gentleman had mentioned Lord Palmerston's name; but, if he (Mr. Davey) remembered rightly, when Lord Palmerston exhibited an independence of thought on the question of Catholic Emancipation he ceased to represent the University. Well, Oxford University was at one time represented by Sir Robert Peel. How was Sir Robert Peel disavowed from the University? Why, when he announced that he was convinced of the necessity of Catholic emancipation, and when he determined to vote for it, and showed some independence of thought on a subject in regard to which, no doubt, every Member of the House to day would be in entire agreement with him, the University of Oxford at once disavowed itself from one of its most distinguished Representatives. They all knew what occurred when the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) exhibited an independence of thought, which did not suit the constituency of the University of Oxford. The right hon. Gentleman had not only adorned the representation of that University, but his connection both with literature and learning and the distinguished degree which he had taken as a student there, marked him out as the person who, of all others, mostly justified University representation. But what happened? The right hon. Gentleman was dismissed from the representation. And hon. Members would find that, invariably, when a University had had the good fortune to be represented by a man—he would not say of the distinction of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, but by any man who took an independent line of his own, it had rejected him. It seemed to him (Mr. Davey) that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets had been amply justified in bringing this question before the Committee. The hon. Member could not have taken action through any feeling of disrespect to the Universities, for not only was he a distinguished member of one of them, but he had an official connection with it. University representation, however, was in itself an anomaly, and was not justified by the circumstances of the case.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Horace Davey) had said he would have no objection to there being a representation of a University, if that representation were of, what he was pleased to call, the real living University. Those who knew Oxford at the present day would not have much difficulty in following the hon. and learned Gentleman in distinguishing between the teaching Body of the University and those who had gone forth from the University. He (Mr. Staveley Hill) and others of the University of Oxford, who possessed seats in the House, claimed to be as great a part of the real living Body of the University as was the teaching Body. Why should the teaching Body be represented, and not the thing taught; why should those whose object was to instruct persons before they went out into the world have their Representative, and those who had been taught in the University not be considered such a portion of the University as to have also a share in the representation of the University in the House of Commons? The hon. and learned Gentleman, who brought forward this Amendment (Mr. Bryce), said that, although it might have been the right thing in old days that the Universities should have their Representatives, at the present time circumstances were so altered, and people were so entirely separated from the Universities, that it was not necessary that the Universities should have special representation. Allow him (Mr. Staveley Hill) to say that a close examination of those who still remained members of Convocation in Oxford, and of those who still remained members of the Senate in Cambridge, would show that there was a far closer connection between them and their University at the present time than there ever was in days gone by. The facility which persons living in the country had of obtaining information as to what went on in their University, and the great intimacy that was kept between those remaining in the University and those resident in the country made University men a far more close and united body than they ever were in times gone by. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets said it was a bad thing to bring politics into the Universities, because it caused a great amount of discord amongst the teachers. He (Mr. Staveley Hill) had been a Fellow of his College for a great many years; he had lived in Oxford, and seen a great deal of Oxford during those years; and, therefore, he was not a little surprised to hear the hon. and learned Member, whose opinions the House much respected, say that the introduction of political questions was a great element of discord. In the common room, no doubt, there were political differences; but those differences did not affect the teaching of the Universities. The members of the teaching Body of the University were not so weak as that; they could teach and make their teaching useful, whether they were of one side of politics or of the other. He would only venture to draw attention to a few of the words which were omitted by his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow University (Mr. J. A. Campbell), when he quoted the original Charter to the Universities. He did that because it seemed to him that the words of James I., as quoted by Blackstone, were well worth considering, and formed in themselves an argument in favour of University representation. The University was ordered—

"To send two of their own Body to serve for those students who, though useful members of the community, were neither concerned in the landed nor in the trading interests, and to protect in the Legislature the rights of the Republic of Letters."

Just as much now as in the old days, there were numbers of men who were not concerned in the landed, or the trading interests, but who had a deep interest in the community of Letters, men who were living at or away from Oxford, amongst hundreds and thousands of persons who were looking to them for an example. If there was to be class representation at all, he failed to find any class in the community who were more deserving of representation than the class of persons constituting the elective Bodies for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, he did not suppose that any Member of the House would entertain any doubt as to the service the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) had done to Letters generally, and a thousand other good objects. He had also not the smallest doubt that the House thoroughly acknowledged the extraordinary services rendered to science by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh Sir Lyon Playfair; but that was not the question at present before the Committee. He failed to see, in the lengthy account his right hon. Friend (Sir Lyon Playfair) gave of the services that were done to Letters by foreign Governments, any relevance to the subject. He was aware that this was, in more senses than one, an academical discussion; and that the conclusion was a foregone one. It was, he supposed, necessary, in consequence of the understanding which had been entered into between the two Front Benches, that this most anomalous part of our representative system should be maintained. He should not, therefore, have got up to say anything on this subject—believing that the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Bryce) was only a barren protest against what he (Mr. Rogers) believed was mischievous—if he had not something to say about his own experience. He had lived for 40 years in Oxford—since he took his degree he had lived there uninterruptedly. He had had an opportunity of watching the whole course of academical business, and he had taken no small part in the business of the University. He even took no small part in the business now, for he had the honour to be the largest holder of unpaid offices in the University. He was going down to-morrow to discharge the duties of two of his offices. What he complained of was the mischievous effect of political squabbles on the internal life of the University. For years past there had not been an election for a single academical office, into which the most mischievous and demoralizing wirepullers had not thrust their noses; and offices were not given to persons because of their competence to fill them, but because of their partizanship. All this had entirely come out of the mischievous representation of the University. The different posts of the University were looked upon as so many places for the majority of Convocation, and that was members of the Conservative Party. The enfranchisement of the Universities had been confirmed by diverse Acts of Parliament; but it was most important to remember that, at the time the franchise was originally given, a great majority of the members of the University held what were called spiritual estates—namely, the estates of clergymen, though they might be laymen. They were, therefore, only represented in Convocation; and one of the motives in giving the franchise was that property in the University should be represented. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Beresford Hope) had mentioned some of the distinguished men who had been returned by the Cambridge University. There were not very many—10 fingers would be quite sufficient to count them; and, similarly, it would not be difficult to count the distinguished men who had represented the Oxford University. Certainly, one of the men who represented Oxford University was, perhaps, the most infamous person who ever sat in the House of Commons—he meant Speaker Finch. The less said of Selden the better; but these were antiquarian considerations, which he admitted were of little moment now. The real question was, whether this representation of the Republic of Letters, as it was called, did any good for the Republic of Letters. He did not think it did any good. He thought it degraded, and demoralized, and opened these seats of learning to Party conflicts, and to a perpetual system of Party preparation. In the next place, he did not believe it was expedient that there should be anomalous or double franchises created by Parliament. He was aware that this franchise was to be maintained. He knew very well that the understanding between the two Front Benches was not likely to be disturbed, whatever might be the remonstrances or opinions of hon. Gentlemen on the subject. But it was not unlikely that Members of the House would remember and talk about the matter, and that they would not fail to tell the country to whom it was they owed the retention of this kind of franchise. He would not say it was certain; but, perhaps, when a new Parliament was elected, this, with other mischievous retentions in this Redistribution Bill, would be swept into the limbo of past defects, and they would wonder that any person, except James I., was so foolish as to give such representation, and that any persons, except the Parliament of the year 1886, or thereabouts, were so unwise as to maintain it.

MR. PLUNKET said, he need not address the Committee at any length; but as some things had been stated by the assailants of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, which certainly did apply to the University of Dublin, he would like to take an immediate opportunity of setting his own constituency right. He must say that, during the whole of this debate, the arguments that had been brought forward for the great change proposed by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) had been utterly inadequate — he could hardly say they were serious arguments — when they came to consider what the change was that it was proposed in this off-hand way to make. Now, for the first time since Universities obtained their right to send Members to Parliament, was that right impugned or challenged. For more than two and a-half centuries the old Universities of England and the University of Dublin had continuously sent Members to the House of Commons. Not only was that the case; but, in more recent times, on every occasion when the representation of the country was reviewed and reformed, so far from any attack being made on the principle of the Parliamentary representation of the Universities, the principle of that representation was sanctioned and further developed. For instance, in the great Reform Bill of 1832, the University of Dublin, which, since the Act of Union, had been deprived of one of its Members, had that Member restored; and, when Parliament came again in 1867 to consider the representation of the country, so far from any attack being made upon the representation of the Universities, nine Members instead of six were given to the Universities, for it was so late as 1867 that the Member for the University of London and the Members for the Scotch Universities were added to the House of Commons. Therefore, he maintained that all precedent, all teaching of history, all the decisions of previous Parliaments were in favour of the representation of the Universities in the House of Commons, and, until to-night, as far as he had been able to find out, the principle of that representation had never been seriously challenged. Now, let them consider what were the arguments which had been brought forward for this great change. He submitted they were wholly inadequate; they were of a most hypothetical nature; they were of a most unsubstantial character. What was the first argument? Why, that the Parliamentary contests created a pernicious excitement within the Universities, an excitement which overthrew the ordinary tranquil course of University life. It was said that the Members for Universities were elected by a caucus vote. In the University of Dublin such a thing had never been dreamt of. He knew the University of Dublin perfectly well; and when hon. Members said that only a Professor or a Fellow of the University should represent the constituency, he took issue with them at once. He attended his University as much as any member of it. He was constantly going in and out of the University, and he knew every bit of the University of Dublin quite as well as the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets knew the life of his own University. It was absurd to say that they who did not happen to be Professors were unable to represent the wants and wishes of the University. All the arguments he had heard advanced in support of the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets appeared to him to divide themselves into two classes. One of those classes contained various criticisms upon the kind of Gentlemen who were returned by Universities to Parliament. It was very easy to make a general imputation that the sitting Members were not fit persons to represent Universities, and that, after all, they did not contribute much more than the Representatives of any other body to the advantage of the country. He (Mr. Plunket) was not going to speak of himself, especially after the far too flattering way in which the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Albert Grey) referred to him personally. But who were the Members who, at present, represented Universities in the House of Commons? Almost every one of them was either an ex-Minister, or privy councillor, one who, by his character and antecedents, had a right to sit on one of the Front Benches of the House; and several of them had actually been selected by the House itself to occupy the Chair of the Chairman of Ways and Means, or to preside over the Private Business of the House, because the House had the greatest confidence in their ability to direct its proceedings. Really, until the debate that evening, the only argument he ever heard advanced against University representation came from hon. Gentlemen who said—"Yes, they may be very distinguished persons, and useful persons in the House of Commons, but they are not exactly the kind of people we want." It was said that Universities should be represented by Professors, and that the men returned did not smell of midnight oil, or the must of the old library. Hon. Members opposite gave different definitions of the kind of men University Members ought to be; but what he observed as curious was, that when a Professor described what the Representative should be like, the description was a faithful photograph of the Professor himself. The great complaint of certain hon. Gentlemen was, that some persons were not University

Members instead of those who were. He would put one question to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets. Suppose a majority of the electors of the University of Oxford were as the electors of one of the Scotch Universities and of the University of London were, sympathizers with the hon. and learned Gentleman's political views, and they had pitched upon him—and they could not have pitched upon a more distinguished scholar—would he have declined to accept the representation, and, if he had accepted it, would he have been found to-night proposing to extinguish University constituencies altogether? He (Mr. Plunket) would pass away from that and come to the real question. What were the serious arguments that were brought against University representation? The two arguments he had been dealing with could hardly have been seriously advanced, because there was nothing at all substantial in them. The serious argument was, that the seats could not be spared, as they were wanted so badly for other places. Did hon. Gentlemen grudge the Universities nine Members out of the 670? In the first place, it had been said that the Members returned did not represent the living Universities of the present day. He claimed that they did represent a living University. He, himself, claimed to represent the living University of Dublin as distinctly as any Professor or Fellow who could be chosen. There were men far more eminent and able than himself; but, so far as knowledge of the institution, and so far as sympathy with everything which went on in the University, his heart beat with every throb of University life. But the Members for the Universities did not only represent the living Universities. In the present state of affairs, when the great learned Professions had no separate representation in the House of Commons, it was of great advantage to the State that those classes should find representation through the Members for the Universities. He was not at all sure that in the University of Dublin the clergy were now the majority of the constituency, because he knew that, for some time, the voters who were not clergymen had been rapidly increasing in number; but he claimed to represent in Parliament not only the clergy of the Protestant Church, but the great

[First Night.]

Professions of Law, of Medicine, and of Engineering. He did not mean to say that every lawyer, and doctor, and engineer in Ireland were his constituents; but he maintained that the vast majority were, and he asked, if they did not get direct representation through him, where were they to get it? If that was necessary in former times, when the constituencies were less democratic, and smaller than they were now, what would be the case in future? How were the members of the great Professions to find representation, when they were scattered about in constituencies of 50,000 people each? Why, the thing was quite absurd. It would only be by the merest accident that they would have any substantial weight. If they got the ear of their Member of Parliament, it would be by the goodwill of that Gentleman, and not from any special claim they would have upon him. Therefore, he said, University representation was requisite, in order that the views not only of the living Universities, but of those members of Universities who were now most learned in the different Professions should be put forward in the House. He did not stop there. He contended that what was referred to as the Republic of Letters was as nearly reached by the representation of the graduates as it was possible to reach it. He did not care a pin whether they drew the line at M.A. or B.A.; but he contended that the graduates of the Universities were as good a body of electors for the purpose of representing the great Republic of Letters as could be found. He was very unwilling to detain the Committee longer; but, perhaps, he might be allowed to say another word with regard to the constituency which he had the honour to represent. It had been charged against Universities that they sold their degrees in some way or other, and that the sale was in some way connected with the right to vote. He did not know what the case was at Oxford or Cambridge; but whatever the charge was, it did not apply to the University of Dublin, for every man who took the degree of M.A. was entitled to be placed on the Register without any fee or payment, annual or otherwise. A man was put on the Register without his even making a claim, so that the charge which had been made in no way concerned the University of Dublin. He wished, further, to say that he had never heard any opinion expressed by any Party whatever that the representation of the University of Dublin should cease on other than political grounds. A statement was made in the House the other night to the effect that it was distasteful to the so-called National Party in Ireland that there should be Members in the House obstructing their cause. Now, he had no wish to reopen the somewhat heated controversy which took place in the early portion of the evening; but when they were asked to abolish the representation of the Dublin University, because the Members returned ran counter to what was called the Nationalist Party, he was entitled to say that outside of Ulster there were 304,227 Protestants.

MR. SEXTON: They have increased 100,000 since the right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke some little while ago.

MR. PLUNKET said, he corrected himself at the time. There was no doubt of the matter; the number of Protestants in Ireland outside of Ulster was 304,227. Well, according to the mere numerical calculation, these people were entitled to six Members. They were, however, scattered amongst the multitudes of Catholics, and, therefore, their voices would be, practically, silent in the House. He just asked this question, and asked it frankly—under these circumstances, could anyone allege that the two Members allotted to Dublin University too many to represent in this House the wishes of the scattered Loyalists?

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he did not rise to discuss the general question; he simply wished to offer one or two observations with reference to some misleading remarks which had been made in the course of the debate in regard to the University which he had the honour to represent. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Bryce), in bringing the subject before the Committee, had referred to the University of London as being a merely examining University; and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Southwark (Mr. Rogers) had expressed the same idea more tersely and more forcibly. He (Sir John Lubbock), however, would be able to show, in a very few words, that this statement was calculated to convey a wrong impression, and that he ought not to pass it altogether without notice. In Oxford and Cambridge Universities instruction was mainly given not by the University, but by the Colleges. When the University of London was founded, University College, London, stood in the same position in regard to the University as University College, Oxford, stood in in regard to the University of Oxford. But there were persons who were anxious to receive degrees without the necessity of going through a course of College residence; they brought their case before the Government, and it was considered that it would be a great advantage to have some Body which should give degrees without requiring residence. The University of London undertook the duty, and had discharged it to the best of its ability; and those who were conversant with the facts would, he believed, agree that this had been of great advantage to the country. One other remark he had to make in reference to an observation which had fallen from an hon. Member as to Members not representing their own Universities, and not being interested in their Universities. The right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Plunket) had commented on this statement as regards himself; and he (Sir John Lubbock), for his own part, would merely say that he had been a member of the Senate of the University of London for 20 years, and for eight years had been its Vice Chancellor. Though that University could, no doubt, have sent an abler Representative to the House than himself, it could not have sent one who took more interest in it, or in the work it was performing.

Mr. HICKS said, he did not wish to trouble the Committee with more than a single remark. As one of the class which had been spoken of in such contemptuous terms by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Davey), he wished to say he was prepared to leave this discussion entirely in the hands of those who were more intimately connected with the Universities than he was; but with regard to the extraordinary speech of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke)—a speech which he (Mr. Hicks) was sorry to say had been addressed to a very empty House, and had not been heard either by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government, or by the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote), but which, no doubt, by this time, had been fully communicated to them—he desired to ask whether the Prime Minister intended to offer any explanation of it? What did this extraordinary apparent want of agreement between the right hon. Baronet and the other Members of the Government mean? As an independent Member, he (Mr. Hicks) must protest against the attitude assumed by the right hon. Baronet. They had heard a great deal about a compromise and agreement between the two Front Benches, and about the Redistribution Bill having been brought in in consequence of that agreement. The measure had been passed through its earlier stages almost without a word of discussion; and now they were told that, when it was finally disposed of, there was an end to the compromise and agreement as to its provisions. ["No, no!"] He heard cries of "No!" but the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Local Government Board told them distinctly in his speech that, the moment the Bill was disposed of, he was open to consider any Resolution or proposal to alter it. It was to be regretted that there were so few Members in the House at the time; but he trusted that the right hon. Baronet's speech would be fully reported in the Press, that it would be read, and that when the Bill came again before the Committee, the House would be prepared to take it into its own hands, and to deal with it in a calm and impartial spirit, clause by clause. He trusted that the debate would not be brought to a close without Her Majesty's Government explaining how far they agreed with the views which had been expressed by the right hon. Baronet, and which had been endorsed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt).

Mr. WEBSTER said, he should like, before this debate closed, to say a few words on the subject of Scottish University representation. He had been so long connected with one of the Universities that he could speak with some experience and knowledge of the working of all of them; and, from long observation of what occurred in them in regard to Parliamentary Elections, he thought he could reasonably give an opinion upon that subject also. All his experience and observation had led him, very reluctantly, to the conclusion that the system of giving to the four Universities in Scotland 1-30th of the whole representation of Scotland was utterly indefensible. He would remind the Committee that this system of academical franchise had no hold on the past history of Scotland. There were none of the associations, none of the recollections which had, no doubt, hallowed this system in the case of the English and Irish Universities. It had its rise only in 1868, when it was introduced, for the first time, into the system of Parliamentary Elections in Scotland on the express ground—he thought he quoted the exact words of Mr. Disraeli—

“That it would insure the ‘presence in this House of men eminent for their knowledge and qualifications in learning, literature, and science, and would enable them more properly to do justice to those subjects in this House.’”

Then, on the same lines, his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair), who did honour to that University, had given an exposition of his own views as to what a University Member ought to be. One of the conditions was, that there should be an absence of Party politics and Party feeling, and that the Member should be a man chosen as eminent in knowledge of higher education, and should devote himself in the House to the interests and promotion of education. Well, all this was very fine in theory; but how did the system operate in practice? He had risen to-night to state that he knew that it was utterly untrue. No such thing existed in the practice of Parliamentary Elections. With regard to the University of Aberdeen, of the Governing Body of which he had long been a member, he might fairly say that the election there had turned entirely upon Party politics; and, with regard to the University of Edinburgh, the right hon. Gentleman who represented it had, it was true, every qualification that could enable him to serve it, and do honour to it; but could it be said that he had been elected with a view to his possession of those qualities? The very reverse was the case. His election, in 1880, went upon purely Party lines. He was returned by the narrowest majority. His eminence then was all that it is now, and his opponent was a man whose name at this moment he (Mr. Webster) did not suppose anybody in the House remembered, and yet that gentleman had polled only 74 votes less than the right hon. Member. It was the practice on the opposite side, as well as on this side of the House, to speak with pride of the right hon. Gentleman; but how were they (the Opposition) going to treat him at the next Election? Why, he was to be opposed as violently as on the last occasion. Was his opponent a man distinguished, whether in letters or in science? No. He was a lawyer of ability, no doubt, in his own Profession, but with no pretence to the possession of those qualities which the right hon. Gentleman had himself told them should, in theory, distinguish the Representatives of those Universities. The truth was, that these Universities, in place of being, as the right hon. Gentleman who represented the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) had said, centres of culture and high thinking, were strongholds of narrow class and sectarian feeling. Let them take the strongest case possible. It was part of the duty of the Council of Graduates, who choose Parliamentary Representatives, also to elect representatives from their own Body to the government of the University. At a recent contest in the University of Aberdeen Dr. Bain, whom everybody knew to be the very man to be a member of the University Council, who had been a Professor in the University, and had great knowledge of both higher and secondary education, was rejected by a very large majority in the election of a representative in the Governing Body of the University. He cited that case as an illustration, and submitted that the elections in Scottish Universities, in place of being governed by a regard for those qualifications of Members, which ought to be the real consideration, were governed entirely by what, in their case, he must call wretched Party politics.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: After the very interesting and able speeches which we have heard from the Representatives of the different Universities who have seats in this House, I think it quite unnecessary for me to enter into the general discussion. I rise for the purpose of saying a few words upon a subject which has been already referred to—namely, a speech which I understand was made by the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke). I had not the advantage of hearing that speech; but I am quite aware that the opinions of the right hon. Baronet—and the House is quite aware too—that his opinions upon many questions, and upon this amongst others, differ from those of the Party who sit on this side of the House, and, I am happy to think, from those of many who sit on his own side of the House. As I have said, I, unfortunately, did not hear his speech; but I understand that what he did was to say that it was impossible for him to support or accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets Mr. Bryce, though, at the same time, he reserved to himself on any future occasion the right to take a different course. Whenever that time comes the right hon. Baronet will find, in the Conservative Party, his staunchest and firmest opponents; and we shall be quite prepared to argue the question on the lines fully before us, and to do our best to show that the right hon. Baronet is in the wrong. But what I understand at present to be the feeling of the right hon. Baronet is that disfranchising the Universities lies altogether outside the scope of the present Bill; and that it is on that account that he is ready to adhere to the understanding which exists on the subject of this Bill, and to resist the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets. But I think that, irrespective of the merits of the case, it is an irrefutable argument against the proposal that the Bill was introduced under peculiar circumstances. I do not mean with reference to any understanding between the different Parties in the House; but I allude, if you like, to the character and circumstances of the Bill, and to the circumstances of its introduction, and to what it is intended to do, and that it is not within its scope to deal with the question of disfranchisement. Let me ask the Committee for a moment to consider what it is that this Bill proposes to do. The House has already passed an Act largely extending the franchise of these Kingdoms; and in order to accommodate that extension to the circumstances of the country, it is necessary that there should be an extensive redistribution of seats.

This Bill has, therefore, been brought in for the express purpose of so redistributing them, and to give fair and proper expression to the great extension of the franchise which was passed last year. There is, or there ought to be, nothing disfranchising about it. It has been pointed out several times that this Bill and the previous one, taking the two measures together, are intended to disfranchise no one; but if we were to take away representation from the Universities, we should disfranchise a number, perhaps a considerable number, of persons. There is no reason whatever why you should introduce into a measure intended for one purpose that which is totally at variance with it. Moreover, let me ask the Committee to consider whether this is the proper time when we ought to attempt to reduce the representation of learning in this House. Remember what you are doing. You are enormously increasing the power of the numerical majority; you are seriously increasing the representation of mere numbers. Ought you not to have some kind of reservation, if only a small one—some kind of counterbalance? Do you not see the importance of preserving some kind of counterbalancing force—however slight—against the power of mere numbers? Property, to a certain extent, under any system, will find a way of obtaining some amount of representation; but this is a question of the representation of learning—of doing, through the Universities, what, undoubtedly, is not done by any other portion of our representation—and providing that which otherwise would not be provided for. At the same time, without going into the great argument which has been so well illustrated by my hon. and right hon. Friends on both sides of the House who represent Universities, we have sufficient ground on which to stand, and I hope the Committee will refuse to accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. GLADSTONE: Though the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) has only detained the Committee for a very few moments, I shall be still shorter in my observations. I wish, without making any particular reference to the closing sentences of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, to express my concurrence with what I take to be his main argument. The right hon. Baronet, without having heard the speech of my right hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke), accepts the position taken up by my right hon. Friend, who endeavoured to urge upon the Committee, as I should myself be respectfully disposed to do, that this question is not one which can, consistently with the general figure of the work we have before us, be dealt with in the course of the present Bill. The two measures—namely, that for the franchise and that dealing with the areas—might, as the right hon. Baronet said, undoubtedly be considered from one point of view as one measure; but, at the same time, although they are two parts of one great subject, yet the Government has kept them rigidly and entirely separate and distinct. The one we are now dealing with relates entirely to the distribution into areas of the constituencies provided for the country; and the other determines who is a “capable citizen” to exercise the franchise—to use a phrase which has been used by others as well as myself. We determined what was a “capable citizen” in dealing with the franchise. We are not now concerned with the question of the “capable citizen,” but with the question of the areas into which the constituency is to be divided; and, undoubtedly, it is true, as has been urged by the right hon. Gentleman, that if we were to accept the proposition of my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Bryce) we should introduce into this plan an element which it does not contain, except in the rarest instances, and accidentally, perhaps, we might discover it; but, in principle, the Bill may fairly be said to exclude everything in the nature of disfranchisement. On the general question I do not venture to give an opinion, as it is one which, when it is brought forward, will require very mature consideration. I do not venture to convey an intimation as to the course I should myself take. My position is a rather peculiar one. I represented a great University for a longer time than it is usual for it to be represented, and was so unfortunate as finally to lose its favour, though I must say not until I had greatly tried its patience, and not until I had received from it many striking marks of favour and indulgence. I do not, therefore, hold out any engagement of any kind with respect to my own course outside of this Bill; but I confidently put it to the Committee, that the Government is making no undue compromise of its principles in holding that in this Bill, which has nothing to do with the question of franchise—indeed, I will go further and say, in this plan which does not embrace any element of disfranchisement—the occupants of this Bench will certainly, on this occasion, give their vote cordially, and go into the same Lobby with the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and will decline to support any proposal for the destruction of the representation of the Universities in this measure, which I hope will shortly be passed into law.

MR. HEALY said, he had continually noticed that the method pursued by the Government in dealing with questions brought before the House was to argue “Not now, but some other time.” They said—“We do not say that what you propose is not very admirable; but what we contend is that this is not the proper season, and if you will only bring the subject on some Sunday in next week, or next month, or next year, we will take your admirable plan into our most indulgent consideration.” He (Mr. Healy) would tell hon. Gentlemen interested in this subject, however, that this was a case of “now or never.” Either the Government or the House must deal with it now, or they would never get a grip of it again. They had now got these Universities in their power, and his advice was—“Cut their throats.” Kill them now; for, if they had another chance, it would be giving them a fresh lease of life. Therefore, for right hon. Gentlemen to say that they confined themselves to nothing, that they made no pledge, and that some day, in some future generation, if they were spared—as he trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would long be—they would come forward and lend this subject the magic influence of their name, amounted to nothing. The present Government might fall next week, or the week after, or any day, then they would have the opposite Party in power, and no chance of a question like this being dealt with. Hon. Gentlemen opposite should not be deluded by statements such as those of the Prime Minister. If they thought they had a chance of doing this University system a mischief, now was the time to hurt it. As to what had fallen from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), it was contended that there were in Ireland above 300,000 loyal Irish Protestants who would not be represented in the slightest degree if it were not for the Members for the Dublin University; what did that amount to? Why, it amounted to this—that, in the Irish Provinces, no one had any feeling other than that of a Nationalist—“Oh, oh!”—he meant for Parliamentary purposes. The Loyalists in the three Southern Provinces of Ireland could not get a single man to represent them except the right hon. and learned Members for Dublin University; and, because that was so, therefore Parliament must invent a fancy franchise. If the Loyalists could not get a Representative in Ireland in the ordinary way, then, logically, let them do without it. There was no reason why a loyal minority should have a fancy franchise invented for it. There appeared to him to be every reason why these fancy franchises should be cut off altogether. The door should either be open or shut. If the loyal minority were entitled to representation in Ireland, let them have it; but if, by reason of their number, they were not, then let them be without it. There was no reason in the world why because a man, by a grinding process, went through a series of preliminary preparation to day, which he would not be able to do perhaps next year, if he were tested, that, therefore, he should have a right in perpetuity to vote for Members of Parliament. If the most loyal Catholic—a Catholic who would grovel in the dust before the name of Royalty—were to offer himself for election at Dublin University, they would set the dogs at him. It was not loyalty that this constituency wanted, it was assentancy; but, of course, it was only natural for Englishmen to be gulled on this point. This House was entering upon a democratic course. It might be right or it might be wrong. He Mr. Healy would say—“Let us go on fairly and squarely. If you are going to trust the people, trust them all through, and do not fall back upon such a system as this.” What did the University electors do when they had a chance of distinguishing themselves? Why, they put out the right hon. Gentleman who was now First Lord of the Treasury, and who was the most distinguished man who had appeared in Europe for, perhaps, a century. That right hon. Gentleman was Member for a University, and they turned him out. And for whom? He Mr. Healy did not intend to make any invidious comparisons; but was there any Gentleman in that House at the present time who could be compared with the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown? Yet that was the result of the University franchise. He would ask those who believed in the University constituencies to consider what those constituencies had done in the past—to remember that the most distinguished men who had been brought forward had got the kick out and the go-by, unless they were prepared to give way to the influence of these wretched little centres. He would ask the Committee whether they were prepared to trust these wretched University Dons; or whether they would not rather trust the broad masses of the people, who might be wrong sometimes, yet who, in the main, he would venture to say, were always in the right?

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND, who spoke amidst considerable interruption, assured the Committee that if he could only believe that the groan which arose simultaneously with himself was a groan against the monstrosity of University representation, he should be very glad indeed that that groan had been heard. However, he did not intend to detain the Committee for any length of time; and, therefore, he hoped that Radical Members opposite would not give vent to their unpleasant habit of groaning, in which they indulged whenever an Irish Member rose to speak from an Irish point of view. There could be no doubt whatever that it was a very extreme injustice indeed that the Universities should have special Parliamentary representation. The University of Dublin was an institution which was opposed to every aspiration, national and religious, of the great majority of the people of Ireland; and he did not believe the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen who represented the University of Dublin to-day (Mr. Gibson and Mr. Plunket) would be able, if they were thrown out of that constituency, to find another constituency in any part of Ireland at all. In a few counties in the North, these right hon. and learned Gentlemen might possibly get elected; but, as his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had pointed out, the great majority of the people in the other three Provinces of Ireland were extremely national, and the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen to whom he referred could not possibly get a seat in any of those Provinces. It was, then, a monstrous injustice that they should be allowed to have seats as Representatives of the University of Dublin. The first principle of Parliamentary representation was, that Members returned to represent a particular part of the country should be voted for by a large number of the people of that part or the country, and should represent the wishes of a great number of those people. But he would venture to say that the right hon. and learned Gentlemen the Members for the University of Dublin did not represent the wishes of even one-fourth of the people of Ireland; and it was monstrously unjust that a handful of men belonging to that University should have the same political privileges as constituencies containing thousands and thousands of people. He was entirely opposed to the principle of University representation. If it was argued that the Universities should have Members of their own because they were learned Bodies—if the graduates were to have a right to the franchise simply because they possessed so much learning—then he did not see why a right to the franchise should not be given to other people simply because they possessed so much property. Neither property nor learning ought, in his opinion, to have any weight in the matter. ["Hear, hear!"] He was very glad to hear Conservative Members cheering that sentiment. He did not think that because a few hundreds of specially learned men were brought together in a University, that was any reason why they should have the same privileges given to them as were only given to their fellow-countrymen when congregated in thousands; and he believed that the average electors of any constituency were quite as rightly and as well-qualified to vote as those gentlemen who returned the Members for the University of Dublin. ["Oh, oh!"] As the Committee appeared to be very anxious not to give him a hearing, and as he had been subjected to continual interruption since he rose to give his opinion, he should conclude by moving that the Chairman be directed to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. William Redmond.)

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to appeal to the Prime Minister to allow this Motion to pass. He supposed it was not a very popular Motion to make at that time of night (10 minutes past 12 o'clock); but it must be perfectly evident, from the reception which had just been given to his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. William Redmond), that it was quite impossible for the Irish Members to present their aspect of the case involved in the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) with any probability of getting any sort of a hearing. The question of the representation of Dublin University had been very slightly touched upon, although it had been very efficiently opened by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for that University. It was a matter of very considerable importance. The Irish Members, or many of them, certainly objected very strongly, however they might feel regarding the general question of the representation of such Universities—such real Universities—as those of Oxford and Cambridge, they objected very strongly indeed to the representation of the University which was supposed to be the University of Ireland, but which was really only the University of a very small section of the Irish people. Whatever claim might have been made out by the supporters of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, the Irish Members certainly did not consider that either the Government or the supporters of the University of Dublin had, so far as the debate had yet gone, made out any satisfactory claim for the representation of that University. The question of the representation of the University of Dublin had not been at all adequately dealt with so far, nor had any good claim been established by those gentlemen who might be supposed to be the supporters and upholders of the maintenance of the representation of the University of Dublin. He, therefore, respectfully submitted that if this question were not to be raised later on—and it could not be conveniently raised later on, because then it could only be raised on the Schedules—the Irish Members should be allowed an opportunity of placing their views upon it before the Committee, and of discussing the maintenance of the separate representation of the University of Dublin with the same freedom with which, during the whole of this evening, there had been discussed the merits of the maintenance of the separate representation of the English Universities. So far, the question of Irish University representation had hardly entered into the case, except under the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin. Grave and weighty considerations of policy, justice, and expediency were underlying this question of the maintenance of the Dublin University; and he had yet to learn that the English House of Commons intended to refuse to the Irish Members the right of putting their views upon this all-important question before them. He did not know any matter that was of more importance in regard to the question of the educational interests of Ireland than this same question of the representation of the University of Dublin. Of course, he was not allowed, under the Rules which regulated the proceedings of the Committee, to enter at this moment into the merits of the question; but, certainly, he himself, and many of his Friends, would be desirous of laying their opinions before the Committee. All he could say, in conclusion, was that he did not desire to interfere with the convenience of the Committee in coming to a decision upon the particular question which had been occupying their attention, and which had been debated for many hours that evening—namely, the question of the English Universities. But he could not see, at the present moment, any way in which the Irish Members could reconcile their own duty in this matter with the convenience of the Committee—that was to say, he could not see how, if a division were taken on the Amendment which had been proposed from the Chair, his Friends and himself could raise the subject anew in any form which would be of the slightest practical use. As he had said a few moments ago, they would have to wait until the Schedules of the Bill were reached; and then, of course, as they all knew, when that period came, it would be impossible to raise any discussion such as they desired to raise. They would be told that the matter had been finally closed in the discussion on the clauses, and they would be hustled out of the way. If the Government could show that there was any reasonable method by which the question could be raised again, he and his Friends would not desire to raise the Irish branch of the subject while the debate on the English branch was going on. They did not desire to obtrude themselves now; but they did desire to have an opportunity of thrashing this matter out. They were very willing to be the last served in these matters, as the history of the proceedings of the House of Commons had already proved; and if the Government could point out any way in which the Irish Members could yield to the convenience of the Committee now, and allow the immediate question before the Committee to go to a division, while, at the same time, they retained the right to raise again that part of the question in which they were specially interested, he could only say that he and his hon. Friends, on whose behalf he spoke, would be most happy to adopt it. They felt that the University of Dublin, however it might have succeeded as a higher educational establishment for a section of the Irish people, had undoubtedly failed as a national institution; and that the question was one of so much importance that they could not, with the slightest regard for their own position, and for their duty to their countrymen, avoid attracting to it that attention in that House which its importance demanded.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sorry I cannot meet the appeal of the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Parnell). The hon. Member who made this Motion for reporting Progress (Mr. William Redmond) complained of the reception which he met with from the Committee. Well, Sir, that hon. Member has not lived so many years in this world as I have; but, as he gathers experience, he will find that mankind are apt to become indifferent to favours, and appreciate them less in proportion as they are profusely bestowed upon them. ["Hear, hear."] The favours of the hon. Gentleman have been bestowed, even in the course of the present evening, with such liberality and bounty upon this House, that I admit that in some portion of the House there is not that high estimate formed of them which unquestionably ought to prevail. I am quite certain, however, that that does not indicate any indisposition on the part of the Committee to discuss this question. The hon. Member for the City of Cork has said that we have been spending the evening in discussing the case of the English Universities. I am quite sure the hon. Gentleman has not heard the debate, or he would hardly have made that statement. It has been a very interesting debate, not on English Universities, but on the principle of University representation. The hon. Member says, however—and here I am wholly at one with him—that the case of the University of Dublin is, in some respects, unique. I am certain that if the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), who rose to offer some remarks on a collateral issue, had thought fit to make them upon the University of Dublin, he would have been heard—I will not say with patience, for that would not do justice either to him or to the Committee—but with the utmost interest and attention, and were he to do so now, I am sure the same result would follow. If the hon. Member for the City of Cork himself (Mr. Parnell) is disposed at this hour to enter upon the question, I will answer for it that there is no doubt whatever that he, likewise, will be heard, I may say, to his heart's content; for the intelligence which he brings to bear upon such a subject, and the relevancy with which he always argues, put us in the most favourable state of mind to hear him. I hope that this Motion for reporting Progress will not be pressed, and that we may be permitted to proceed with the debate upon the subject.

MR. SEXTON said, the Committee had lately been treated to many novelties, and the most startling of these was the method which the Prime Minister had taken of conducting the debates. Instead of allowing a Member to rise of his own motion and at his own discretion, according to the ideas in his mind, the Prime Minister, not satisfied with the New Rules and with the operation of Urgency, took upon himself the position of dictator of debate, and presumed that he had met the necessity of the case, and shown a due regard to the proper functions of the House, by calling upon one particular Member or another to address himself to the subject before the Committee. That was an arrangement which he (Mr. Sexton), for one, could not accept; for he thought the debate should be ordered and conducted according to the individual desire and intention of any hon. Member who took part in it. The Prime Minister, when he condescended to be jocose, which was not often, was as a rule intelligible; but perhaps it was owing to the dimness of his (Mr. Sexton's) understanding—[Laughter]

—he confessed that he saw no great intellectual skill in taking advantage of an admission which a man was perfectly ready to make—but perhaps it was owing to the dimness of his understanding that the joke ventilated upon his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. William Redmond) by the right hon. Gentleman was unintelligible to his mind. It was no proof of its point that it should be applauded by the followers of the Prime Minister, who were equally ready with a due facility to worship the right hon. Gentleman's politics, or his wit. He (Mr. Sexton) was not aware that his hon. Friend had addressed to the Committee more than a few brief words that night; and he thought ungenial wit might well be spared from, if not the oldest, at least the most experienced Member of the House, to the youngest. As to the question before the Committee—this great question of the University representation of the three countries—it was only reached at the dinner hour, and had only occupied about three hours of the time of the Committee. Yet they were told that the subject had been adequately discussed. He was glad to say that when Sir Arthur Otway was in the Chair they never had the startling decisions upon adequacy of discussions which were sometimes given under other circumstances; but there had recently been decisions in that House on that point which left one in doubt as to what might be deemed, according to the ideas prevailing there of propriety and justice, the precise limits of adequate discussion. The Prime Minister had said that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) could not have heard the debate, and that the debate had not been upon Irish, English, or Scotch University representation, but upon the principle of University representation as compared or contrasted with the ordinary Parliamentary representation of the general community. Now, he (Mr. Sexton) had sat in the House for some portion of the evening, and had heard the very eloquent speech of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) on the particular claims of that institution. He had also heard a speech on the difference between the qualifications of voters in the Scotch and English Universities; and he had heard a proposal made which had quickened the risibility of the Prime Minister, that the graduate qualification should be extended to the whole body in Oxford and Cambridge, as in Scotland. If these were not matters concerning the comparative merits of the University system of representation in Ireland, England, and Scotland, he did not know what they were. The representation of the Prime Minister was not an accurate representation of the debate. The representation of Trinity College, Dublin, was peculiar. The Dublin University held a peculiar position towards politics and the public life of the community. The Irish Members who sat near him—Mr. Sexton—represented that section and part of public opinion in Ireland which was most entitled to be heard on the question of the University representation of the country, and a few words from two Members of the Party, rising at midnight in a jaded and unwilling House, did not represent as fully as was necessary the views which ought to be laid before the Committee. Under these circumstances, he appealed to the Prime Minister to give an opportunity of concluding the debate another night, for he was certain that in that way the time of the Committee would be saved.

MR. HEALY said, that as his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had pointed out, the Irish Members were in no sense whatever anxious to stand between the Committee and a division. All they desired to do was to save their right to debate the question of the Dublin University, either now or at some future time. Unfortunately, the enacting clause of the Bill with regard to this matter was the second; and it set forth that from and after the end of this present Parliament the Parliamentary boroughs named in the first part of the 1st Schedule should cease to return any Member. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) proposed to insert the words "and Universities." If the Committee allowed this opportunity to pass, it would not be possible afterwards to raise the question of the University of Dublin. He (Mr. Healy) would like to know from the Chair whether that view was or was not correct? He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork that it was reasonable enough that the question of the Irish University should be separated from that of the English Universities. It was not wanted to raise them upon the same lines; and he would like to ask the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), or the Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Arthur Otway), whether, if a division were now taken on the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, they would not be excluding all opportunity of raising the Dublin University question before the Report stage? Of course, he was aware that it could be raised on the Report stage; but what was wanted was to have the question discussed in Committee.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I believe that on the Order Paper there is a proposal to deal with the question of the Universities generally by a new clause, to be proposed, I think, by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton). I think that probably, Sir, you would rule that, if the question should include all Universities, it could not be raised again after a decision had been taken upon the point on which it is now proposed to divide the Committee; but I would suggest to the hon. Member who has just spoken, and also to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), that that does not arise in the present case. If their Amendments are intended to be pointed solely to the University of Dublin—I am not to be understood as suggesting in any way that we should support or oppose such proposals; but for the information of hon. Members who may desire to raise the question, I would point out, and especially to the two hon. Members whom I have named, that if they choose to propose a special clause affecting only the University of Dublin, they might do so, and their object would thus be gained. If that meets their views, they might allow the division to be taken on the general question, and reserve to themselves the opportunity of debating this particular point afterwards.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he preferred to have a ruling from the Chair on the point. He wished to know whether or no, after a division had been taken on the present Amendment, and that Amendment had been defeated, the Chairman would exclude any new clause which any hon. Member might desire to propose for disfranchising the University of Dublin.

MR. BRYCE said, he wished to say a word on the point of Order before this question was answered. The Amendment which he had proposed was followed, later on, by an Amendment to the Schedule. In that Amendment to the Schedule he had put down the names of all the Universities. Of course, if the present Amendment were defeated he should not move the following one; but that Amendment would be equally in Order if it named only the English and Scotch Universities, and not the University of Dublin. It would be equally an Amendment properly following up the present Amendment. He submitted that, as the present Amendment spoke only of Universities in general, and did not imply that Dublin was to be one of the Universities disfranchised, so it would be perfectly open to hon. Members opposite to move a special clause in reference to the University of Dublin.

THE CHAIRMAN: So far as I am able to form an opinion at this moment, I should consider the matter determined by the division to be taken now. It is obvious that if any hon. Member could raise the question in regard to the University of Dublin hereafter, it would be competent for him, or any other hon. Member, to raise it in regard to any of the other Universities. In my opinion, the question would be determined now, and could not be raised again in Committee.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he understood that in the opinion of the Chairman, if the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) be now rejected, it would not be competent for the Irish Members to raise again in Committee the question of the representation of the University of Dublin. In face of that decision, which, of course, he would not challenge, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister whether he remained of the same mind? To the Irish Members the question was of the gravest importance; and, in their opinion, it had not been adequately discussed. In the early portion of the evening some of his hon. Friends were able to show, to his mind at all events, that the Party they represented had been most unfairly treated by the Boundary Commissioners; and their feeling on that subject intensified their objection to the monopoly of University representation by the Members for the University of Dublin. There was not only the question whether Dublin University should continue to retain its Members, but the extended question was involved—namely, whether the University should retain its Members alone, or in conjunction with another University? That was a question of the very gravest importance.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is now going into the general question. The Question before the Committee is, "That I do report Progress."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR assured the Chairman he had no intention to discuss the general question. He was only endeavouring to bring home to the mind of the Prime Minister the large number of grave issues which were involved in the discussion which the right hon. Gentleman wanted to close. As a matter of fact, there had only been three hours' debate, and but short speeches had been delivered to an impatient and tired Assembly by the Members of the Party chiefly interested. A more monstrous proposition than that of the Prime Minister had never been submitted to the House of Commons; and it would be the duty of the Irish Members to resist it to the utmost of their power.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that when he spoke a few minutes ago he was fully under the impression that it would be competent for hon. Members to raise the question, as it affected Ireland and the University of Dublin, on the Committee stage. He must, however, be wrong, as the Chairman had ruled the point the other way. He was far from saying that the matter should be left as it was; and though he was extremely sorry they could not divide on the general question now, he would, under the circumstances, consent to the Motion to report Progress.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday next.

ELECTIONS IN COUNTIES (HOURS OF POLL) BILL.

Mr. Arthur Elliot, Mr. Grey, Mr. Stafford Howard, Mr. Cochran-Patrick.

[BILL 19.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Mr. HEALY said, he understood the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) intended to so amend the Bill that it would apply to the country at large. If that was the right hon. Gentleman's intention, it would be necessary to insert in Clause 1 some word which would include every constituency.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Healy) would see from the Paper that Amendments were put down to Clause 1, and that it was also intended to amend the title. He now proposed, after Clause 2, to insert the following Clause:—

(Repeal of 41 and 42 Vic. c. 4, and 47 and 48 Vic. c. 36.)

"Upon this Act coming into operation 'The Parliamentary Elections (Metropolis) Act, 1878,' and 'The Elections (Hours of Poll) Act, 1884,' shall be repealed, with out prejudice to anything previously done in pursuance thereof."

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Mr. WHITLEY said, that since the Bill was last discussed, he had had the advantage of conferring with a large number of the electors of the city he had the honour to represent (Liverpool). The right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) threw out the suggestion that if it was thought desirable to close the poll in the middle of the day for the convenience of the gentlemen engaged in taking the votes about 3 o'clock in the afternoon would be a very reasonable hour. It was felt in Liverpool that if the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman could be adopted it would prove a great relief to the Returning Officers and others associated with them on the election day.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, it was quite true he threw out the suggestion in reference to some remarks which had been made by an hon. Gentleman. He, however, expressed the opinion that it would be best to keep the poll open during the whole day. Surely it was possible for the polling officials to get refreshments while they were working. Of course, an election was a hard day's work; but then it was an exceptional occurrence.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question, "That the Clause be added to the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Mr. WARTON desired to propose a new clause.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Gentleman has not given Notice of the clause.

Mr. WARTON: I gave Notice of it to Sir Arthur Otway.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Notice was not sufficient to comply with the Rules of the House.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, it was his intention to propose that the Bill be re-committed for Thursday next. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warton) would then have an opportunity of moving his clause. Perhaps he would give Notice of it.

Clause 1 (Hours of polling in counties).

On the Motion of Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, the following Amendment made:—In page 1, line 5, after "every," insert "Parliamentary and every municipal."

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 5, leave out from "election," to "within," in line 6.—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Mr. HEALY said, that if he might make a suggestion to the Government, it would be to the effect that the better thing to do would be to leave out "within the meaning of the Act," then to leave the second Amendment, and insert instead of "every election," "the election for a University." They would then get rid of the Definition Clause, which seemed extremely awkward.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he did not think it would be well to vary the words, inasmuch as they followed the precedent of all the Acts relating to Parliamentary and municipal elections.

MR. HEALY asked, if the right hon. Baronet would consent to the Act extending to Town Commissioners?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, it was not possible for him to do so.

Question put, and negatived; words left out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Definition).

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 10, leave out from "Act," to end of Clause, and insert,— "The expression 'Parliamentary election' means an election for a county, city, borough, place, or combination of counties, cities, boroughs, and places (not being any university or universities), which returns any Knight of the Shire or Member to serve in Parliament, and where the same is divided for the purpose of such return includes an election for such division;

"The expression 'municipal election' means an election of a councillor, Commissioner of Police, or auditor, or (in Ireland) an alderman in any municipal borough or in any ward thereof;

"The expression 'municipal borough' means,—

"As regards England, a borough subject to 'The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882'; and

"As regards Scotland, a burgh or town which has a town council or Police Commissioner; and

"As regards Ireland, a borough subject to the Act of the Session of the third and fourth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter one hundred and eight, intituled 'An Act for the Regulation of Municipal Corporations in Ireland,' and the Acts amending the same." — (Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SMALL said, that at present the Bill would not apply to small towns. It was very desirable that they should receive the benefit of this legislation, and it could easily be given to them by inserting the words "town commissioners" after the word "councillor."

Mr. Healy

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he could not agree on this occasion to put in any words of the kind suggested, because he would be putting in words of which he did not fully understand the meaning. He had always steadily resisted any dealing with Local Board elections in England in Municipal Acts. It was impossible to deal with Local Board elections satisfactorily until Local Government generally was dealt with. He could not speak definitely upon the Irish part of the question; but if the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Small) would raise the matter by Notice on the Paper for Thursday, he would endeavour to make himself acquainted with the facts.

MR. SEXTON said, that out of 80 towns in Ireland only 11 were incorporated under the Act of 1840. Some of the towns which were not incorporated were more important than some of those which were.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he should be glad if the hon. Gentleman would let him have the facts in writing.

MR. SEXTON said, he should be very glad to do so; and he would advise the right hon. Baronet to read the very able essay on Local Government in Ireland written by Mr. Richard O'Shaughnessy, the late Member for Limerick.

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Title.

Amendment proposed, to leave out in Title the words "elections in counties," and insert "and municipal elections." — (Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question, "That the words 'elections in counties' stand part of the Title," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'and municipal elections' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Bill re-committed for Thursday next, and to be printed. [Bill 85.]

RAILWAY RATES AND TERMINALS.

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

LORD HENNIKER, in rising to call the attention of the House to the subject of Railway Rates, and to move for copy of the judgments of the Railway Commission with respect to terminals, said, it might be bold of him to bring such an important question before their Lordships, particularly as he had as great an objection to making or hearing long speeches as no doubt their Lordships had. However, he would endeavour to place what he had to say as shortly and clearly before the House as he could. He thought he need hardly dwell on the importance of this question both to agriculture and trade. The very fact of its being so warmly discussed by practical men was sufficient to show this; it would be enough for him to say that in some cases the facilities given by a railway in any particular locality might make or destroy an industry, and that it was acknowledged that, as they had been told, 1d per ton for rates and charges for a certain distance might make the whole difference between buyer and seller in a market. One word as to the appeal made to him by the Government to postpone his Notice. He might be taking some responsibility in not doing as he was asked, and he might be told hereafter that the negotiations with the Railway Companies had failed in consequence of his action. However, as he said the other day, he was not acting independently, although he was prepared to take the whole responsibility of what he said on himself. It would be wrong for him to pledge the able and experienced gentlemen who were acting with him by any blunders his own inferior experience and want of knowledge of the subject might lead him into. If the negotiations were to be carried on on lines which were entirely opposed to the general feeling of the country, it was far better that they should fail, for they would come to no good; and he thought he challenged the Government fairly when he said he would only withdraw if they would undertake that the negotiations should be carried on strictly on the basis that whatever was agreed upon should be dealt with in a measure brought in by the Government and not by private legislation. If there was one thing more than another on which traders were determined, it was that a great change in railway legislation should not be accomplished by Private Bills, and, as it were, by a side-wind. To negotiate on any other basis, therefore, was mere waste of time. If the negotiations failed, he thought the blame rested with the Government; for what possible object could there be in secrecy in domestic affairs of this kind? By such an appeal they were taken out of the region of a question in which both traders and Railway Companies were mutually interested, and where plain and open speaking was best, and conveyed into one of difficult and delicate negotiations with a Foreign Power. He could assure their Lordships, too, that it was very far from his desire, or that of those who acted with him, to say anything vindictive against the Railway Companies, for they knew full well how much they owed to them in many ways. All they wished to do was to obtain fair and just terms for those engaged in trade and agriculture, and he believed that if they did this it would be as much a gain to the Companies as to anyone else. The discussion on railway rates was not of recent origin. He remembered years ago being associated with others in the county in which he lived in a demand for lower rates, as he mentioned in that House last year. Lately this question had become one of much greater interest. He presided in January at a large and representative meeting in London of the Railway and Canal Traders' Association. This was followed by a meeting of the Birmingham Traders'

Association, by action all over the country of the Chambers of Agriculture affiliated to the Central Chamber, by the Corporation of London, by a large meeting at Manchester of Corporations representing a population of 1,681,235, and by Chambers of Commerce, who were all unanimous in their opinions on the subject. On this a Committee was formed of Members of their Lordships' House, of the House of Commons, and representatives of all branches of trade and agriculture. He was Chairman of this Committee, and what he desired to do was to place as well as he could their general opinion on the question before the House. He would only go back to the Committee of the House of Commons of 1881-2. The argument of the Railway Companies in favour of the changes they sought to make was based on the fact that they were following the recommendations of that Committee. No doubt, some of those recommendations were good; but the Railway interest was very strongly represented on the Committee, and he had heard one Member of the Committee say publicly that the representatives of railways were always found voting together, whereas the other Members of the Committee were not so cohesive and not so regular in attendance. He merely mentioned this, as under these circumstances the recommendations could hardly be taken as completely representing both sides of the question. One recommendation, in fact, was from the first condemned by traders, which was the proposal to allow railways to charge terminals outside their maximum rates. That was the chief point he wished to call their Lordships' attention to. The Government brought in a measure last year which contained many good provisions, and contained a clause dealing with terminals; but he must remark that, although the clause permitted the companies to make a reasonable charge for terminals beyond what was now, generally speaking, allowed, it not only provided for the sanction of the Railway Commissioners in case of dispute, but that, before such a charge could be made, the Railway Companies in question must provide a revised classification of rates and a revised schedule of maximum rates to be laid before Parliament and approved. That Bill came to nothing. Since that the power of Railway Companies to charge for terminals had been challenged, before the Railway Commission. Terminals were laid down in some Bills; but in the past these terminal charges had been, generally speaking, what are called "handling terminals," not a charge for stations and so on, and, as a rule, all such charges had been included in maximum rates. The Commissioners had decided against the Companies as to charges beyond the maximum rates. Mr. Price, one of the Commissioners, had stated that he considered Parliament always intended that terminals should be charged; but, surely, if so, the charge made must depend on the maximum rates, which should be carefully considered in coming to any conclusion, and he might have been influenced by the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons. However, the law was that, as a rule, maximum rates should include terminals—in fact, the Commissioners had made the Companies give information to traders as to what part of their rates was charged for terminals. What happened then? The Government encouraged a dealing with this question of principle by Private Bills. He had the authority of the noble Lord the Chairman of the Great Northern Railway (Lord Colville of Culross), who stated this in his speech the other day to the shareholders. Others had said the same, and he had spoken quite openly himself with an important official of a Railway Company. There was no secret about it, and he thought the Railway Companies had reason to complain that the responsibility was placed on them. It rather savoured of some other transactions of the Government in other matters, where, instead of taking the responsibility they were bound to take, they shifted it on to other shoulders. To show the evil of such a principle, he would say that, encouraged by the action of the Board of Trade, he supposed, he found that a small Railway Bill in that House affecting a very short distance—say, two or three miles—contained the obnoxious clause. The question was one of national importance, and it was left to small Companies to carry out the policy laid down by Her Majesty's Government. The principle might creep in everywhere, and be referred to as a precedent for the future. The proposal of the Government last year was not the same as that now made. The Companies were to charge a reasonable sum for terminals now, and those who objected were to go before the Commission. What did this mean? It meant that the Companies were to charge what they pleased, and that the trader was to go to the expense of making an appeal to the Commission, which he would not do as a rule, and that the law as to terminals was to be a Judge-made law, not a laid-down principle by a Government measure dealing fairly with all concerned. If Mr. Price was right, let his opinion be taken, with due regard to the schedule of maximum rates. Now, they had the decisions of the Commission; but they wanted to give them instructions almost to reverse all their decisions without any adequate arrangement as to rates. Uncertainty was to be the word, and uncertainty in trade matters meant a great deal. "Reasonable" was the word used. What would be considered reasonable? In the Government measure of last year, what Parliament thought reasonable; in these Bills, what the Railway Commissioners thought right. Did their Lordships suppose that it would be possible for traders and others to go to the expense of going before the Commission? It had been shown to the contrary. The Commission had been in existence for years, and it was not available to everyone. It ought to be more available. However, private individuals and small combinations were not in a position at present to cope fairly with these great Companies. It was said that if terminals were granted to Railway Companies it would add from £1 6s. to 10s. a ton. He thought he was under rather than over the mark. But no one knew. It was to be a reasonable charge, and that was a point they had to deal with. He had something more to say on this point, and then he would pass on shortly to other subjects. There was a distinct principle in this question of terminals. It ought to be dealt with in a Government measure. Perhaps their Lordships would consider a moment what the result of dealing with a question of this kind would be by private legislation. The Bill in question would go before a Committee upstairs; it would contain all sorts of other provisions as to rates, and so on; the opposition would be carried on with great difficulty, owing to the limited purse of the opponents as contrasted with the unlimited means of the Railway Companies. The railways would be beaten on some small point, but would be ready to wait to carry the main point; they would exhaust the resources of traders and private individuals and drop the Bill. What would be the result? The Bill would be brought in the next Session, and, the resources of the trader being exhausted, a new principle in railway legislation would be established, a precedent not to be overruled. He was one of those who thought that it was wise that there should be such a deterrent to factious opposition to Private Bills; but it was not quite fair that Railway Companies, who possessed the greatest monopoly in the country, should be allowed so to deal with a question of principle that it was almost impossible for traders to avoid being beaten in detail. If such measures were passed, it would amount to a Trades Union of the worst kind among Railway Companies. The badly managed Companies would be able to compete with well-managed Companies, and by putting on unknown terminal charges make up for their blunders and mistakes. That was a point which, he thought, required attention; and he thought that agriculture and trade had a right to claim the introduction of a Government measure, which, if it did not meet their views, would, at all events, give them a chance of dealing on fair terms with the Railway Companies through their Representatives in Parliament, instead of being forced into a Committee Room, only to be defeated by the force of unlimited means; a battle which, in the long run, they must lose. To turn to the question of rates. It was no doubt desirable to have a fresh classification of rates. There were hundreds and hundreds of Acts of Parliament which it took an expert to understand; but if there were a re-classification of rates it should be on a system. So the Committee advised. It was quite impossible for a Government Department to do this. Why not, therefore, refer the whole question to a Commission? The Companies had gone into the matter and could give every information. Surely some fair tribunal could be arranged which could advise the Board of Trade. Their Report would furnish a basis for a settlement sanctioned by a Government measure. Now the Companies were to be allowed not only to deal with a principle in railway legislation, but were to be allowed so to deal with their rates that they altered principles laid down in the past which might wisely be followed for the future. The Companies said—"We are pressed by the traders for a re-classification"—he was told so by a high official of one of the great Companies—and they say—"We are told by the Board of Trade to bring in our own measure. Why blame us? We are quite contented with the present rates." His answer to this would be—"Why increase your maximum rates? You say you do not charge your maximum rates now. Why, then, increase your maximum, and add terminals of an unknown quantity besides? It is obvious, if you do not want an increase, it is useless to complicate matters in this way." It was of no use the Railway Companies saying that the new rates would not increase the charges; they did, and particularly on short distances. This—the short-distance rate—was more important to agriculture than to any other interest, and to trade in many ways. Of course, the whole question was more or less guess-work, and he would rather trust to the calculation of experienced traders than to any other calculation he could make. It was said by Mr. Nicholls at Manchester the other day that the material and provender coming in and going out of that city by railway last year amounted to 321,717 tons, and that the proposed new rates would add an amount to the rates on this of £32,841. Their Lordships would understand that these statistics could best be gathered locally, as the question of terminals was so uncertain. Then it was stated by the Secretary of the Railway and Canal Traders' Association that on one line, which was only 85 miles long, the present rate for live poultry and fresh butter would be increased from 20s. to 36s. 6d. a ton for 60 miles, and that the rate for hops for the same distance would be increased from 10s. to 36s. 6d. a ton. This was, of course, in the long distance table, and short distances came off much worse. But while he touched on these one or two points statistically, he wanted to know why the railways should choose this particular moment to raise their rates? The other day, at a meeting of the London and North-Western Railway, the Chairman lamented that he could not declare a dividend of more than 7½ per cent. This was owing to depression in trade and agriculture. His noble Friend the Chairman of the Great Northern Railway was able to declare a dividend of 6 per cent only, owing to depression. This was terrible work, no doubt; but more terrible work had been done with agriculture and trade. It would be lucky if they could make both ends meet in many cases, and yet this was the time the Railway Companies chose to increase their rates. Surely it was a short-sighted policy. What was wanted was to encourage enterprise, not to drive trade away. The position of Railway Companies did not show any immediate necessity for meeting expenditure with a larger draw on the public, and it appeared that in depressed times the only result would be to do harm both to trade and the railways themselves. The cost of various articles was less to the Companies now. Steel rails—which lasted longer than the old rails—were at a low price. Coals were never much lower, and money could be raised at a cheap rate. It seemed hard on the traders of the country that this particular time should be chosen to raise rates. He hoped the Companies would see the question from a public-spirited point of view, and that some arrangement might be come to which would secure a proper classification of rates, and deal fairly with the trade and agriculture of the country. They never wanted help more than now, and if the railways were not careful they might find themselves with a very fine scale of rates, and terminals with very few able or willing to pay them. One more point he wished to mention—that was "undue preference." This was said to be necessary by the Companies, for if they did not give preference to foreign countries, the trade would be lost altogether. Why, if they could carry at a profit from foreign countries, could they not carry home produce at the same rate? No one knew except themselves, but everyone knew that traders here were hurt by it. This subject had been considered by the Commission on Agriculture; but things were worse than they were then, and still the railways went on giving preferential rates to foreign produce. To show what other countries did, he might say that butter in Belgium was carried at 4s. 10d. a-ton, for a given distance, while English butter cost 10s. 1d. per ton; pig iron in Belgium was carried for 5s. a ton, while English iron cost 15s. to send the same distance. America reduced its rates by half, and yet American beef came to London from Liverpool at half the price of home-grown mutton. Hops were sent from Flushing right through Kent for 20s. a ton to London, while Kentish hops to London paid a rate of 37s. 6d. a ton; American cheese was brought through Cheshire at 25s. a ton, while Cheshire cheese was charged at the rate of 42s. 6d. a ton from Liverpool to London. When they saw these rates charged, it might well be said, why go into the question of Free Trade? The noble Earl on the Cross Benches (the Earl of Dunraven) might be able to reply to this question; but, meanwhile, he would point to the fact that a practical man—Mr. Rowlandson—had said as follows:—

"I have gone into the question of the difference of rates in the home and foreign agricultural produce, and taking the difference in those rates on my stock and corn, I find from those statistics that there is a tax to me of very nearly £100 upon my outgoings—I simply take the corn, cattle, and sheep—and that is a tax of 1s. 6d. per acre upon me. If I take it upon the carriage of foreign corn, it is a tax of 5s. per acre upon the growth of all my barley. When you come to take that over the whole agricultural area of the country, that is a very severe tax upon the farmers of this country. We have heard that it will be very much better to look carefully into those questions which press most heavily upon us at the present time, rather than grumble that we cannot do better for ourselves, and call upon Parliament to impose some tax upon foreign corn. I have gone into the question as to what would be the effect to me supposing there was a tax of 5s. imposed upon foreign corn in this country, and supposing I would get the full benefit of the 5s. per quarter, which has been proposed by some gentlemen in this country, the equalization of the foreign and home rates on agricultural produce on the basis of the foreign rates would be nearly as great a benefit to me as any good I should receive from the imposition of a duty of 5s. per quarter on foreign."

It was he Lord Henniker, who spoke at the meeting in question of setting things right themselves before applying to Parliament for redress; and he thought this quotation alone justified him in his opinion, and that the attack on Free Trade, and the idea that foreign competition ruined the country, might be tempered with a consideration of these facts, put even more strongly by others than by himself, and that their Lordships would see that Free Trade did not do all the mischief. Their Lordships might depend upon it that these preferential rates would hurt the trade of the country, and that the rates now paid by traders were all if not more than they could fairly bear. The question was one which required much consideration, and was of national importance. He ventured to lay down the following propositions:—That in dealing with a great question of this kind—a question of principle—a responsible Government should take the initiative; that in doing so the danger of unlimited control of the Railway Companies over rates should not be left out of consideration, for the present terminal proposal was practically that; that maximum rates, if they did not include terminals, should be fixed accordingly; that the question of re-classification of rates should be left to Parliament to decide finally; that the undue preference at present in force should be carefully considered, and that the Railway Commission should be made more easily and economically approachable. Let them cast the recommendations of the Committee on one side, cast these small negotiations with the railways on one side, and appoint a Commission to consider the classification of rates, when the Government could bring in a Bill of its own dealing generally with the questions of principle involved. If Parliament thought fit to reverse the policy of the past let it do so; but that this should be done by private legislation was hardly fair to those chiefly concerned outside the railways. He expected no answer from the noble Lord opposite (Lord Sudeley), for he said that he could not enter into the discussion; but he hoped he had said nothing which could prejudice the important negotiations which were going on, and that this most important question might soon be brought to a satisfactory settlement.

Moved, "That there be laid before this House copy of the judgments of the Railway Commission with respect to terminals, and also of the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company v. Gidlow."—(The Lord Henniker.)

LORD SUDELEY said, that there could be no doubt that the subject brought forward by the noble Lord was one of the greatest importance to the mercantile interest of this country; but his speech placed him in a somewhat difficult position, because negotiations were going on between the Board of Trade and the Railway Companies and the various interests concerned, and discussion might very likely prejudice what was being done. Under these circumstances, it was quite impossible for him to state fully and exactly the views of the Board of Trade. On Friday last he appealed to the noble Lord to postpone his Motion; but he did not see his way to do so without certain pledges being made, which the Government could not give. He informed the noble Lord that the Board of Trade were negotiating with the traders on the one side and the Railway Companies on the other, and that there was considerable danger lest the discussion should jeopardize these communications. The noble Lord stated that he did not see how it could be necessary to postpone the discussion of a subject of domestic policy, as no possible advantage could arise from keeping such a matter secret. He would, in reply, merely say that when a Department were carrying on negotiations, surely they were the best authorities for deciding whether discussion was likely or not to interfere with the negotiations. The noble Lord had traced down the historical position of that question, and had stated fully and frankly the views of the traders. There was, however, another side of the case—namely, that of the great Railway Companies, who naturally looked upon the whole matter under a very different aspect. As had been stated, this question was very fully gone into by the Select Committee in 1881 and 1882. Very grave charges and complaints against the Railway Companies were made before the Committee as to rates being excessive, preventing the development of traffic. It was shown clearly that the classification of goods was most imperfect, and that it was extremely difficult for traders to discover the maximum legal rate for any particular kind of goods. As much had been said against the railways, it must be remembered that the Committee in their Report distinctly stated—

“That they acquitted the Railway Companies of any grave dereliction of their duty to the public.”

The Committee, among other things, recommended that there should be one uniform classification of goods over the whole railway system, and that the Railway Companies should consolidate their special Acts so far as they affected rates and charges. They also recommended that terminal charges should be recognized, subject to publication, and, in case of challenge, to sanction of Railway Commissioners. He thought that what was required was that the Report of the Select Committee should be carried out in a manner satisfactory to the great interests concerned both of the Railway Companies and the traders. The present position was simply this. Last year the Board of Trade had brought in a Bill dealing with the subject; but the difficulties raised by both sides were so great, that taken together with the position of Public Business at the time, it was considered hopeless to proceed with the Bill. In that Bill it had been found utterly impossible to deal with the question of classification by means of a schedule, as the basis of revision, the Railway Clearing House classification, contained no less than 2,300 different articles. The Bill, however, contained the following clause, throwing upon the Railway Companies the onus of bringing in Bills to provide the new classification of maximum rates, and such revision of rates as might be necessary:—

“(3.) The provisions contained in this section with respect to terminals shall not apply to any railway company until such company has submitted to Parliament a revised classification of rates and a revised schedule of maximum rates, nor until such revised classification and schedule have been approved by Parliament.”

This classification of rates was nothing more or less than simplification, but as it dealt with 2,300 articles, it was, notwithstanding, most difficult to arrange. Acting upon the clause in the proposed Bill of last year and on the Report of the Committee, the Railway Companies had brought forward Bills now before the other House dealing with the subject. The second reading of these Bills was postponed until after Easter. Unfortunately, however, whether it was that the proposals of the Railway Companies were misunderstood, whether it was owing to the maximum rates being regarded as likely to be the actual rate, or whether it was the inherent difficulties of arranging such a classification as would reconcile all interests, undoubtedly it was the fact that these Bills of the Railway Companies had excited serious opposition on all sides. This Bill would not be proceeded with until after Easter, and it was hoped that during the interval some arrangement would be arrived at. The view of the Board of Trade was that it was to the interest of all parties that this question of classification and division of rates should be settled; and, therefore, both parties should agree to an inquiry by a competent authority, by which a basis of settlement could be arrived at. The Board of Trade were now endeavouring by negotiation to arrive at some understanding on this point. They were of opinion that if these statutory rates and provisions were to be revised at all, the revision must be complete, and it must be a revision in the interests of the Railway Companies as well as in the interests of the public. The noble Lord was anxious that it should be laid down that legislation on the result of this inquiry should be brought forward and carried out by the Government. This it was impossible, at the present time, to pledge the Government to do; but surely it was not very material how legislation should be carried when all parties were agreed. The Board of Trade did not see their way, in the present state of Public Business, to bring in a Bill similar to the one they had introduced last year; but their Lordships would see that the first matter to get settled by some competent tribunal was the question of the classification and revision of rates. There would be no objection to granting the Return asked for; but, as the judgments would be presented to Parliament in the usual manner at the end of the year, he hoped the noble Lord would consider that sufficient.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY said, the matter had already been inquired into and reported upon sufficiently; and he was surprised to hear a suggestion of a Royal Commission coming from the Board of Trade.

LORD STURDELEY said, he had not said it was intended to appoint a Royal Commission, as he had carefully guarded himself from saying so; but it was one of the suggestions made by the noble

Lord who brought forward the subject, and, no doubt, it was one possible solution.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY said, he regretted he had misunderstood the noble Lord. There was a unanimous feeling throughout the country that these Bills were as monstrous proposals as had ever been submitted to Parliament. The injury done to English trade by the preference given to foreign goods as compared with home goods passing over the railways was very great. As an instance of the injustice that was caused in this way, he might instance the experience of a firm of English piano manufacturers, who found that American pianos were carried on the railways at 25s. per ton, while English-made pianos were charged 50s. per ton; and the explanation given was that the English goods were so much more valuable. He held that it was the duty of the Board of Trade, on behalf of the Government, to protect the trade of this country; and it was their duty at once to bring in a satisfactory Bill to settle the question of rates in the interest of trade and agriculture.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he wished to add his voice to that of the noble Marquess who had just sat down, in urging on the Government the extreme importance of this question, and the deep impression it had made on the minds of the agriculturists and traders of this country. The scheme of the Railway Companies appeared to him to be open to considerable objection. It had the effect of lowering the rates for long distances and raising them for short distances, thus inevitably favouring large operators as against small, and injuring most of all the farmers and small dealers in country places. There was, however, another grievance which was felt to be intolerable—namely, the protection given to foreign industry by the Railway Companies charging rates enormously disproportionate in favour of the foreign importer as against the native producer. His noble Friend who had brought forward that matter with so much ability had given them a case in which cheese, butter, and other products were conveyed from Liverpool to London at a far lower rate than from that part of Cheshire through which the line passed. It was inconceivable that such a system, whatever arguments might be used to justify it, would be endured much longer by the traders and agriculturists of this country. He rather regretted that the discussion on terminals and general rates, although important, had rather obscured the questions raised by the Duke of Richmond and Gordon's Commission. He hoped that something would be done to insist that in dealing with foreign and English traders at least the foreigner should not be preferred to the Englishman.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he must protest against what was a practical bounty given to the employment of English capital abroad in the establishment or enlargement of manufactories in foreign countries; for, to the hurt of England, they thus were enabled to undersell British traders with goods which were not produced cheaper, but were brought into the market cheaper in consequence of the lower railway rates charged upon them not only abroad, but also by a most unjust preference in England. There was a similar bounty on foreign corn and live-stock. Our heavy railway charges, in short, were practically levying import and export duties of a most discouraging and oppressive kind on English products and manufactures for the benefit of the foreign producer and the foreign manufacturer; and none the less invidiously because the proceeds went, not to the relief of the taxpayers, but to the profit of the railway shareholders.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that perhaps he would be allowed to make a remark on that subject. He was a producer and a trader in the very centre of England; and, therefore, their Lordships might imagine what his interest was on that question. The fact of his interest being entirely on one side made him extremely reluctant to take any unnecessary part in that discussion; and he flattered himself that when the matter came before the Government for decision he would entirely divest himself of any bias that he had, and would consider it in a fair way. But he thought it must be obvious to everyone that the prosperity of the railways and of the producers of the country must really be the same. The railways were necessary to the producers, and the producers to the railways; and it appeared to him impossible if the subject could be calmly considered—whatever exact mode they might adopt for arriving at the end—but that that end should be common to both interests, which should not be treated as antagonistic to one another.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, it was all very well to classify goods; but it seemed to him that the same charge should be made for goods so classified. It was absurd to say that pianos were to be put in a certain class if an English piano was to be made to pay more than a foreign piano. There must be the same charge for everyone. If they did that they would act fairly towards all parties; but if they left it open for the Railway Companies, after goods were classified, to charge less for corn from America than for corn from England, where was the use of the classification?

LORD HENNIKER said, he must press for the Return, for such judgments were lost in the pages of a Blue Book; and he wished them to be placed before their Lordships in a convenient form. For the same reason he expressed a hope that the noble Lord would allow to be added to the Return which he had asked for, the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway v. Gidlow.

LORD SUDELEY said, he was willing to assent to the request of the noble Lord.

Motion amended, and agreed to.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE YEOMANRY.—QUESTION.

LORD HARRIS asked the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether extra pay for troop drills is to be granted to the Yeomanry this year and in future? And he urged the importance, especially under existing circumstances, of affording every proper encouragement to that Force.

THE EARL OF MORLEY, in reply, said, provision had been made in the Estimates for two extra troop drills at the rate of 3s. 6d. per man per drill, and the total estimated sum would be £3,500; but to enable extra pay to be earned, two-thirds of the enrolled strength of the troop must attend the drill. He would like also to mention that up to this time there had been no Yeomanry Regulations; but Regulations had now been prepared, and would be printed in a very short time.

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND JUSTICE SCOTLAND — TRIAL OF CROFTERS AT STORNOWAY.

DR. CAMERON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the trial before Sheriff Substitute Black at Stornoway, on the 20th inst., of three crofters and an apprentice baker for mobbing a tack-man named Martin in that town on the 29th December; whether it is the case, as stated by the sheriff, that Martin had recently mutilated some sheep belonging to crofters which he had found on his land, and had himself wantonly provoked the demonstration against him by denouncing the crofters of the island as "thieves and robbers;" whether the sheriff discharged the principal accused on the ground that Martin had "metaphorically speaking thrown at his throat;" whether he sentenced the other crofters to 30 days, and the apprentice baker to 14 days' imprisonment, without option of a fine, on the ground that there was no evidence that they had heard the provocative language used; and, whether, taking into consideration the fact that the crowd which hooted Martin consisted of 200 persons, that he was not physically assaulted, and that there was no evidence to show that the men imprisoned were ringleaders or exceptionally active members of the mob, he will consider the propriety of revising the severe sentences passed upon them?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Attention has been called to this trial. In previous answers given in this House, I have stated fully the circumstances relating to the sheep referred to in the second paragraph of the Question. It appears that Martin did in a shop use, in the presence of Macdonald, the expression quoted in that paragraph, and that the Sheriff-Substitute, viewing this as a provocation, did not convict Macdonald of breach of the peace; but he did convict the other three persons charged, and sentenced them to the terms of imprisonment mentioned. It does not appear that the mobbing and breach of the peace was caused by the use of the language referred to, or, indeed, that any of the other persons, numbering about 200, who took part in it, knew of what Martin had said. If this had been an isolated offence the sentences would have appeared unduly severe; but the Sheriff-Substitute reports that he pronounced these sentences because the occurrence was merely a manifestation of a spirit of lawlessness, unhappily prevalent in the island at present; and a resident Judge has better means than anyone else can have of forming an opinion as to what measure of punishment is requisite as a deterrent where such a spirit of lawlessness prevails. Under these circumstances there does not seem to be any sufficient ground for revising the sentences.

DR. CAMERON said, he would take any opportunity that might arise to call attention to the language of the Judge.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES — THE OUTPUT OF COAL.

MR. C. B. MCLAREN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can state, from the Returns furnished to the Home Office, the separate output of coal during the year 1884 in the different districts of England, in Wales, and in Scotland; and, by how much the total output of 1884 falls short of the output of 1883?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, it would be inconvenient to give the information asked for in reply to a Question; but the details could be obtained by his hon. Friend from the Home Office. The falling-off in 1884, as compared with 1883, was 3,619,000 tons.

POST OFFICE—THE NORTH AMERICAN MAILS.

MR. BAXTER asked the Postmaster General, If he is aware of the increasing dissatisfaction existing in consequence of the continued transmission of mails to North America by slow steamers; and, if he will take measures to introduce, on the part of the British Post Office, the system on which the United States Government have so long acted, of sending the mails by the fastest boats only, without reference to the Company to which they belong, and without being hampered by unnecessary contracts?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The question raised by my right hon. Friend is an extremely important and difficult one. My lamented Predecessor, Mr. Fawcett, gave great attention to it, and was very desirous of effecting the change aimed at by my right hon. Friend. With this view he gave Notice, more than a year ago, to terminate the contracts with the three Companies who now carry the mails. He found, however, very great difficulty in substituting any other arrangement, and he was finally compelled to renew the contracts for another year. In the very last communication I received from Mr. Fawcett after the commencement of his illness, when I was acting as his Deputy, he told me that it was his intention to recommend that a Committee of this House should investigate the subject. I think, therefore, I cannot do better than adopt this course myself; and if the right hon. Gentleman will move for a Committee the Government will assent to it.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT —ARMS' LICENCES—JAMES LORD, OF MOUNT NUGENT.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that at the time James Lord, of Mount Nugent, county

Mr. C. B. McLaren

Cavan, got a licence to carry arms he was not holder of any land; and, if not, what notice will he take of the conduct of the two magistrates who certified he was a landholder?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I regret that I am not yet in a position to give a definite answer to the particular point of the hon. Member's Question, and that I am obliged to again ask him to be good enough to postpone it to a later day.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS — MAGHERACLOGHER, CO. DONEGAL.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will cause to be placed upon the Table, originals or authenticated Copies of all Papers in connection with the election of Poor Law Guardians for the electoral divisions of Magheraclogher and Meenaculty, county of Donegal, in the year 1884, and of all Correspondence thereon with the Local Government Board, including the Papers and Correspondence regarding the two bye-elections for the division of Magheraclogher, one the same year, and the other in January of this year; also, originals of authenticated Copies of all Papers and Correspondence touching the election of Guardians for Crossroads in 1883 and 1884, and the bye-elections for the same division in 1884; and, all Papers and Correspondence respecting the election of Guardians for the electoral division of Creeslagh in 1883?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Correspondence in question is voluminous, and its production would involve great trouble and expense. The points which arose, and which have all been finally settled, were not of general interest or importance; and I cannot see that any public good would be done by the production of the Correspondence in the form of a Report to this House; but if the hon. Member will tell me what parts of the Correspondence interest him, I will endeavour to have it in some form, so that he may see it himself.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—CO. TYRONE.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Why there are no magistrates appointed in the town of Beragh, county Tyrone; is Rev. Archdeacon Dixon, the magistrate residing near Beragh, an invalid, and therefore unable to attend to the duties; is it true that there is no magistrate living nearer to Beragh than a mile and a-half, and he has a situation in Omagh, and is therefore absent from the place; is it a fact that the names of two Catholics (one from Beragh and the other from Nismilecrow) and a Protestant were sent forward by a memorial to the Lord Lieutenant of the county for his consideration, and that the Protestant was appointed and the Catholics rejected; is it true that of the six magistrates who attend the local Petty Sessions only one is a Roman Catholic, who is the resident magistrate, living in Omagh, and only appears occasionally; and, why is the Petty Sessions not held in Beragh, the principal town of the district?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Lord Chancellor has reason to believe that the Lieutenant of Tyrone, the Earl of Charlemont, has found it very difficult to get a magistrate in Beragh; but in September last a magistrate was appointed in the neighbourhood, who is available there, and no inconvenience has been reported to the Lord Chancellor, although the Rev. Archdeacon is invalided, and at present unable to attend Petty Sessions. Lord Charlemont is on the Continent, and no information can be had as to any memorial sent to him; but the Lord Chancellor states that, from what he knows of Lord Charlemont's action as Lieutenant of Tyrone, no consideration founded on religion would actuate him in rejecting any man. The magistrates attending Nismilecrow Petty Sessions are composed of Protestants and Presbyterians. The Resident Magistrate, who is a Roman Catholic, is a most regular attendant. The question of fixing the place of holding Petty Sessions is one for the magistrates of Quarter Sessions. The Lord Lieutenant has power to set them in motion, and without doubt would do so in the present instance if sufficient cause were shown for his interference.

Mr. HEALY: Would the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to ask the police as to the convenience of the matter to the prisoners and to themselves.

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not know what is the usual form; but I will look and see.

RAILWAYS (INDIA)—PREFERENCE RATES FOR WHEAT.

Mr. BURLANE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is a fact, as currently reported amongst agriculturists, that on some of the Indian Railways, there are special preference rates for native-grown wheat consigned to England?

Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether all the wheat produced in India is not "native-grown;" and, whether, in fact, the Indian Railways do not charge rates for its conveyance much in excess of the rates charged on American through lines, and enormously in excess when the comparative value of labour is taken into account?

Mr. J. K. CROSS: All Indian wheat is native grown. There are no special preference rates for wheat consigned to England; and, from information placed before the recent Select Committee on Indian Railways, I learn that the mileage rate for the carriage of wheat is greatly in excess of that charged on some of the American lines.

CENTRAL ASIA—MAP OF AFGHANISTAN.

GENERAL Sir GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he will refer to a letter which appeared in The Pall Mall Gazette of the 3rd March, from the late experienced Surveyor General of India, General Walker, regarding the map of Afghanistan, and to say what map is to be relied on; also to a letter from Mr. Marvin, which appeared in The Globe of the 3rd March, also regarding the Afghanistan map, in harmony with General Walker's views; and, if a map which the Government consider reliable will be furnished for the information of Members, together with a Memorandum from General Walker on the Construction and Compilation of the Map of Afghanistan?

Mr. J. K. CROSS said, he understood that his hon. and gallant Friend intended to withdraw the Question; but he might say that a map would be placed in the Tea Room at the earliest possible moment.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)— BELFAST POLICE COURT—
MR. FORBES, R.M.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to a report of proceedings in the Belfast Police Court, which appeared in The Belfast Morning News of 5th February 1885, in which it was alleged, and not since denied, that Mr. Forbes, one of the resident magistrates of the district, caused a summons to be issued against the chief of the fire brigade in Belfast for a supposed assault on a policeman named M'Lelland; that he (Mr. Forbes) issued and signed the said summons; that he fixed a day for the hearing of the complaint so that he (Mr. Forbes) might adjudicate on the case; is it true that when Mr. Forbes found that he could not be present to act judicially in the matter, he made an order to Mr. Coulter, prosecuting solicitor, to have it adjourned to a future date, so that he could be present; is it true that Mr. Harper, solicitor for the defendant, opposed Mr. Coulter's effort to have a date fixed to suit Mr. Forbes' convenience, and urged strongly the fact that Mr. Forbes' conduct in the case was charged with the suspicion of unfairness towards the defendant, and that if the case were adjourned for Mr. Forbes' attendance, his client would be obliged to make an affidavit that before Stipendiary Forbes "he could not get a fair trial;" and, what notice will be taken in case it be true that Mr. Forbes' conduct is correctly described?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I find that in this case a summons and a cross-summons were issued; the former at the instance of the Constabulary, and the latter at the instance of the Solicitor of the Corporation. The summons was fixed for hearing on the 4th February, and the cross-summons on the 11th, and both were signed by Colonel Forbes, in the ordinary discharge of his duty. Some of the parties to the summons case appear to have desired an adjournment to the 11th, in order that both cases might be heard together, and that the presence of a Resident Magistrate—which was doubtful on the 4th—might be secured; but the Bench before whom the summons came on the 4th decided to proceed with it, and the result was that both cases were then settled. It is not true that the cross-summons was fixed for the 11th, or that the adjournment of the other case to that day was applied for with the view of Colonel Forbes adjudicating on the cases, as I understand that he was on leave on the 4th, and that neither on that day nor on the 11th could he have heard the cases, as his turn of duty, on both occasions, would have been to sit in the other branch of the Police Court.

ARMY—SOLDIERS' READING ROOM, ALLAHABAD.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary of State for War, What justification Colonel Crawford has offered for the removal of Catholic literature from the soldiers' reading room at Allahabad; has he been asked to cite the passages he thinks objectionable; and, what action do the Government propose to take?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: A Report from the Commanding Officer was received; but it was so meagre that I directed that a more full explanation should be called for. I expect to receive it during the present month.

LAW AND POLICE—USE OF REVOLVERS.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the attention of the Government has been directed to the increasing habit of carrying revolvers; and, whether he contemplates any measures, legislative or otherwise, for putting down this baneful and uncivilized practice?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I very much agree with my hon. Friend's views on the subject of carrying revolvers. It is quite plain that mere licences are of no use as a remedy for the evil. I think it is a very serious matter for consideration whether there ought not to be more severe penalties attached to crimes when committed by persons carrying revolvers or explosives—something similar to the penalties enacted for garrotting. There is a Bill having that object coming before the House, and upon that Bill I think the matter may very properly be considered.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman would consider the propriety of requiring the registration of the sale of revolvers, and also prohibiting the sale of firearms to persons under a certain age? He had information, on good authority, that in public schools revolvers were frequently carried by the pupils. He would also ask whether the right hon. Gentleman would consider the advisability of prohibiting the carrying of concealed firearms without a special licence?

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—SUMMONS FOR TRESPASS IN HUNTING AT BAGENALSTOWN.

Mr. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that Major Hutchinson, R.M., and other magistrates at Bagenalstown, on 13th February, dismissed a summons for trespass under 14 and 15 Vic. c. 92, s. 8, brought by a farmer named McGrath, against a huntsman named Duffield, although the offence was clearly proved and the trespass not denied, did the bench decide that, even admitting the trespass was wilful, still riding away over the lands was a sufficient compliance with the order to leave; and, if so, have the Government considered the serious results that may result consequent upon such trespasses, in defiance of the occupiers, if the latter discover that they have no chance of legal redress against huntsmen?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): The magistrates at Bagenalstown dismissed a summons for trespass brought by a farmer named McGrath against a Mr. Duffield for a trespass committed in hunting over his lands. They did so on the ground that the trespass was not shown to be either wilful or malicious, and that, therefore, the remedy was not under the Summary Jurisdiction Act. They did not decide that, if the trespass was wilful, riding away over the lands excused the defendant. They also pointed out that the remedy in the case before them was by civil action.

Mr. HEALY: Has the hon. and learned Gentleman said whether it was not distinctly a trespass; whether the gentleman was told to leave, and, in defiance of the occupier, rode away over the lands; and whether the magistrates dismissed the case? Is that a fact, or is it not?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) was understood to say that he had already given his answer.

Mr. HEALY: I will put this Question again, so that we may understand distinctly. I beg to give Notice that I will ask the hon. and learned Gentleman, on Thursday next, whether, in this case, the magistrates refused to convict a gentleman who trespassed over lands in defiance of the occupier?

EGYPT—THE SUAKIN-BERBER RAILWAY—CONTRACT FOR LOCOMOTIVES.

Mr. HOULDSWORTH asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is the case, as stated in the newspapers, that a "large contract for portable railway and small locomotives for the Soudan" has been given to Mr. W. G. Bagnall, Castle Engine Works, at Stafford; if so, whether Mr. Bagnall has ever made any locomotives before; whether he has the necessary machines and tools for the execution of this contract on his premises; whether he has to begin by building workshops before he can begin to do the work contracted for; and, whether there are not many larger and more experienced firms in the Country fully prepared and able to do work of this description without any delay, and at the lowest possible cost?

Mr. C. B. McLAREN asked, whether it was not an abuse of the Forms of the House to put on the Notice Paper a Question affecting the business capacity and credit of individual traders?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see anything out of Order in the Question, or it would not be upon the Paper.

Mr. BRAND: It is the case that an order for five 18-inch gauge locomotives and certain railway materials of the same gauge has been given to the Castle Engine Works firm, being a portion of a larger supply distributed between them and other makers. Small locomotives of this class are, I am given to understand, a specialty of this firm. An Inspector from the War Office visited their works, and reported that he found everything necessary for the execution of this contract, as well as locomotives in progress of construction, so that the necessity for building workshops for this particular contract is not apparent.

MR. C. B. M'LAREN asked, whether it was not the fact that Mr. Bagnall was the President of the Conservative Association at Stafford?

SIR JOSEPH PEASE asked, whether these locomotives were included in Messrs. Lucas and Aird's contract?

MR. BRAND said, the locomotives were included in that contract.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—HARMONDSWORTH SCHOOL BOARD—CONVICTION OF A MEMBER.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE (for Mr. J. G. TALBOT) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether his attention has been called to the conviction at the Uxbridge Petty Sessions, of Frederick Thorpe, a member of the Harmondsworth School Board, for having been drunk and disorderly, and using the most vile language; whether the defendant still remains a member of the School Board; and, whether he will take any steps to remove the scandal and to prevent the recurrence of similar scandals?

MR. MUNDELLA: The fact of Frederick Thorpe's conviction has been notified to the Education Department by the four other members of the Harmondsworth School Board; but we have no power under the Statute to declare the seat vacant, except for prolonged absence, bankruptcy, or imprisonment for crime. There can be no doubt that the member in question is totally unfit to continue a member of the Board, or to have any part in the control of teachers in the conduct of schools. If, as we understand, the other members of the Board find it impossible to act with Mr. Thorpe, the Department has the means, and will certainly put them in force, of relieving the Board from their difficulties. The proper solution would be for Mr. Thorpe to resign.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE 24TH MIDDLESEX VOLUNTEERS.

MR. CARINGTON asked the Secretary of State for War, If the detachment of the 24th Middlesex Volunteers, who were under orders for active service in Egypt, were paraded at the Tower of London on the 3rd instant for the purpose of being inspected by Mr. Turnor, of the Post Office, why an inspection was not held by a Military officer of suitable rank; and, whether this ceremony took place with the concurrence of the Military authorities; and, if that be the case, whether it is intended that Mr. Turner should inspect any other detachments or corps who are or may be under orders to proceed to Egypt?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The detachment to which my hon. Friend alludes consisted of 20 men connected with the Post Office Department as letter sorters, who are being sent out to Suakin to undertake the Postal Service. They are attached to the Post Office Volunteers as members of the Army Reserve, the object being that they should be under military discipline when serving with an Army in the field. They were paraded at the Tower of London on the 3rd instant, in order that, as head of the Department, I might bid them farewell. I was, unfortunately, unable to be present, on account of a severe cold; and I asked Mr. Turnor, the Financial Secretary of the Post Office, to say a few words on my behalf to them. The military inspection of the corps by their own commanding officer had taken place some days previously, and the parade the hon. Member refers to was only for the purpose I mention. I have, in a similar manner, bid farewell to-day to another detachment of telegraph men who are going out to join the Engineers at Suakin in a similar position, and I shall continue to do so whenever detachments are sent out from the Department of which I have control.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—THE STEAMSHIP "CLYDE."

MR. CARINGTON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, What was the result of the litigation between the Admiralty and the owners of the s.s. Clyde, which was lost near the Cape of Good Hope in 1879?

MR. CAINE: The trial ended on the 17th of November, 1880, by a verdict in favour of the Admiralty. Damages to the extent of £18,346 were paid by the owners of the steamship Clyde, of which sum £16,608 18s. 7d. were placed to the credit of the War Department, and £1,737 1s. 6d. were retained by the Admiralty.

NAVY—DOCKYARD ARTIFICERS.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If the Petition of the leading men of the steam branch in the Dockyards has been considered by their Lordships; and, whether it is intended to deal with the claims of this class?

Mr. CAINE: The Petition of the leading men of the steam branch in the Dockyards has been considered by the Admiralty; and it has been decided not to make any alteration in their position until experience has been had of the value of the change recently effected in the position of the leading men of shipwrights.

ARMY AUXILIARY FORCES;—NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. STEWART MACLIVER asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the present exigencies of the Services do not warrant the acceptance by the Government of the proposals made from Plymouth, and other towns, of Volunteers who are seeking to be enrolled as Naval Artillerymen?

Sir THOMAS BRASSEY: A conference will shortly be held between the Authorities of the Admiralty and War Office, with a view to determine what duties shall be assigned to the Naval Artillery Volunteers in the defence of the coast and the mercantile ports. The enrolment of additional corps will be postponed for a short period until the scheme has been matured. In a time of emergency opportunities would be afforded to eligible men of Naval Artillery Volunteers to serve in sea-going ships.

POOR LAW IRELAND,—UNION RATING.

Colonel COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Government propose to deal with the question of Union Rating this Session?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not at present in a position to make any announcement on the subject referred to in this Question.

WATER SUPPLY METROPOLIS)—THE WATER COMPANIES' ASSESSMENT.

Mr. FIRTH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that at each of the last three quinquennial valuations of the Metropolis its rateable value has been increased between two and three millions sterling in respect of simple increment of value, and irrespective of all increase consequent upon new houses or upon the structural improvement of old ones; whether he is aware that under the working of "The Metropolis Valuation Act, 1869," there has thus been an increase of nearly eight millions sterling of assessed annual value upon which the Water Companies are able to charge London consumers, and thus enormously increase their income without any increase of supply; and, whether as this year a further assessment of the Metropolis is taking place, he will take steps to prevent the continuance of the system under which, in default of immediate legislation, the London Water Companies will this year be able to increase their income by £100,000 a-year, and the capital value of their property by more than £2,000,000 sterling, at the expense of Londoners, and without in any way improving or increasing the water supply?

Colonel MAKINS asked the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he was aware that it was a fact that Water Companies' charges were based upon an assessment of their own, which was not affected by the variations in the quinquennial assessments; whether the Water Companies were assessed on their profits, while all other trades were assessed on the rental value of their premises; whether since the last assessment the Water Companies had paid £60,000 a-year more than they had paid before 1880; and whether, since 1852, they had not incurred an expenditure in works on the Upper Thames amounting to upwards of £7,000,000?

Mr. COOPE asked the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he was not aware that the Water Companies had to assess their charges on the net annual value, as settled in Dobbs's case; and whether the Question of the hon. Member for Chelsea Mr. Firth was not based on entire misapprehension?

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: In answer to the Question of the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Coope), I cannot say that the Question of the hon. Member for Chelsea is based on an entire misapprehension. Although it is true that water rates are founded in law on the net annual value, it is quite certain that a rise in the assessment is extremely likely to lead in the future, as in the past, to a rising in the estimate of the net annual value. That is to say, if you find that the houses are rated higher than they were in the previous five years, it is extremely likely that the Water Companies, basing themselves on the net annual value, will say that the net annual value must be higher than before. Consequently a rise—no doubt a considerable rise—in the quinquennial assessment is extremely likely to lead to a great rise in the charges on the houses for water. I can only repeat what I have said before, that I think the continual increase in the charge for water, without any proportionate increase in the supply, is a great injustice to the people of London. It has arisen, no doubt, from improvident legislation in the past. What is to be the remedy is not very easy to say. The Corporation of London attempted it last year without any very great success, though I did what I could to help them. As to the real remedy for this state of things, I think my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea and myself are pretty well agreed what it ought to be.

MR. FIRTH gave Notice that in Committee on the Waterworks Clauses Bill, which had now passed a second reading, he would move the introduction of words for the purpose of carrying out the object of his Question.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS—ENGLAND AND GERMANY—THE DESPATCH OF MAY 5.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is to be understood by the statement in Lord Granville's Despatch of 7th February to Sir Edward Malet that the Despatch of Prince Bismarck to Count Munster of 5th May never had been communicated to him, that a Copy of it was not left with him, or that it neither had been read to him nor its contents verbally stated to him; whether Count Munster did at any time fulfil the instructions which, as stated in The North German Gazette, he had received on 5th May, to give Lord Granville to understand that, if England refused to come to terms with Germany, the latter would seek an understanding with France, and that England declined to meet this German advance; whether at the interviews, which took place between Count Herbert Bismarck and Lord Granville, when the former was sent on a mission to London, "in the hope that he might succeed where the Ambassador had failed," Count Münster was present; and, whether Count Herbert Bismarck left England without being apprised by Lord Granville of the fact that Prince Bismarck's Despatch of 5th May had never been communicated to him?

Sir William Harcourt

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: With the permission of the House, I beg leave to read the following letter, which Lord Granville has addressed to me on the subject of my hon. Friend's Question, and which he has authorized me to read to the House:—

" March 9, 1885.

" Dear Fitzmaurice,

" I take the unusual course of writing to you a letter in answer to Mr. Labouchere's Questions, as they affect me personally rather than the Foreign Office. I never received, nor had I until lately any knowledge of, Prince Bismarck's despatch of May 5. Count Münster and Count Herbert Bismarck, not long afterwards, each told me that the German Government could not maintain a friendly attitude on Egyptian matters if we continued to be unfriendly on Colonial questions. I denied that we had been unfriendly, and gave positive assurances, on the part of my Colleagues and myself, of friendly action for the future. Both Count Herbert Bismarck and Prince Bismarck expressed at the time their satisfaction with these assurances. The tension which has since arisen resulted from the serious difference of opinion on the part of the two Governments as to whether those assurances have been kept or broken. I need not renew that discussion, more especially as I have reason to hope that this friction will be a thing of the past. Count Münster was not present at the conversations which I had with Count Herbert Bismarck. It is not usual for the Ambassador and his First Secretary to come at the same time. What I have stated above will show that it was impossible for me to complain to Count Herbert Bismarck of the non-communication of a despatch which I did not know to exist—a despatch which appears to have been secret, and to have dealt generally with the political situation for the guidance of Count Münster.

" Yours sincerely,

" GRANVILLE."

MR. GORST asked, whether the noble Lord was able to say whether, subsequent to the arrival of Count Herbert Bismarck, or up to the present, Lord Granville had received a copy of the despatch of the 5th of May; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Government would try to induce the German Government to consent to furnish it?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I think the hon. and learned Member had better give Notice of that Question.

MR. GORST: I will put it down for to-morrow.

ARMY—ROYAL ENGINEERS' DEPARTMENT, WOOLWICH

MR. H. S. NORTHCOTE asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is intended to grant Commissions as Quartermasters of Works for Surveyors' duties in the Royal Engineers' Department to six Sergeant Major Foremen of Works; and, if so, what are the names of the Warrant Officers selected for this recognition of their long services as Sergeant Major Foremen of Works?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The promotions in question cannot be made until after the 31st of March; and it would be most unusual to announce the names of the individuals to be promoted before the promotions are actually gazetted.

PARLIAMENT PRIVATE BUSINESS—RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES BILLS.

SIR BERNHARD SAMUELSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the report is correct that he has received an assurance from the various Railway Companies promoting Rates and Charges Bills that those Bills will not be brought on till after Easter?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, Sir; the statement is correct. I have received a positive assurance from the Companies that they will not seek for the second reading of the Bills before Easter.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND ACT, 1853)—EXTRA POLICE, CLARE COUNTY

MR. O'SHEA asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a resolution of the Ennis Board of Guardians asking the Grand Jury of Clare to request His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant to be graciously pleased to withdraw the extra police force in that county; whether he is aware of the favourable observations made on the subject by several grand jurors; and, whether any decision has been arrived at by the Irish Government as to the speedy withdrawal or reduction of the extra force?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The resolution referred to in the Question has not been brought to the notice of the Irish Government; but we have had under consideration proposals from the Divisional Magistrate with regard to the extra police in Clare, and I am glad to be in a position to say that His Excellency has seen his way to issue orders for the withdrawal from the county of 22 men sent there under the provisions of the Prevention of Crime Act, and for a reduction of 30 men of the force in the county under Section 13 of the Act 6 & 7 Will. IV., c. 13.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION, BILL—CENTRAL ELECTION COURTS—WEST DONEGAL.

MR. KENNY asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the Irish Boundary Commissioners, when they defined the proposed Parliamentary division of West Donegal, took into consideration the necessity of having within such division a suitable centre for nominating candidates, counting votes, and declaring the result in contested elections; if so, whether he can give the name of such urban centre, its population, and the nature of the accommodation provided for the contingencies specified; and, if no such centre is contained within the division, there will be a re-arrangement of the boundaries so as to include one?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It formed no part of the duty of the Boundary Commissioners to take into consideration the necessity of having a suitable centre for holding the Election Courts for the divisions of counties formed by them. It will be seen, by reference to Clause 15 of the Bill, that the place of election is to be determined by the Local Authority empowered to appoint the polling districts; and the place of election need not be in the division itself, but may be in any town situate in the county at large, or in an adjoining county of a city or town.

MR. HEALY: What is the Local Authority in Donegal?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: In England it is the Quarter Sessions.

MR. HEALY: But in Donegal?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I am not acquainted with the arrangements in Ireland; but in England it is the Quarter Sessions.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—
JAMES ELLIS FRENCH, LATE DETECTIVE DIRECTOR.

MR. JOHN REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Upon whose recommendation and under what circumstances James Ellis French, late detective director in the Royal Irish Constabulary, and at present undergoing a sentence of two years' imprisonment for unnatural offences, was promoted to be county inspector over the heads of officers senior to him in rank and service; did the Lord Lieutenant obtain authority; and, if so, in what manner, to increase the established number of county inspectors in Ireland by one, and was James Ellis French selected to fill the vacancy thus created; and, who was the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when this transaction took place?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: A Committee which reported in March, 1882, on the pay and allowances of the officers of the Royal Irish Constabulary, recommended amongst other things that the officer selected for the post of Detective Director should, when so appointed, be made of the rank of County Inspector if he did not already hold that rank. The proposal was adopted by the Irish Government and the Treasury; and as legislative sanction was necessary, provision was accordingly made in a Bill which passed the same year to enable the Lord Lieutenant to create an additional County Inspector. In pursuance of this recommendation and provision, Mr. French, who had held the office of Detective Director for some time previously, was made a County Inspector in October, 1882.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my Question as to on whose recommendation French was selected?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Mr. French was discharging these functions at the time when the Committee recommended that the officer who held the office should have the rank of County Inspector; therefore, he was made County Inspector.

ARMY—PEAT-MOSS LITTER.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any experiments have been made in Cavalry Barracks in England or in Ireland for the purpose of testing the suitability of peat-moss litter for horses; and, if so, whether the reports on such experiments are satisfactory?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Experiments have been made with peat-moss litter at various stations in Cavalry and other stables. The result has not been such as to lead to its adoption in this country.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked, whether Irish or German moss was used?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON was understood to say that he did not know.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)— THE BALLYFORAN MURDER CASE.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, How long John Nolan and Laurence Hannon, accused of complicity in the Ballyforan murder case, and discharged from custody on Tuesday last at Carrick on Shannon, had been kept in prison without being brought to trial; why the Crown persisted in applying to enter a nolle prosequi, and refused to assent to the application of counsel for Laurence Hannon, who stated that—

“The prisoner had a number of witnesses who could conclusively establish his innocence, and he was most anxious for a full trial, to which he submitted he was in common justice entitled. His witnesses were now collected by the indefatigable exertions of his solicitor. He had no security that, if at some future period the Crown thought proper to rip up this charge again, his counsel and solicitors would be available or his witnesses alive;”

and, whether the Government will guarantee that the men discharged will not be further molested with respect to the abandoned accusation?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Sir, John Nolan, Laurence Hannon, and Michael Tansey were committed for trial at the Summer Assizes of 1884. Tansey was then tried and convicted, and the other cases were adjourned. At the Winter Assizes, which was the next Commission, John Nolan was tried, with the result that the jury disagreed, and Laurence Hannon was then released on bail. The Attorney General has considered that, having regard to the disagreement of the jury, the case against Nolan need not be further proceeded with, and, following the usual precedent, a nolle prosequi was accordingly entered. There is no intention of putting either of the men on trial again.

Mr. SEXTON: May I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether that amounts to a declaration of the men's innocence?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): No.

Mr. SEXTON: Well, then, I beg to give Notice that I will ask the hon. and learned Gentleman, Whether the Crown have kept these men in prison for months; and, whether, having refused them a trial which would prove their innocence, they now refuse to admit the innocence of these men?

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—OMAGH WORKHOUSE CHILDREN—WEARING OF SHOES AND STOCKINGS.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Dr. Hans Fleming, Medical Officer of Omagh Workhouse, has lately advised the Omagh Board of Guardians, in an official report, to keep the female children in the workhouse barefooted; and, if so, whether the Local Government Board will continue Dr. Fleming in office as a fit person to be the Medical Officer of the Workhouse?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is true that Dr. Fleming has recently advised the Omagh Board of Guardians that, so far as health is concerned, children are quite as well, if not better, without shoes or stockings. The Local Government Board do not agree with him; but they do not think his having expressed the opinion he entertains when called upon to do so affords any reason for removing him from his position. The Guardians are not bound to be governed by his opinion on such a point.

Mr. MACARTNEY: Is it not the fact that a large number of children, the sons and daughters of ratepayers in Ireland, are accustomed to go barefooted?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes.

Mr. CALLAN asked whether the majority of the Guardians who were in favour of keeping the children barefooted were not the constituents of the hon. Member?

Mr. SEXTON asked whether, if the children of ratepayers went barefooted, it was not because their parents had to pay rack rents?

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY asked whether it was not usual even for grown-up persons in country districts to carry their shoes and stockings in their hands, and to put them on when they got near the town?

[No reply.]

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—SCRUTINY OF VOTES.

Mr. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in view of the great complaints made after last year's election of Poor Law Guardians in Ireland of the action of the returning officers, and of the many cases in which the Local Government Board was obliged to set aside the elections and direct new ones to be held, and also of the many difficult legal points which arise at the elections, the Local Government Board will this year take steps to ensure that the returning officers will not be allowed to conduct the scrutiny of the votes in secrecy, but will conduct the scrutiny in the presence of the candidates and their legal advisers?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Local Government Board have recently re-issued instructions to Returning Officers in which they state that, in reference to the examination and casting-up of the votes, they are not prepared to deprive the Returning Officer of a discretion in regard to the admission or exclusion of strangers, inasmuch as the exercise of such a discretion may, on some occasions, be necessary to the proper discharge of his duty; but, on the other hand, the Board think that if the Returning Officer excludes from the examination of the voting papers for a particular electoral division either the candidates for that electoral division or those who proposed them, he should be prepared to show some urgent reason for a step which, generally speaking, would seem to be unnecessary or unreasonable. The Local Government Board do not think it advisable or necessary to interfere further with the discretion of the Returning Officers in this respect, or to make an order compelling them to admit the candidates' legal advisers on these occasions.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD, R.M.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Government has yet decided what to do with Mr. Clifford Lloyd, ex-resident magistrate; and, if it is proposed to reinstate him in his former position, in what part of Ireland will he be located? I would also like to ask the right hon. Gentleman what salary Mr. Lloyd will receive?

MR. O'BRIEN: Before this Question is answered, I would like to know whether it is a fact within the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman that Mr. Clifford Lloyd objects to return to Ireland?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not aware of the amount of Mr. Clifford Lloyd's salary. Mr. Lloyd still holds the office of Resident Magistrate. He has been on sick leave for some time, but will shortly return to his duties in a district in the North of Ireland.

MR. O'BRIEN: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my Question, whether it is within his own knowledge that Mr. Clifford Lloyd objects to returning?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not suppose it is a matter to be taken very much into account what the particular wish of the Resident Magistrate is.

MR. O'BRIEN: Well, I will inquire to-morrow as to the fact.

POST OFFICE—UNSTAMPED LETTERS FROM EGYPT.

MR. TOMLINSON asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is the fact that, owing to the impossibility of procuring postage stamps in the Egyptian desert, letters from the Troops in Egypt are sent home without prepayment of postage; whether the relatives and friends of the soldiers are required to pay double postage on receipt of such letters; and, whether he will take any steps to remedy this hardship and injustice?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: It is certainly the case that many letters from the British troops in Egypt reach this country without prepayment, owing, no doubt, to the difficulty of procuring postage stamps in the Egyptian Desert; but such letters are not, as the hon.

Member seems to suppose, charged with double postage on delivery. The instructions are to charge such letters with the single rate of postage, as if they had been prepaid. On inquiry, I learn that a few letters have inadvertently been charged double postage, and in those cases the extra postage has been refunded. I have renewed the order, and hope no similar error will occur.

PRISONS (IRELAND) — DISMISSAL OF WARDERS AT MOUNTJOY PRISON.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it the fact that five warders of Mountjoy Prison were summarily dismissed by the Hon. Charles Bourke because they respectfully protested against being compelled to carry out an order of so indecent and degrading a character that it is impossible publicly to describe it; did Mr. Bourke, immediately after dismissing the five warders, cause the order to be cancelled; did the officers subsequently apply to be reinstated; and, was this refused?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This Question, with some others, only appeared on the Paper on Saturday last. They involved local inquiry, and full information could not have been obtained by this time without, at any rate, disturbing the Sunday rest of many officials. I would ask hon. Members in all cases that are not urgent to give a longer interval than from Saturday to Monday.

MR. HEALY: The fate of five unfortunate warders who have been summarily dismissed by Mr. Bourke depends on this Question. ["Order, order!"] I will put it again.

PUBLIC HEALTH—IMPORTATION OF RAGS.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is aware that, since the prohibition on the importation of French rags has been removed, a large number of bales of rags have been imported from French ports; and, whether he will take steps to see that such bales, coming from Foreign ports, will be disinfected before they are carried inland by rail, as it may be that they consist of accumulations of rags containing cholera germs?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: There is no doubt that a large number of bales of rags has been imported from French ports since our order expired on the 1st instant. We know of no instance of cholera being imported in rags, and we have allowed such a period to elapse since the date of the last known case of cholera in Europe as would materially reduce any possible danger. It does not appear that it would be further reduced by any of the customary processes of disinfection in use at English ports.

THE CURRENCY—VALUE OF SILVER.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in reference to his statement on March 5th that wage-earners to whom ten shillings are due now practically receive only seven shillings and five pence, Her Majesty's Government have in contemplation the introduction of any remedial measure calculated to allay the anxiety naturally evoked in the minds of the working classes by his said declaration?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that he has not correctly quoted my words. What I said the other night was that the intrinsic value of 10s. in silver coins was only 7s. 5d., not that the wage-earner to whom 10s. was due practically received only 7s. 5d. When the hon. Gentleman is paid £5 by means of a bank-note, he receives what is intrinsically worth less than a farthing; but it is really worth £5, because it is a convertible legal tender for a payment of £5; and 10s. in silver are worth 10s. for the same reason. As I said before, I do not believe that any person belonging to the working classes requires to have his mind relieved of these matters; and I shall certainly not introduce what the hon. Gentleman calls a "remedial measure."

POST OFFICE COLOUR OF POSTAGE STAMPS

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND asked the Postmaster General, Whether he is aware of the great inconvenience caused in consequence of the postage stamps being now all printed of one colour; whether the object of such alteration is economy; and, if so, whether that is a sufficient reason to disregard the convenience of the public, and increase the difficulties of the Post Office officials; and, whether he will give orders to return to the different colours for different denominations of stamps?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: In reply to the hon. Member, I beg to say that the inconvenience to which he refers, connected with the present series of postage stamps, has for some time past occupied my attention, and that the matter is now being carefully considered by a Departmental Committee, whose Report I expect to receive shortly.

POOR LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES)— THE KENSINGTON UNION INFIRMARY.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND asked the President of the Local Government Board, Why, since the 1st January, the Kensington Infirmary has been closed against the parishioners on Wednesdays; and, whether the master of the workhouse adjoining labours under any special restrictions preventing him from allowing aged inmates being seen by near relatives at other than visiting times?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: It rests with the Board of Guardians to make such regulations as they may deem desirable as to the admission of visitors to the infirmary and the workhouse. As regards the infirmary, since the 1st of January there has been only one general weekly visiting day—namely, Sunday—but in all cases of dangerous illness visitors are allowed on any day and at any hour; and, should they so desire, the relatives or friends of a dying patient are allowed to remain with him without any limitation of time. With respect to the workhouse, there are certain rules laid down by the Guardians as to the visitation of inmates. The master is allowed a discretionary power of permitting a special visit to an inmate under exceptional circumstances on any day at a reasonable hour; but this would not extend to his allowing the friends of a particular inmate regularly to visit at times other than those allowed by the Guardians.

THE MAGISTRACY IRELAND—RIGHT OF SUPPRESSING PUBLIC MEETINGS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Whether he will now, according to his engagement, cite either the Statutes or the judicial pronouncements upon which he relies in support of his statement that magistrates in Ireland have powers to prevent a lawful assembly or procession, which are not vested in magistrates in Great Britain?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): One of the judgments referred to is a judgment of Lord Chancellor Law, in which he says—

"The defendant was not to defer action until a breach of the peace had actually been committed. His paramount duty was to preserve the peace unbroken, and that by whatever means were available for the purpose. Furthermore, the duty of a Justice of the Peace being to preserve the peace unbroken, he is, of course, entitled, and, in fact, bound to intervene the moment he has reasonable apprehensions of a breach of the peace being imminent; and therefore he must, in such cases, necessarily act on his own reasonable and bona fide belief as to what is likely to occur."

MR. O'KELLY asked whether the only disturbers of the meeting in the case to which Lord Chancellor Law referred were the magistrates and the police?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that he assumed when a Judge interpreted the law he correctly stated the facts.

POST OFFICE—ACCELERATION OF THE MAILS TO SOUTH-WEST OF SCOT- LAND AND BELFAST.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Postmaster General a Question, of which he had given private Notice, with reference to certain information laid on the Table—namely, Whether he was able to give any information with reference to the acceleration of the Irish mails between the South-West of Scotland and the North of Ireland by way of the Stranraer and Larne route?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the arrangements he had made did not contemplate any such extension; but he would be receiving a deputation from Belfast next day, and he would hear what they had to say in favour of the Larne and Stranraer route.

EXCISE LICENCES (SCOTLAND).

MR. CRAIG-SELLAR asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, When the Return (No. 316) on Excise Licences (Scotland), which was ordered to be printed on July 31st 1884, will be circulated?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the Return would be circulated in a few days. It was prepared some time ago; but its completion was delayed in consequence of a Return not being received from one of the counties.

IRELAND—ARRAN ISLANDS AND GALWAY DISPENSARY DISTRICTS.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What are the grounds of the refusal of the Local Government Board to make the dispensary districts of the Arran Islands and Galway again separate; whether the amalgamation took place in September 1883 in consequence of a resolution passed at the instance of the Local Government Board by the Galway Board of Guardians in August 1883; whether, since that period, the Islanders and the Galway Board of Guardians have both asked that the amalgamation should cease; whether the Galway Board of Guardians has made this request on two or three occasions; whether the present arrangement throws an increased expenditure of £70 yearly on the Galway Dispensary, and thus affords a large relief to the owners of property at Arran, at the expense of the ratepayers of Galway; and, whether, as the original arrangement was made in accordance with a resolution of the Galway Board, and at the wish of the Islanders, the change will be made which is demanded by the same parties?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have received a letter from the Rev. Mr. O'Donoghue, parish priest of Arran, on the subject referred to in this Question, and am at present in communication with the Local Government Board about it.

NORTH BORNEO.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government now regard North Borneo as under British Sovereignty; and, if so, when and in what manner such Sovereignty was acquired?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government do not regard

North Borneo as being under British Sovereignty.

ISLANDS OF THE WESTERN PACIFIC— SAMOA AND TONGA

Mr. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the documents alleged to record the assurances of the German Government to respect the independence of Samoa and Tonga consist of statements by Lord Granville that Count Munster said the German Government were willing to enter into negotiation on the subject; whether Lord Granville's statements would be held by the German Government to be binding upon them; and, whether there is any document binding on the German Government in which an undertaking is given on their part to respect the independence of Samoa and Tonga?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The documents referred to do not consist solely of the statements made by Count Munster. I beg again to refer the hon. and learned Member to No. 177 in the recent Colonial Blue Book, c. 4,273, where it is stated that Prince Bismarck had assured Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin that he had no intention of sanctioning the annexation of Samoa or the establishment of a German Protectorate there, and that the German Government would adhere strictly to the terms of the agreement with Her Majesty's Government. They hold this promise to be amply sufficient.

Mr. GORST: Will the noble Lord say by whom the statement was made?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: It is in the despatches of Sir Edward Malet.

Mr. GORST: Am I right in understanding that there is no document in the possession of Her Majesty's Government which is signed by any German officer?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: There is no Treaty or Convention.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION, WALES.

Mr. MORGAN LLOYD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he is now able to inform the House when the Bill dealing with the question of Intermediate Education in Wales will be introduced, and if the Government will use their best endeavours to deal with that question during the present Session of Parliament?

Mr. GLADSTONE: I have a very strong sympathy with the subject alluded to in the hon. Member's Question, and a great sense of its importance; but I must wait until I obtain further light in regard to the progress of the Seats Bill and other Business before I can presume to give the hon. Member any confident answer.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir EDWARD J. REED: I wish to ask my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, who has the first place on the Paper for a Motion on going into Committee of Supply on the Navy Estimates, Whether, in view of the scope and character of the Motion of which I have given Notice, he will be good enough to make way by withdrawing his Motion, and giving precedence to that of which I have given Notice?

Dr. CAMERON: I have very carefully read my hon. Friend's Motion, and it appears to me to look so very much like a Vote of Censure that I am convinced that if proper representations are made to the Prime Minister he will readily afford proper facilities for its discussion. Such facilities I could not hope to obtain for my own Motion. There are four other Members whose Notices on going into Supply have priority over that of my hon. Friend; and having secured the first place, and without attaching exaggerated importance to my own Motion, I must reluctantly decline to give way.

Sir EDWARD J. REED said, that, under those circumstances, he would on Thursday ask the Prime Minister, in view of the character of his Motion, and its relation to the Navy and Admiralty, whether he would give facilities for bringing it on?

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—NEW- TOWN HAMILTON PETTY SESSIONS —MR STARR

Mr. BEREFORD asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What was the reply given by the authorities in Ireland to a question of which notice was given by the honourable Member for Cavan on the 19th February, viz:

"Whether it is a fact that a man named Starr, recently appointed Clerk of the Petty Sessions at Newtown Hamilton, has been three times convicted of drunkenness in Armagh; and, if so, whether he will have the appointment cancelled;"

and, whether there is the slightest foundation for this allegation against the character of Mr. Starr?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I informed the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), by letter, of the result of the inquiries I made in this case; but I am glad to have the opportunity of publicly stating that there was no foundation whatever for the allegation against the character of Mr. Starr, which is quoted in the present Question.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)—THE PUMPS FOR THE SOUDAN.

MR. BROADHURST said, he begged to ask the Surveyor General of Ordnance a Question of which he had given him private Notice. It had reference to a Question addressed to the hon. Gentleman the other day with regard to the supply of pumps for the Soudan, and was, Whether he had received any communication in regard to that subject from any member of the trade in England?

MR. BRAND: Yes, Sir. We have received at the War Office a letter from a well-known firm in Birmingham—Messrs. Tangye—[loud laughter]—I do not know what politics have to do with the supply of any material for the use of the Army. I wish I had had it in my hands when I was pressed on the subject the other night by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire. The letter is addressed to the Secretary of State for War, and is as follows:—

"My Lord.—In common with other makers of steam pumps, I confess I was much concerned to find that a large order for these machines had been given to a foreign firm at a time when the English machine trade is suffering from an almost unparalleled depression. Like many other firms, we have been keeping a large number of men employed in making for stock, hoping for better times, and have a large number of pumps on hand which we should have been glad to have sold to the Department. An inquiry was made, and I have to-day ascertained that the duty required of the pumps in question is so great that there is not the slightest chance of any suitable for the work being found in stock in England, and many months would be required to make them. Under these circumstances, I can only congratulate the War Department on being so fortunate as to find the pumps ready to hand."

Mr. Beresford

MR. J. LOWTHER: I wish to ask whether the writer of that letter is the same person whose name cropped up in connection with the Aston disturbances?

[No reply.]

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. MACFARLANE said, he wished to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the Business for Wednesday next. His (Mr. Macfarlane's) Bill—the Suspension of Evictions (Scotland) Bill—occupied the first place for that day; and his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, and the hon. Member for Ross-shire, had Bills which they had taken off the Paper for the purpose of allowing that Bill to occupy the first place on Wednesday. He saw that the candidate for the City of Glasgow had put that Bill into his election address, showing the importance attached to it in Scotland. Petitions had been sent in on the subject; and he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was his intention to allow that Bill, which consisted of six lines, and need not take one hour for second reading, whether he would allow it to come on, or whether it was his intention to put down, under the Resolution of the House, the Redistribution Bill as the first Order on that day?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had only to refer to the answer he gave 10 days or a week ago to his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) with regard to a Bill in which many persons took a great interest. He really had no choice whatever. It would be a breach of the engagement with the House were he to make exceptions to that rule with regard to particular Bills. It was intended to put down the Redistribution Bill for Wednesday, and he could not make an exception in favour of the Suspension of Evictions (Scotland) Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked the right hon. Gentleman when the Navy Estimates would be taken?

MR. GLADSTONE said, it depended on the progress made that night with the Supplementary Army Estimates. When the latter were concluded, it was intended to take the remaining Civil Votes. He was not without hope that the Navy Estimates might be reached on Wednesday.

ORDER OF THE DAY.SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES (SUPPLEMENTARY), 1884-5.SUPPLY—considered in Committee.(In the Committee.)*ARMY, 1884-5.*ADDITIONAL NUMBER OF MEN.*THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in rising to move—

said: Although the Resolution to be put from the Chair is only for additional men, it will, I think, be convenient that I should make a short statement upon the subject of these Supplemental Estimates, both as to men and to money; and perhaps it would be most convenient, before I refer to the Vote for additional men, that I should first refer to the Money Vote before the Committee. The Members of the Committee will have seen that the Estimate is divided into two portions—namely, £270,000 for what may be called the ordinary Services, and £672,000, which is the sum required in connection with the operations in the Soudan. It will probably not be necessary for me to say anything on this occasion as to the addition of £270,000 to the ordinary Estimates. That sum is required almost, if not quite, entirely for additional expenditure under Vote 12 for warlike supplies. Various circumstances, into the details of which I need not now enter, have retarded the proper provision of warlike supplies of various kinds for some time, especially the provision of larger powder used for heavy guns, of which there was not a large store, and for which, it was stated, last year, a large order had been given. If any further explanation should be required as to the details of this expenditure, my hon. Friend the Surveyor General of the Ordnance Mr. Brand will be able to give it better than I can. As to the war expenditure of £672,000, I wish to point out to the Committee that only the small sum of £15,000 is due to the past operations—that is to say, for the Suakin Campaign in the spring of last year, or the Nile Expedition that is now being conducted under Lord Wolseley's command. The sum the Committee will now be asked to vote includes a sum of £15,000 for gratuities to the troops engaged in the Suakin Expedition; and, with the exception of that sum, all the expenses of that Expedition have already been met by the Votes passed by the House. For the Nile Expedition, which is now in progress under Lord Wolseley, the Committee will remember that two sums of £300,000 and £1,000,000 have been already voted, the first in the form of a Vote of Credit, and the additional £1,000,000 in the Supplemental Estimate presented to the House in the Autumn Session of last year. Of course, I cannot speak, at the present moment, with absolute certainty on the subject; but there is every reason to believe that those two sums, amounting together to £1,300,000, will cover the whole cost of the Expedition up the Nile that will come in course of payment during the present year. I say I cannot speak with absolute certainty; but I believe it to be the opinion of my Financial Advisers that the fact I have stated may be relied upon. Of course, we have the means of knowing what amount of expenditure has been incurred in this country in providing supplies, and for boats and stores sent out for the purposes of the Expedition; and we have also the means of ascertaining, with very tolerable accuracy, what is the amount that has been expended in Egypt itself. The local expenditure has been met, and must be met, almost entirely by remittances from this country; and, therefore, I think there is very little reason to doubt that we are informed, with tolerable accuracy, at all events, as to what has been the expenditure in connection with that Expedition. I think, perhaps, when the Committee bear in mind the statements made from time to time in some of the newspapers respecting the enormous expenditure incurred for this Expedition—some persons putting it at many millions—it will be satisfactory to the Committee to know that the expenditure hitherto incurred in the Expedition will be almost entirely met by the sums already voted by Parliament. Well, Sir, the Committee also is not asked to vote anything more for prospective operations on the Nile. It will be the duty of the Government as soon as possible to frame and to present to the House an Estimate of all the expenditure which, in their judgment, will be necessary in connection with the continuation and probable extension of the operations now being carried on by Lord Wolseley. As I have said, the sums which have already been provided meet the expenditure up to the end of the current year. It will be desirable, before presenting further Estimates or a Vote of Credit to the House, that we should have an opportunity of forming the most accurate estimate we can of the probable expenditure at a later date; and I shall not attempt, until it is absolutely necessary, to state to the House what further sum it will be necessary for us to ask for. Under the circumstances, perhaps it might not be necessary for me to say anything further, at this stage, respecting the Nile Expedition. Certainly, in the few observations which I shall venture to address to the Committee on that subject, I shall endeavour to abstain altogether from re-opening, as far as I am concerned, any of those subjects of controversy which we discussed at considerable length a short time ago. But I am unwilling to pass by the Nile Expedition altogether on such an occasion as this without saying a few words to express the sense I feel, the sense the Government feel, and the sense I am sure the whole House and the country feel, with regard to the conduct of the General Officer in command, the officers under him, and the non-commissioned officers and men who have taken part in that campaign. We, all of us, share the disappointment, to which Lord Wolseley has given expression in a recent General Order to the troops, at their failure to secure the main object of the Expedition—namely, to relieve their gallant comrade and countryman, General Gordon; and while we share that disappointment, we desire that they should feel assured that we acquit them of all blame for having failed in that object, and also that we feel under the greatest obligations to them for the exertions they have made and the sacrifices they have undergone. As to the plan of campaign, I do not think it is necessary that I should say much now. No doubt, the difficulty of ascending the Nile has caused a longer delay in the operations than was anticipated; but I do not think that even now, after the experience we have gained, there is any reason to doubt that the plan adopted by Lord Wolseley was the best, and probably the only practicable one. There is no reason to doubt the accuracy of the statement made by Lord Wolseley in the despatch which has been laid upon the Table of the House, in which he says that he was satisfied that the plan of ascending the Nile by means of small-built boats was a success. He uses this expression—

“In fact, our small English-built boats have been, so far, a complete success, and without them it would have been simply impossible for the Expedition to have reached Korti, or to have made any provision for the relief of Khartoum.”

Without dwelling any further on the plan of operations, which might give rise to differences of opinion among the Members of the Committee, I will pass on to the conduct of the troops engaged in this Expedition, as to which there can be no difference at all. Lord Wolseley says in the same despatch which I have just quoted—

“Although the physical obstacles encountered in the ascent of the Nile above the Second Cataract have been considerable, and although the labour of surmounting the many Cataracts between Surraas and Hannek has tested, to a remarkable degree, the strength and endurance of the troops, the advance of the boats up the river has been accomplished in a manner which has reflected the highest credit upon all ranks, and has conclusively proved, if proof were wanting, that Her Majesty's soldiers of to-day possess all that strength of body and that military pride and regimental spirit for which the British Army has been long renowned.”

Since that time Lord Wolseley has had to call upon his men for the display of other qualities in addition to those of strength and endurance. Very shortly after that despatch was written they had to prove, not only their strength and endurance, but their courage and bravery in action. The accounts which we have received of the battle of Abu Klea recently, and which are fuller than those previously published, I think the Committee will be satisfied fully support the words both of Sir Herbert Stewart and of Lord Wolseley, which appear in the despatches of those gallant officers. Sir Herbert Stewart says—

“It has been my duty to command a force from which exceptional work, exceptional hardships, and, it may be added, exceptional fighting has been asked. It would be impossible for me adequately to describe the admirable support that has been given to me by every officer and man of the Force."

Lord Wolseley says—

"All ranks have displayed that discipline and those high fighting qualities for which Her Majesty's Army has always been renowned."

The newspaper reports show that the Forces under the gallant and lamented General Earle displayed just as high military qualities as those exhibited by the men under the command of General Stewart, of whom I have already spoken. Passing, with those observations, from the operations on the Nile, I shall now endeavour to state what are the present proposals of Her Majesty's Government, and what is involved in them. We have not concealed our opinion that, in the circumstances in which we find ourselves placed, by the betrayal of General Gordon and the consequent fall of Khartoum, an ultimate advance to and the recapture of that place and the destruction of the Mahdi's power will probably be necessary. [Lord FERRERS CRIED: Probably?] Yes, probably. But the Supplementary Estimates the Committee are now asked to vote do not necessarily commit and do not pledge the Committee to the prosecution of that policy. The measures which we are now asking the Committee to sanction, and which are involved in the adoption of this Vote, are measures which, in our own opinion, are required whether the House should ultimately sanction the policy or not, which we have laid before the House, of an advance upon Khartoum. Before Lord Wolseley was in full possession of the views of the Government, and when he was discussing the probability of doing, as a matter of choice, that which subsequent events compelled him to do as a matter of necessity—namely, to go into summer quarters in certain positions between Dongola and Korti, and before he was in possession of our views as to the necessity of an advance on Khartoum, he stated that, in his opinion, the first measure that it was absolutely necessary to take in order to secure the safety of his Army was the despatch of an Expedition to Suakin to disperse the Forces under Osman Digna. If Lord Wolseley is not to abandon the Nile, but is to advance upon Khartoum and destroy the power of the Mahdi, it is obviously necessary that a large Force threatening his left flank should be dispersed. It would not be consistent with the safety of Lord Wolseley's Army that, while engaged in attacking the unknown numbers of the Mahdi's Forces, he should be exposed to a considerable Force from Suakin, threatening his communications, and attacking him on his left flank. Therefore we have sent, and are sending, and we ask the Committee by this Vote to sanction, an Expedition to Suakin, under General Sir Gerald Graham, to disperse the Forces of Osman Digna. That Expedition will consist of about 12,000 men, including those who are already at Suakin; and its composition will be as follows:—Of the British troops there will be four squadrons of Cavalry, one battery of Horse Artillery, one screw-gun battery; three companies of Engineers, one railway company, besides telegraph and balloon detachments; three battalions of Foot Guards, three battalions of Infantry of the Line, besides one of Marines, together with the necessary Commissariat, Transport, and Medical Staff. There will, in addition, be an Indian Contingent which is coming from India, which consists of one regiment of Cavalry, three battalions of Infantry, and one company of Sappers. There will also be the New South Wales Contingent, which will consist of 800 men, making the whole Force something over 12,000, and the immediate object of this Army will be to disperse the Forces under Osman Digna. When it has achieved that object, it will hold the principal positions in the country hitherto occupied by Osman Digna, and will prevent a renewal of his power—such a renewed concentration of his Forces as took place after the battle of El Teb and the operations near Suakin last year. It will also open the route to Berber, as far as it is possible for it to be opened; and in the event of Lord Wolseley's further advance upon Berber and Khartoum it will co-operate with him. In order to complete these operations it is proposed immediately to commence a railway from Suakin to Berber. The plant for a section has already been sent out, and the material for another section of the same length has been ordered, and will be sent out without loss of time. I understand that the portion of this Vote which is to be chiefly resisted to-night is that which has to be put down for the commencement of this railway; but I must acknowledge that I am somewhat at a loss to understand on what ground the opposition is based by those who admit the necessity of any operations of this character at all. It will be undertaken essentially as a military weapon, and a military operation, in aid of a military object. In the event of a combined operation by way of the Nile and by Suakin and Berber on Khartoum, the construction of the railway, if possible, as far as Berber would be an enormous advantage. We hope it will be constructed, and if it were constructed I think it would go very far to insure the absolute success of such an operation. If that is not possible, under the conditions in which we are placed, the construction of a railway for a shorter distance will be, I admit, a loss, but still a distinct and substantial, advantage. The country which intervenes between Suakin and Berber, although it contains a certain number of wells, is a desert. The first portion of it is rocky and mountainous; the last portion—at least, 100 miles of it—is sandy; but through the whole length of the route it is but indifferently supplied with water, and it affords no provision or supply for an army advancing through it. Lord Wolseley has lately estimated the loss of camels, in desert marching, at 5 per cent for every 100 miles. It is obvious, therefore, I think, that every mile this railway is constructed from Suakin will be of immense advantage to any force that is advancing from Suakin in the direction of the Nile, even if it is not found possible to make it for more than a limited distance. Even in the event of the Suakin route to Berber not being used at all, still, for the purpose of supplying the troops who will have to occupy positions in this portion of the country in order to prevent the renewed concentration of troops under Osman Digna, it will be of the greatest possible advantage, and, in my opinion, almost an absolute necessity. The terms of the agreement which has been made with the contractors, Messrs. Lucas and Aird, are before the Committee. From them the Committee will see that the character of the work is purely military. It is to be carried on for military purposes, under military supervision, in accordance with, and in subordination to, military requirements. We are not, as I have already said, indifferent to the possible advantages which may be conferred upon the country by the construction of the railway as a permanent work; but that is not the object we are asking the Committee to sanction in the present case. A question has been asked as to the great importance of the improvement of the Nile railway, and of the communications by means of the Nile. That part of the subject has not been neglected. Although Lord Wolseley has asked that the Suakin line should be constructed, he attaches equal importance—if not greater importance—in fact, he does attach greater importance—to the development of the means of communication by the Nile route. Upon a requisition which we have received from him, which will be before the House in a few days, materials have been ordered for the extension of 40 or 50 miles of the existing railway from Sarrass to Terket, which will enable a considerable number of the worst Cataracts of the Nile to be turned, and will give greater facilities for conveying supplies to the troops. Materials will also be sent out for constructing light tramways round some other Cataracts which exist in the neighbourhood of Dongola. Lord Wolseley has also asked for a number of steamboats of various descriptions, and of light draught, suitable for Nile navigation. Steps are being taken, without delay, to supply these requirements; but the Committee will not be asked to provide any part of the payment for these preparations, because they will not come in course of payment during the present financial year. I think it is only necessary further to give some explanation as to the additional men. We are asking the Committee at present to vote 3,000 men in addition to those who were voted in the ordinary Estimates of the present financial year. This is the number by which we think it is probable that the number voted by Parliament will be actually exceeded within the limits of the present year; and the sum of £10,000, which was taken for recruiting in the Supplementary Estimates under Vote I., will, it is believed, cover the excess payment which will be involved in the present year. The actual numbers were, during a considerable portion of the financial year, below the numbers voted by Parliament; and it was, I think, only in the last month of the year that the numbers actually exceeded the establishment. It will be premature to state what will be the total increase in the numbers of the Army which we should ask for in consequence of these operations for the next financial year; but the sum of £10,000 already voted by Parliament will, it is thought, cover the payment of troops in the present year. The number of 15,000 has been mentioned, and that is about the number which would be involved, and to which the men actually under orders at the present time might have to be increased. Although the Committee is not asked to sanction this addition to the numbers of the Army, it would be desirable that I should state at once what are the measures which have been and which are being taken with respect to the regimental establishments. There are at present 15 regiments of the Line which have both their battalions abroad. In these regiments transfer to the Reserve is now suspended. By the suspension of transfer to the Reserve one of the greatest sources of depletion to the regimental establishments will be temporarily suspended; but those battalions will, of course, notwithstanding this circumstance, require drafts to supply casualties in the field and casualties caused by invaliding. These drafts will be provided from men left behind in depôts, and who, though not sufficiently trained to accompany their regiments abroad, are, of course, daily completing their course of instruction, and are fit to serve in the draft. They will also be supplied by the volunteers from the Reserve who are being called up, and who are, when their services are required, collected together at the regimental depôts. It will also be necessary to make provision for the large drain which will come upon these regiments as soon as the campaign is over. As soon as the campaign is over the transfer of men to the Reserve will be resumed; and, of course, both battalions would very soon lose a large number of their seasoned soldiers. It is necessary to make provision for all these contingencies; and in the case of regiments with both battalions abroad, it is necessary, under the scheme of the present territorial organization, to raise the strength of the regimental depôts to the establishment of 600 men. That increase in regard to these 15 regiments will cause an increase in the establishment of 8,000 men. In addition to that, as the battalions sent abroad are those highest on the roster and highest on the Home establishment, those which are left behind are those with the lowest establishment. As the highest establishment battalions are those sent abroad, it is considered necessary to raise the establishment of those next on the roster to a corresponding rank, in order to take the place of those which are gone, and, if necessary, to provide reinforcements as they are required. For every battalion which is sent abroad, therefore, it is necessary to raise the Home battalion from the lowest to the highest establishment. That process will require another 2,600 men. By these two processes an addition of 10,600 men will be required. The other additions necessary will be in the Foot Guards, of whom three battalions have gone to Suakin, and they will require either depôts or a corresponding increase in the battalions which are left behind. They will require depôts, or an increase in the Home battalions of the regiment of 300 each; that will amount to 900 men. There are also already serving in the Camel Corps with Lord Wolseley 280 men taken from the battalions of Guards. Authority was at once given to replace these men on the establishment, so that the total addition to the Foot Guards will be 1,180 men. There is an addition also to the establishment of the Cavalry. The 19th Hussars are in Egypt, and that regiment will require a depôt estimated at 110 men. There are also the men who have been drained from the various Cavalry regiments at home for service abroad. Authority has already been given to replace these men, and that will involve a further addition of 760 men. Thus the total increase to the Cavalry under the measures already taken will be 870. Then there are several companies of Engineers which are on active service. They will have to be raised to their war establishment, which will cause an addition of 600 men to that corps. There are, besides, minor increases in the establishment, which I do not think it is necessary that I should explain to the Committee at the present time.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT: Is there any increase in the Artillery?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No, Sir; there is no increase in the Artillery at present contemplated. The only other subject to which I need refer in this Supplementary Estimate is the Militia. As I have already shown, the number of this branch of the Service ordinarily at home has been very much diminished by the requirements of these operations; and it is necessary, in order that the ordinary garrison duty required at home should not fall too heavily on the remaining men, and that the military instruction should be conducted as usual, that some relief should be given in the performance of ordinary garrison duty. It is, therefore, proposed to embody at once two small brigades of Artillery and six battalions of Militia. That is all the House is asked to sanction at present. If further explanations are required I will endeavour to give them; but I have said all that is necessary for me in moving the Supplementary Estimates which are now on the Table of the House.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a further number of Land Forces, not exceeding 3,000 men (all ranks), be maintained for the service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, at Home and Abroad, during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1885."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, there were one or two points in the statement of the noble Marquess upon which he desired to say a few words. The noble Marquess had stated that the Nile Expedition experienced great difficulty and great delay, owing to the difficulties that had to be overcome in the ascent of the river. But there was strong evidence that the delay in ascending the river was caused by the dilatoriness of Her Majesty's Government in sending out the Expedition. Lord Wolseley, in a despatch which was quoted the other day, expressed his deep regret that the Expedition had not started from England a month earlier. What, however, he wished to lay before the Committee was the apparent purposelessness of the Expedition to Suakin, as at present designed. They had been given to understand, from the statement of the noble Marquess, that the policy of the Expedition was practically to be one of massacre and retire. Osman Digna's Force was to be smashed, and his concentration in the future was to be prevented. That concentration would have been prevented, and would have been impossible, if General Graham's Forces had not been recalled as they were last March; and it was only to be prevented now by a great sacrifice of blood and money, by an Expedition of 12,000 of the choicest troops of the Empire. What he desired information upon chiefly now had reference to the position of the town and garrison of Kassala. There were 25,000 human beings at Kassala, for whose safety Her Majesty's Government were responsible; but it would seem that they had been deliberately abandoned by the policy of the Government to massacre and slavery. It had been stated in "another place," by an important Member of the Government, that Kassala was "outside the sphere of the operations of Her Majesty's troops." But Kassala could be relieved from Suakin or from Massowah; and if this great Expedition of 12,000 men, embracing a considerable contingent from Her Majesty's Indian Army, was to have any practical result whatever, it was clear that the relief of Kassala ought to be included in its operations. He had stated that Her Majesty's Government were responsible for the present condition of Kassala. It would be remembered that, owing to the policy pursued by the Ministry, the Egyptian Army was partially destroyed, and subsequently disbanded; so that the only means by which the Khedive could have relieved the suffering garrison of Kassala was destroyed by the operations of Her Majesty's Government. By an act of policy, for which the Government were clearly responsible, they had prevented the Khedive from obtaining that assistance from his Sovereign, the Sultan of Turkey, which he was anxious to obtain, which he asked to be allowed to obtain, and which would have enabled the garrisons in the Eastern Soudan to have been relieved in time and with success. Very piteous appeals were now coming from Suakin and Massowah in regard to the 25,000 persons whose lives were at stake; and yet precisely the same policy was being pursued by Her Majesty's Ministers which had been so fatal in the case of Sinkat, Berber, and Khartoum. There had been the same warnings in regard to Kassala which they had had in reference to Sinkat and Berber last February and March; and yet the Government were absolutely taking no steps whatever for the relief of these 25,000 persons. Indeed, a Member of Her Majesty's Government in "another place" was not ashamed to state that measures for the relief of Kassala were outside the sphere of the operations of Her Majesty's troops. He ventured to think that that statement was the death warrant of those 25,000 people in Kassala, or a large portion of them. Hitherto every garrison which had fallen, and every town which had been taken by the Mahdi, had been given over to inhuman butchery. "No!" He should like to know when there had been an exception? [Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL: At Khartoum.] The hon. Gentleman opposite said "Khartoum;" but the evidence was very strong indeed that the taking of Khartoum by the Forces of the Mahdi resulted in a scene of horrible carnage and butchery. The evidence to that effect was overwhelmingly strong—namely, that all those who had been faithful to General Gordon and had assisted him in his defence of Khartoum were ruthlessly slaughtered. It was known that 5,000 persons were massacred at Berber. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] The Prime Minister gave an indignant protest; but General Gordon stated this distinctly in one of his despatches. [Mr. GLADSTONE again dissented.] What evidence could satisfy the Prime Minister? What evidence had the Government to the contrary? What evidence would they put against the statement of General Gordon, who was nearer the scene of operations than anybody else, and had the best means of obtaining information? It was well known that Berber was taken by storm, and they knew that there were large masses of refugees there, besides the garrison, and that those who were not given over to massacre had been sold into slavery. He should like to know what evidence Her Majesty's Government could produce in refutation of that statement? The evidence was perfectly clear that what happened at Sinkat, where the entire Force was slaughtered, had also taken place at Berber, where, to quote Gordon's own words, "5,000 were massacred." And what happened at Khartoum? There, again, the evidence was conclusive that the garrison and the inhabitants who were friendly to General Gordon met a similar fate. It had been clearly shown, from their past policy, that Her Majesty's Government were responsible for the safety of these towns, and for the disasters which had happened. The Prime Minister was peculiarly responsible, because it was his declarations in regard to the abandonment of the Soudan which had led to all these misfortunes. Very remarkable indeed was the information which came the other day from Cairo, and which was well worthy the attention of the right hon. Gentleman. It came from The Times Correspondent, who stated that—

"Two tribes in the neighbourhood of Korti recently friendly, have declared for the Mahdi. This change, necessitating our retirement to Dongola, is the first direct result of Mr. Gladstone's fatal declaration, which has increased 50 per cent the difficulties of our task and the dangers of our troops. Lord Wolseley's sensible speech to General Gordon's men was an unavailing effort to counteract the effect of that declaration. With some pardonable excitement, the persons in Cairo who have relations and friends in the British Forces ask whether nothing can be done to prevent the safety of our troops from being imperilled by the acts of the English Cabinet."

The speech in question was one in which Lord Wolseley assured the Soudanese troops that Her Majesty's Government intended to retake Khartoum and destroy the Mahdi, and, if necessary, they would remain there for 100 years. No one could blame Lord Wolseley, in the difficult position in which he found himself, for using language which might, perhaps, seem to hon. Members living in security here somewhat hyperbolic and strained. It was, however, no doubt, language that it was necessary to use in order to counteract the injurious effects of the statements of the Prime Minister. It was curious and remarkable how the same fatal effect had been produced at Suakin with regard to the fate and fortunes of the garrison of Kassala by the rash words of the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. GLADSTONE: What words?

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: The words were not referred to directly in the despatch; but he had not the slightest doubt that it meant the statement of the Prime Minister on the opening day of the present Sitting after the holidays, when he said that the Government still adhered to their policy of the evacuation or the abandonment of the Soudan. This the right hon. Gentleman afterwards endeavoured to explain away, or walk round, by stating that he did not mean abandonment.

MR. GLADSTONE: I never said it at all.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, that he certainly should be sorry indeed to do what the right hon. Gentleman did, and endeavour to make it appear that the important utterances he had delivered in the House had no meaning whatever. It would be in the recollection of the House that on the first night of the Session the Prime Minister stated that the Government still adhered to the policy of evacuation or abandonment. It would also be in the distinct recollection of the House that on a later occasion, to the intense surprise of hon. Members, the right hon. Gentleman stated that he had never referred to the evacuation of the Soudan by the British troops, but that he only meant the evacuation of Egypt.

MR. GLADSTONE: I shall be obliged if the hon. Gentleman, when he chooses to make references to what has fallen from me, will not make every one of those references substantially inaccurate.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he would repeat his statement in order that it might be substantially verified. It was that on the first night of the Session the Prime Minister said that the Government still adhered to their original and consistent policy of evacuation. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) was in the recollection of the House. On a subsequent occasion, three or four days later, when the attention of the right hon. Gentleman was called to the speech, the right hon. Gentleman said that he had never alluded to the policy of evacuation by the British troops, but that he had only spoken of the policy of evacuation by Egypt. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) was quite prepared to submit the substantial accuracy of these quotations to subsequent verification by the right hon. Gentleman, or by hon. Gentlemen who so rashly cheered him from below the Gangway. There was another statement, to which he desired to call attention, which coincided with the passage he had just read from Cairo. A telegram sent by the Correspondent of The Standard from Suakin on the 22nd of February said that—“Mr. Gladstone's statement in Parliament that the Government was still determined, after marching to Khartoum, to evacuate the Soudan, has created something like consternation both among the English and Natives here. There is a unanimity of feeling of absolute amazement that the English Government can be ignorant of the effect which such premature pledges must have in stultifying all the strenuous efforts of our agents, who have for months been striving, by dint of cautious and laborious diplomacy, to strengthen the allegiance of the friendly tribes, and to prevent the waverers from openly joining the enemy. . . . The determination expressed to crush the Mahdi is altogether overshadowed in the Native mind by that to abandon the Soudan. The news known here to-day will be carried to-morrow across the Desert. In 10 days it will be known at Berber and Khartoum, and throughout the whole of the Valley of the Upper Nile, and will be a direct incitement on the part of the English Government to every tribe in the Soudan to rise on the flanks and rear of our little Army there, for it is a notice that all who take our part or show us friendship will be finally abandoned to the vengeance of the Mahdi. The most intense bitterness is felt and expressed by officers and men here. They feel that the Government has thus once more, at a critical moment, increased the difficulties and dangers of their arduous undertaking, and has added one more to the series of blunders which will have to be retrieved by their life-blood. The declaration last year that the Soudan was to be abandoned doomed General Gordon's mission to failure, and cost him his life. The consequences of the reiteration of that pledge to-day are likely to prove scarcely less disastrous.”

Already it was reported that Osman Digna was receiving large reinforcements, partly from Khartoum and partly from the wavering tribes. Whatever the real meaning of the declaration was, its effect upon the position of our Forces on the Nile under Lord Wolseley, and at Suakin under General Graham, was undoubted. Osman Digna had now advanced to such a pitch of boldness that he had summoned our officer at Suakin to surrender, and had announced that the garrison of Kassala was on the point of falling. With Kassala would go 4,000 brave troops, who had defended themselves for 12 months, and 25,000 helpless people, to whom General Gordon, in the name of Her Majesty, had repeatedly promised assistance and rescue. Under the pretence of relieving, Her Majesty's Government had made a ridiculous and abortive Treaty with the King of Abyssinia, for the carrying out of which not a single step had been taken. If this Expedition of 12,000 British and Indian troops, now being sent at an unreasonable period to Suakin, was not to effect the relief of Kassala, he would like to know for what purpose this enormous sacrifice of blood and treasure was being undertaken? If the garrison and the whole population of 25,000 persons shared the fate of Sinkat, Berber, and Khartoum, he, for one, would not be responsible. "Oh!" He considered that every Member of the House had some responsibility in the matter. It was to acquit himself of what he admitted to be a very small and insignificant portion of the common responsibility, but which was a responsibility that he felt and appreciated, that he had risen to call the attention of Her Majesty's Ministers, of Parliament, and of the country to this cruel betrayal of a large garrison and population, for the safety of whom Her Majesty's Ministers had made themselves directly answerable. The same Correspondent from whom he had already quoted stated—

"Kassala is the second city of the Sudan. It contains a population of at least 20,000 souls, and is the key-stone of the line of Frontier strongholds, Senheit, Amadih, Ghira, and Gullabat, all of which are still resisting the Mahdi's power. The city has now been completely isolated for 12 months, and its garrison of 3,000 Regular Egyptian troops and 2,000 irregulars has maintained an heroic resistance, second only to that which Khartoum, animated by the presence and spirit of General Gordon, opposed to the enemy. The supplies of provisions and ammunition have for a long time been known to be running short."

And he went on to point out how it might be relieved—

"By one of two alternatives. If, as is now talked of, a portion of our Expedition lands at Trinkitat, and occupies Tokar, a flying column must be sent South to scour the country, disperse and put down the Hadendawas, and re-open communications between the Frontier strongholds and the sea. Unless one or other of these alternatives is adopted, the splendid defence which Kassala has made will be thrown away, the garrison sacrificed, and Gordon's pledged word, that the garrison should be relieved, dishonoured."

The writer went on to point out how Colonel Chernaide's efforts for the relief of the city had been rendered nugatory. He said—

"The unexpected appearance of the Italians upon the scene has, however, paralysed his efforts, as in the face of a foreign occupation of Massowah he can no longer speak with the authority of the representative of the paramount Power. His measures for the relief of the garrison are, therefore, entirely at a standstill."

Kassala was on an extended line of Frontier, along which the Native Tribes were still resisting the Mahdi's power, and for such resistance would be subjected by him, if defeated, to barbarous treatment. He should probably be told by the Government that the difficulties in the way of relief were enormous and insuperable; but he would ask hon. Members seriously to consider how long it had been impossible for well-equipped and well-led British troops to march 260 miles to the relief of the threatened city? It was only 250 miles from Suakin to Berber. From Trinkitat to Kassala was only 60 or 70 miles further than the advance which Sir Herbert Stewart made from Korti to Metammeh without any of the serious difficulties which General Stewart had to encounter, except the presence of the Arabs. It might be undertaken by a General of fair ability without the assistance of a single British soldier. With 3,000 camels a force could be concentrated at Trinkitat or Massowah which would be able to relieve Kassala within a month. He believed there were many Members of the House who would be willing to undertake the Expedition. He did not think that any high military authority, if asked his opinion, would say that it would be a difficult or an impracticable operation. The road which would have to be followed was far better supplied with water than the route between Suakin and Berber, and from Massowah it passed through a fairly fertile country. He thanked the Committee for its kindness in having allowed him to make this protest. Of course, if Her Majesty's Ministers, on the responsibility of their position, said that this large grant of money was necessary in the pursuance of the policy which they considered to be for the interest of the country, he, for one, would not feel himself justified in opposing by his vote the demand which was made upon the Committee that night. At the same time, he must offer the strongest and most emphatic protest against the abandonment of the City of Kassala; and he trusted that the great Expedition which was now massing at Suakin would not, by the want of any foresight or courage on the part of Her Majesty's Ministers, be made so absolutely fruitless, wanton, and wicked, as the Expedition of General Graham to Suakin was made last year by the same instrumentality. He did not wish to be misunderstood in regard to what he said upon that point. He threw no blame upon General Graham, or upon the gallant soldiers who fought under him. They did their duty gallantly and well; but what he did say was, that after Ministers had fought the two bloody battles of El Teb and Tamai, which caused the massacre of 6,000 Arabs and 200 British soldiers, then to withdraw their Forces at the very moment that the fruits of victory might have been secured, by opening the road from Suakin to Berber for the relief of Khartoum, was a cruel and wanton waste of life, and it was entirely owing to the weakness and the cowardice of Her Majesty's Government. It was not fear of the Arabs, or of danger to our troops, which caused the recall of General Graham's Army last March, but it was the fear which Her Majesty's Government entertained of the action of hon. Members below the Gangway. It was a little splutter of Radical agitation, which broke out at the time, that caused Her Majesty's Government to waver, hesitate, and ultimately to retreat. It was that which had deprived the country of all the fruits of that campaign, besides leading to a wicked and wanton sacrifice of life. He hoped a similar course would not be pursued again with regard to the operations of General Graham's new Force. He trusted that there would not be a repetition of the policy of the Government after El Teb; that there would be no more useless smashing of Osman Digna, and then the abandonment of all the fruits of the victory. Such a feeble and pointless course would involve the sacrifice of the garrison of Kassala, and the throwing over of the Soudan to cruel anarchy and fanatical barbarism. Unless Her Majesty's Ministers would undertake to adopt for the future a more manly and more statesmanlike policy than they had pursued in the past, there would be ample justification for opposing the Vote.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE desired, as a point of Order, to ask in what way the Vote would be put to the Committee. He understood that it was one Vote, that being divided into sections, and that each section would be put in order.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Vote before the Committee is the Vote for men, and not for money.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he gathered from what the Chairman had just stated that the 3,000 men to be voted were to be added to the Army. If they were told that this increase of the Army was necessary under ordinary circumstances for the defence of the country, or for the manning of their garrisons abroad, he thought there would be a fair case for considering the demand; but the Vote was deliberately asked for on account of the military operations that were now taking place in the Soudan. It was because they had had a considerable number of their soldiers occupied in maintaining order in Egypt that they had engaged in this Expedition to the Soudan. The noble Marquess anticipated that 12,000 men would be sent out—if, indeed, they had not already been sent out—to the Soudan, in order to effect some sort of operation against the Arabs in the neighbourhood of Suakin. He gathered from the noble Marquess that the object of this Expedition was to prevent the troops of Osman Digna from being in a position to attack Lord Wolseley. Then it was quite obvious that if Lord Wolseley would only retreat from the position he occupied to Wady Halfa these additional men would not be required. These 12,000 men were sent out to do what was done some time ago—namely, to massacre the Arabs assembled in the neighbourhood of Suakin. He could quite understand the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government if they had adopted the policy of the Opposition, and really intended to advance to Khartoum, and to undertake what had been called the civilization of the country—that was to say, to seize upon the country and open it out to British trade, so that English goods might be sold, and the blessings of civilization spread abroad. That, however, was not the object of the Government. He doubted whether they really intended to go to Khartoum. At first it was said that the intention was to occupy Khartoum and to overthrow the Mahdi; but that had been reduced now by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War to a possible contingency of some kind. The noble Marquess said that certainly it was possible they might ultimately advance to Khartoum; but he by no means declared positively that they should ever go there. Certainly, if he Mr. Labouchere thought so he would oppose the Vote. But having, practically, no intention, even if they did advance to Khartoum, of holding the country, he could not understand on what possible grounds the House of Commons ought to be asked to vote this money and these men. The Government seemed to have no policy whatever, except that of tiding over the momentary difficulty; and, under these circumstances, he would certainly divide the Committee against the Vote.

SIR WALTER B. BARTHELOT said, he should like to make a few remarks upon what had been stated by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War. He was glad to hear the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), because he thought no one could, and no one would, deny that it was by the reckless statements of the Prime Minister and the Government, with regard to the abandonment of the Sudan, that all the massacres to which the hon. Member had referred had taken place. Upon the Prime Minister's head especially would rest the indelible disgrace of having made a statement which absolutely caused those massacres, without taking any steps at the time to relieve the garrisons. He was glad that the question had again been raised. After the massacre of Hicks Pasha's Army not a step was taken, except to send from Cairo Baker Pasha and his Army, although the men composing that Force, mostly police, were known to be almost utterly untrustworthy. It suffered the same fate as the Army of Hicks Pasha. Then, again, the Government were too late, although knowing well what the consequences would be, in sending relief to General Gordon. Instead of sending forward the Army of General Graham after the two great battles of El Teb and Tamai, they withdrew it; and what had been the consequence? A series of small, but most irritating attacks, increasing in boldness, month by month, on Suakin. Osman Digna and his Force had now become so intolerable that the same work had now to be done over again solely in consequence of the irresolution and incapacity of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to grapple with the actual facts of the position as they existed at the time. The Prime Minister would never, in future history, get out of the grave responsibility he had incurred by his want of forethought and foresight in going from one position to another without considering what would be the consequence of each step he took. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War began by stating that this Expedition had only cost, up to the present time, £1,300,000. If that was the case, all he could say was that the work had been done far more economically than anyone would have given the noble Marquess the credit for. He fancied, however, that when the account came in, the House would find that the country would have to pay a far larger sum than that calculated by the noble Marquess. Last year, in the Autumn Session, when the £1,000,000 in addition to the £300,000 previously voted was asked for, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that that sum would be amply sufficient. He had asked, and hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House had asked, the right hon. Gentleman whether he was sure that that sum would be sufficient to carry him to the end of the year? In reply the right hon. Gentleman said that the Expedition was a very cheap one, and that it would cost very little more. Nevertheless, they had now to consider an addition of nearly £1,000,000 to the £1,300,000 already granted; and he fancied that when the total account came in hereafter there would be a still larger sum to be provided for.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON wished to be allowed to explain. There would be no addition, as far as the Government were aware, to the cost of the Nile Expedition beyond the sum already voted.

SIR WALTER B. BARTHELOT said, that the sum contained in the Supplementary Estimates was for operations in the Sudan.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes; for new operations.

SIR WALTER B. BARTHELOT: "For new operations." That showed clearly that when the Government commenced their operations they had not the slightest notion of what was going to happen. They thought it was going to be a mere walk-over, and that they would be able to do the same as was done at Tel-el-Kebir, and that the whole of the Army would be brought back again at very little cost, and with only a small sacrifice of life. Then the noble Marquess stated that he acquitted the Army of all blame for the failure of the Expedition. The noble Marquess had paid a just tribute to the honour and credit of that most gallant Army; and whatever they might think about other circumstances, there was one thing of which they were all, as Englishmen, proud; and that was the manner in which the Army, from the General down to the drummer boy, had discharged the onerous and difficult duties they had been called on to perform. But although the noble Marquess might acquit the Army of any blame for the failure of the Expedition, they could not acquit the Government. The Prime Minister told them the other day that he and his Colleagues were nearly three months in making up their minds whether the Expedition should go by the Nile, or from Suakin to Berber. Those three fatal months of delay had ruined the whole of the enterprize, and had made it an absolute failure.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was sure the hon. and gallant Member did not wish him to re-state the case; but the three months to which he had referred were anterior to the decision to send the Expedition at all.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, it was true they were anterior to the absolute decision; but the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, as he understood it, was this—that it was decided after the Vote of Censure was placed on the Paper, and after the right hon. Gentleman had only a small majority in his favour. It was then that the right hon. Gentleman stated that the Government had had the case before them, and that the conflicting evidence was so great that they could not make up their minds, although this happened in May, until the 8th of August. He believed the 8th of August was the day; and, consequently, for three months the Government were hesitating and doubting, although the right hon. Gentleman had solemnly pledged his word, as Prime Minister of this country, that he was responsible for the safety of General Gordon. That was a position which he did not envy the right hon. Gentleman. The Expedition was sent; and the Committee knew how it toiled up the Nile. They also knew that it was too late, and the greatest hero of this country had been killed. They further knew that this result was produced by the hesitation of the Government, who had fatally delayed sending out the Expedition, which otherwise would have been in time to relieve Khartoum. They were told, as a sort of excuse, that treachery might have taken place at any time; but all who were acquainted with the history of the Expedition knew that treachery could not have taken place at that particular time. As a matter of fact, the treachery could not have occurred until Omdurman was taken by the Mahdi, and until the tribes had closed in upon Khartoum to such an extent that there was little or no hope of the escape of General Gordon and his followers unless they received relief from this country. He did not wish to go over the sad and melancholy circumstances which had already been discussed by the House. He would only add one word—that although Lord Wolseley and his gallant Army had done their best, the Government had failed, and failed signally, to do their part. And now it was found that they were to have a new Expedition, consisting of 12,000 men, sent to Suakin. He was glad that that Expedition had been sent there; but he thought they ought to hear a good deal more as to what was to be the outcome of it. They ought to know, and he thought the Government were bound to tell them, whether they meant to do more than smash the Mahdi and Osman Digna—whether it was mere revenge, or whether they meant to hold the country, as they ought to do, in the interests of the peace of Egypt? In voting this extra number of men they ought to have a clear and definite idea of what the Government meant to do. They know perfectly well what they had done in the past. They could only judge of them by what they had done in the past. The House could have no confidence that they would do in the future that which was for the best interests of this country, unless they distinctly pledged themselves, and told the House in plain language from the Treasury Benches what it was they intended to perform. They had said that if Afghanistan was invaded it would be a cause of war with Russia. That was a distinct statement made from the Treasury Bench; and it satisfied the nation. But what the House wanted to know in regard to this question was more than that. They wanted to know whether the Government meant to carry out the policy with which they originally went to Egypt—namely, that a good Government should be established in Egypt, and that that Government should be under the control of this country? If they were not to have that good Government established under the control of England, then he should like to know why all this blood and treasure was to be wasted? They had a right to ask this; and they had a right before the debate closed to know what the principles were on which the Government were now proposing to act. Did they mean to remain in Egypt? Did they mean to hold certain portions of the Soudan—such, for instance, as that in which the railway was about to be made? Was it to be a permanent railway, or was it to be handed over to the Mahdi, or any other adventurer who went there after we returned? Those were questions which he thought deserved, and ought to receive, a serious answer from Her Majesty's Government. Would the Government assure them, as they had done with regard to Afghanistan, that they had a policy, and that they meant to carry it out? If they would give the House that assurance, there was no money for which they might ask which the Opposition would not be ready to grant them.

Sir JOHN LUBBOCK said, he regretted the attack which the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had made, very unjustly, in his opinion, upon the Prime Minister. He did not propose, however, to follow the hon. and gallant Gentleman in the remarks he had made. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, who moved the Resolution before the Committee, had told them that it did not absolutely commit the House to any policy whatever; but he thought hon. Members must all feel that every Vote and every Resolution passed made it harder to draw back afterwards. It seemed to him that the Resolution of that evening was committing the country to an enterprise arduous and, as he thought, unjustifiable. Although they had had a debate on the question a short time ago, no one, he thought, could complain that it should be raised again when they were asked for a grant, because no one could doubt that the new policy on which it would appear they were about to embark would involve momentous consequences, while it would be an entire departure from the principles which Her Majesty's Ministers had hitherto advocated, and which the nation adopted at the last General Election by so large a majority. He said that this was a departure from the previous policy of Her Majesty's Government; and in proof of that he might refer to the declaration of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War. Speaking in February last year, he said—

"I am prepared to maintain that the policy of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the Soudan is a right policy. I hold that our policy of non-interference in the affairs of the Soudan is a right policy."—(3 Hansard, [1884] 1433)

And why did he consider that this was the right policy for us to adopt? "Because," he continued—

"We have no British interests in the Soudan, there are no European interests in the Soudan, at least no adequate British or European interests, which would justify the employment of British Forces or the expenditure of British resources."—(Ibid. 1434.)

The Prime Minister himself said, in the same debate—

"The Soudan is a vast country, equal in size to France, Germany, and Spain—a desert country with a deadly climate, inhabited thinly by sparse and warlike tribes . . . They love it as their country . . . We have refused—and I believe the House will approve our refusing—to have anything to do with the re-conquest of the Soudan."—(Ibid. 715.)

"It was estimated that 100,000 Egyptians had laid down their lives in endeavouring to maintain that barren conquest."

If the barren—the worse than barren—conquest of the Soudan cost the lives of 100,000 Egyptians, of men themselves natives of a hot country, accustomed to the dry and torrid climate of Africa, what number of Englishmen might they not sacrifice—men accustomed to the cool, moist, and comparatively equable climate of these Islands? If, indeed, they were going to hold Khartoum and the country round, the case might be different. They would, at least, give the people peace and security. But the Prime Minister himself had declared against this. He had expressed his conviction that—

“It was impossible to hold the Soudan in any manner tolerably satisfactory, and that consequently it was our duty to speak frankly and boldly upon the matter, because the Soudan had assumed a question, not of £100,000 a-year, as was the old story; but it had assumed a character such as to make it evident that if the struggle were to be continued, it would suck the life blood from the heart of Egypt.”—(Ibid. 718.)

Yes; and it had assumed such a character now, that if they engaged in this terrible and ruinous enterprize it would “suck the life blood from the heart” of England. What did General Gordon himself think on this subject? Just before he started for Khartoum he placed his opinions solemnly on record. Speaking of good government in the Soudan, he said—

“It is evident that this we cannot secure without an inordinate expenditure of men and money. . . . The Soudan is a useless possession. It ever was so and ever will be so. . . . It is larger than Germany, France, and Spain together. It cannot be governed except by a dictator, who may be good or bad; and if bad he will cause constant revolt. No one who has ever lived in the Soudan can escape the reflection what a useless possession is this land. Few men, also, can stand its fearful monotony and its deadly climate. Therefore, I think the Government are fully justified in recommending its evacuation. The sacrifices necessary towards securing good government are far too numerous to admit of such an attempt being made. Indeed, one may say it is impracticable at any cost.”

On this attempt, which General Gordon said could not be made “without an inordinate expenditure of men and money,” which might, indeed, be said to be “impracticable at any cost,” they were now about to embark. Perhaps, however, he should be told that since those opinions were expressed circumstances had altered. Yes; they had altered indeed. At that time Gordon himself was alive; at that time the tribes of the Soudan were disorganized; they had no single leader; they were but ill supplied with arms; the fortifications and arsenals of Khartoum were at our disposal. That was all changed now. General Gordon was, alas! no more; the tribes were united; they had an able leader; they occupied the fortifications of Khartoum, and had secured the immense stores of arms and ammunition which it contained. Was this enterprize, then, any easier now? was it likely to be any less bloody—any less costly? He did not doubt that they could take and hold Khartoum; but that was not their policy, nor would that overthrow the Mahdi. He would probably retire South. Were they going to follow him further still into the heart of Africa? Could the right hon. Gentleman give any idea of what this new policy was to cost them? He was informed that every English soldier involved an expenditure of £70 per month, or at the rate of over £800 a-year for every soldier sent there. They read every day of hundreds of camels here and hundreds of camels there. [An hon. MEMBER: Thousands.] Well, thousands; and everyone who had been in the East could imagine what a frightful expenditure that must involve. Let the Committee consider for a moment how much good could be effected if these vast sums were spent usefully at home, instead of being squandered abroad. Let him also beg hon. Members to consider what were the circumstances under which they were going to engage the nation in this terrible enterprize. Their National Expenditure already amounted to nearly £100,000,000. They were told that they must spend several millions on their Navy if they were to maintain their supremacy at sea. Their Army had already as much to do as it could undertake. South Africa was still a constant drain on their resources; France was jealous and irritated; Germany angry; and though they might feel that that arose from misunderstanding, and might justly hope that mutual explanations might restore the cordial feelings which ought to exist between two nations who had so much in common, still no one could have read the Blue Books and not see how serious the present state of things was. As to their relations with Russia, it would be just now impolitic to speak. Surely, then, this was not a moment when they should send their troops away to the far South, and squander their resources in fruitless war. But then, it was sometimes said that their troops were in such a position that it was easier to advance than to retreat. Of that, however, they had no evidence whatever. Lord Wolseley, so far as they know, had never expressed any such opinion. He placed, as the right hon. Gentleman had told them, two military plans before the Government—one to be adopted if they determined to go to Khartoum and overthrow the Mahdi, the other if they did not. They adopted the former; and that conclusively proved that, if they did go to Khartoum, it was not for military considerations, but in order to overthrow the Mahdi. Nor could it be maintained that they must attack the Mahdi to prevent the Mahdi from attacking them. What did the Prime Minister himself say when that very argument was used last May by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach)? He said that the right hon. Baronet used the argument that unless the Army of the Mahdi was—

"Put down in the Sudan, it will advance on Egypt. . . . To keep it out of Egypt it is necessary to put it down in the Sudan; and that is the task the right hon. Baronet desires to saddle upon England. Now, I tell hon. Gentlemen this—that that task no one the reconquest of the Sudan. I put aside for the moment all considerations of climate, of distance, of difficulties, of the enormous charges, and all the frightful loss of life. There is something worse than that involved in the plan of the right hon. Gentleman. It would be a war of conquest against a people struggling to be free, and rightly struggling to be free." (Hansard, 1884-5, 31-2)

In a later portion of the same speech the right hon. Gentleman said—

"The right hon. Gentleman declared that the movement of the Mahdi must be put down by England sooner or later, and, as I understood him, and I do not think he will deny it, he has said that the sooner it was put down the easier would it be to do so. In other words, the right hon. Gentleman advises us to carry the line of conquest by British and Christian arms among the Mohammedan people struggling for their liberties in the Sudan." (Ibid. 30-1)

Well, but the policy which the right hon. Baronet opposite advised last May, and which the Government then eloquently denounced, was just what they were now themselves undertaking. It had been argued by one high Indian authority that they ought at any cost to overthrow the Mahdi in order to maintain their prestige in India. But against that view they might quote another high Indian authority, Sir William Gregory, who had taken exactly the opposite line, and considered that in this struggle to crush a Mohammedan

Power they would run a great risk of alienating their Mahomedan fellow-countrymen in India. But even suppose the first view correct, would their prestige suffer less if they evacuated Khartoum next year or the year after? Moreover, could anyone calmly and on reflection justify such a policy? He would say nothing of their own sacrifices; but to carry fire and bloodshed through the Sudan, to burn the villages, to ravage the crops, to fill up the wells, to destroy the humble homes, to reduce women and children to beggary and starvation, to slaughter thousands of miserable Natives in the heart of Africa, in order to produce a sensation in India, was a policy too heartless, too cynical—he might say too wicked—to contemplate. That this should be done in the name of England was almost incredible; and he felt satisfied it was a policy which before long the heart and conscience of England would indignantly repudiate. Why had these unfortunate people risen in arms? Had they had no cause? Had they had nothing to complain of? He admitted that until now our conscience was clear. Our earnest wishes had been for their welfare; our desire had been to assist them in securing a good Government. But as things were now, the best way to do that was to let them alone. Why should we overthrow the Ruler they had chosen, and put up someone else in his place? He should have thought we had by now felt the folly—he might say the impossibility—of imposing puppet Rulers on unwilling subjects. They had, indeed, been at war with the Mahdi; but surely they could afford to be generous. The Sudanese rose to fight for their liberties. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War last year expressed the opinion, which he said was that "of almost everyone who had written on the Sudan," that—

"The revolt of the Mahdi and the tribes who have rallied to him was justified by the oppression which they had suffered from Egyptian officials, and by the oppression of Egyptian troops. I do not say that the misgovernment of the Sudan by the Egyptian Government was wild or intended."—3Hansard, (1884) 1458-9.)

The Prime Minister expressed himself in almost identical terms. He said that to send a British Army into the Sudan

"Would be a war of conquest against a people struggling to be free. Yes," he said, "there are people struggling to be free, and they are struggling rightly to be free."—(3 Hansard, [288] 55)

Yet the Government were calling on them now to enter on this terrible and ruinous undertaking, to squander millions of English money, and sacrifice thousands of English lives, and all for what? To overthrow a people who he himself said were struggling rightly to be free. To have sent General Gordon to Khartoum might have been a mistake; but, if so, it was a generous error; it was a policy which had entailed on them heavy sacrifices, but of which, as a nation, they had at least no cause to be ashamed. But what should be their policy now? To put down these tribes struggling, as the right hon. Gentleman said—and struggling rightly—for their freedom, was a policy unworthy of England, which he believed the people of England would not support. The object of Lord Wolseley's Expedition was to rescue their heroic countryman. Under these circumstances it had the almost unanimous approval of the country. But what was our policy now? According to the instructions communicated to Lord Wolseley—

"The primary object of the Expedition up the Valley of the Nile is to bring away General Gordon and Colonel Stewart from Khartoum. When that object has been secured no further offensive operations of any kind are to be undertaken."

Now, why should we not adhere to the policy thus laid down? If we now undertook offensive operations, would it not be said, and said naturally, that the safety of General Gordon and Colonel Stewart could not really have been our primary object. Let the Government determine what were to be the future frontiers of Egypt, and then announce to the Native Tribes that while they would not interfere with them beyond those limits, leaving them free to govern themselves according to their own ideas, any attack by them would be resisted by the whole power of England. That would be a policy which could be justified, and which the country would support; but it was contrary to all the principles of the Liberal Party, and contrary to all principles of equity and justice, that the Government should use the might of England to conquer and overthrow a brave people to whose allegiance they had no claim, and who were struggling for freedom and independence.

Sir John Lubbock

MR. CHAPLIN: Sir, the hon. Baronet has drawn a picture of the results of the policy of Her Majesty's Government as heartrending and horrible as it is possible to conceive. "That policy," said the hon. Baronet, "is a policy unworthy of England, which will not continue to be supported, and which I am certain before long the people of England will denounce." Then, why did the hon. Baronet support it himself? [Sir John Lubbock: No.] The hon. Baronet says he does not support it; but it is within my own recollection and I believe I am not wrong in saying that when the question as to the policy of Her Majesty's Government was a few nights ago submitted to the House of Commons, the hon. Baronet voted with the supporters of the Government. The Government, however, need not be alarmed at the threats or menaces of the hon. Baronet, for, blatant as he may be against the Government in debate in the House of Commons, they have no more obsequious follower when it comes to the vote. The hon. Baronet commenced his observations by complaining of the attack made by the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) upon the policy of the Prime Minister; but I am bound to say that I consider that the complaint was exceedingly out of place. I understood my hon. and gallant Friend to be endorsing the observations of my hon. Friend the Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett). Whatever may be the opinions of hon. Members on that side of the House as to the general political views of the hon. Member for Eye, I think that both sides of the House that afternoon must have sympathized with my hon. Friend's feeling and generous utterances on behalf of the garrison of Kassala, and I am therefore somewhat surprised at the reception which those observations met with on that side of the House. I recollect that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister last Session rebuked me because I put to the Government some Questions with regard to the garrison of Sinkat; the right hon. Gentleman then told us that it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to have regard to the safety of all the garrisons in the Sudan. How has the right hon. Gentleman discharged that duty? We appealed in vain to the right hon. Gentleman with regard to Sinkat and Tokar, with the result that is but too well known; and although I sympathize with the generous aspirations of the hon. Member for Eye, I am afraid that, owing to the delay of the Government, it will be with the garrison of Kasala the same as with the garrisons of Sinkat and Tokar, and that the Government will be too late again. In the few observations I desire to submit to the Committee, I would gladly join in the tribute which the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War has paid to our Forces in the Soudan. Seldom or never, I imagine, have English Forces been placed in positions of greater danger, difficulty, and hardship than they have been called upon to occupy, and nothing can exceed the gallantry and heroism with which they have performed their duty on every occasion. But the noble Marquess made use of one observation which I cannot allow to pass without comment. The noble Marquess said that he entirely acquitted the General and soldiers of blame for having failed in their object.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I said that not only did we entirely acquit them of any blame for the failure of the chief object of the Expedition, but that the country was under the greatest possible obligations to them for what they had done.

MR. CHAPLIN: Quite so. The noble Marquess says that he acquits them of all blame for the failure that has taken place. But why on earth should the question of blame to the Forces have arisen in the mind of any human being? I think, Sir, it must be the uneasy conscience of the noble Marquess which caused the idea to enter his mind. There is much blame in this matter; but whatever blame there is attaches not to Lord Wolseley, or to our Forces in the Soudan, but to the Government for their delay in taking action, which I believe has been the sole cause of the failure to which the noble Marquess alludes. Passing to the general observations of the noble Marquess, if I may be allowed to make a criticism on the subject, I should say that his speech is a speech of "probabilities." The noble Marquess said that the Estimates now before us were for this object: they were to be for the continuation and the probable extension of the operations under Lord Wolse-

ley. And what is the object of these operations? They are to be for the advance on and recapture of Khartoum, which might ultimately be "probably" necessary. Now, I venture to think that this language points to a very great and remarkable change in the attitude of the Government, and, in my opinion, it imposes on us the duty of being more than ever careful in examining the Estimate now submitted, and the policy of the Government so far as it is now shadowed forth. Now, the noble Marquess has told us the proposals of the Government in regard to railways in the Soudan. It appears that we are to have two railways instead of one. We are to have a railway from Suakin on the one hand, and we are to have a railway along the Nile on the other. I have from the first always had very grave doubts, resting on the best information I could obtain, as to the wisdom or expediency of making a railway from Suakin to Berber. The Committee will remember that the Government were totally unable to put before Parliament any Estimate whatever of the probable cost of such a line, or of the probable time within which it could be completed; and there can be no doubt as to the enormous difficulties which would attend on the construction of this railway. There is the difficulty of obtaining water. The noble Marquess said nothing about that. We read all kinds of reports and rumours in the newspapers on this subject. We have heard a great deal about the pumps by which water is to be supplied during the construction and maintenance of the railway, and that is a subject on which I should like to hear a little more from the noble Marquess to-night. There is the enormous difficulty of providing adequate supplies, not only for the Army which has to go in advance, but for the immense staff of working people who would be engaged in the construction of the railway; and above all this there is the fact that the line is to be made in the face of hostile forces whose numbers, although not exactly ascertainable, are known to be very large, and that the whole of it has to be made through a barren desert, and it has to cross an elevation of over 5,000 feet. Moreover, I judged from what the noble Marquess said this evening that, in the view of Her Majesty's Government, it was extremely problematical whether the railway from Suakin to Berber would be completed or not. Of course, under these circumstances, it is the duty of Members of Parliament to consider how far they will give their sanction to such an undertaking. I am bound to say, however, that the responsibility is entirely removed from our shoulders upon this occasion, because the noble Marquess stated that Lord Wolseley, after the fall of Khartoum, said it was absolutely necessary for the safety of his own Force that an Expedition should be sent from Suakin to scatter the forces of Osman Digna, who was advancing on his left, and therefore for that purpose it was necessary to make the railway. Lord Wolseley says it is necessary for the safety of the Army that there should be an advance from Suakin, and then the noble Marquess tells us, on his own responsibility as Secretary of State for War, that in his opinion there should be a railway. Under these circumstances, it is impossible for us to do anything but give our sanction to its construction. Then I come to the question of the other railway, and I think the Committee will concur in the opinion expressed by Lord Wolseley that this is the more important operation of the two. The noble Marquess, I think, the other day overrated the difficulties of the construction of that railway. I have endeavoured to obtain information since then, and I cannot but think that the noble Marquess was misinformed in what he said on that point. The noble Marquess stated that the route had been surveyed for the purpose of making the railway, which involved heavy rock-cuttings, possibly some tunnels, and a bridge or bridges across the Nile. Now, Sir, I understand that there is only one person by whom the route has been surveyed, and that is Mr. John Fowler, the eminent engineer, whose name is familiar to the House. I should like to quote two passages from the Report of the survey made by Mr. John Fowler with regard to the railroad. He says in his Report, dated 1873—

"The whole railway may be described as one of easy construction. There are no tunnels or important bridges on the line, except the bridge across the Nile at Kobi."

The noble Marquess said there were some tunnels. The Report goes on to say—

Mr. Chaplin

"By adopting gradients and curves which are suited to the peculiarities of the country and to the traffic, I have succeeded in laying out the railway so as to avoid tunnels altogether, and so that the quantity of rock-cutting is extremely small. Indeed, except the bridge across the River Nile, there is not a single considerable work on the whole line, and I see no reason why every part of the railway, except the permanent way, rolling stock, and the Nile bridge, should not be performed by Egyptians under a proper organization."

Sir, I think these extracts from Mr. John Fowler's Report justify my statement that the noble Marquess has somewhat overrated the difficulty of constructing a railway along the Nile, and, if that be so, I am inclined to cast some doubt on his further statement, that the facilities for its construction are probably less than those for the construction of a line from Suakin to Berber. I shall be glad to hear further from the noble Marquess on this point, because, if what I have read to the Committee be true, so far from the facilities for constructing the line being less than on the Suakin-Berber route, they are probably very considerably greater, and I think it will be an additional reason to justify the House of Commons in urging upon Her Majesty's Government the desirability of completing this railway along the Nile with all the despatch in their power. But if Parliament is to sanction this great expenditure, and if we are to urge the Government and encourage them to lay out railroads for the purpose of giving assistance to Lord Wolseley, I do hope that in future whatever Parliament may sanction as a means of assistance to him will not be counteracted over and over again, as it has been in the past, by the speeches of the kind which are so continually falling from Ministers. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister contradicted the hon. Member for Evesham (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), disputing the accuracy of his assertion, which was that with reference to the conduct of the tribes necessitating the retirement upon Dongola, it was the first result of—

"Mr. Gladstone's fatal declaration, which has increased 50 per cent the difficulties of our task and the dangers of our troops. Lord Wolseley's sensible speech to General Gordon's men was an unavailing effort to counteract the effect of that declaration."

The right hon. Gentleman asked the hon. Member to give him the quotation to which he referred. My hon. Friend quoted from memory, and the right hon. Gentleman taxed him with extreme inaccuracy. My hon. Friend, however, has supplied me with the exact words, and I appeal to the Committee whether my hon. Friend was not substantially correct? He referred to the speech that, I think, the right hon. Gentleman made on the opening night of the Session. In that speech were these words—

"I need only remind the House that the policy pursued by Her Majesty's Government with respect to the Sudan has always been the evacuation of the Sudan by Egypt and its restoration to freedom. That policy has received the approval of the Khedive and the present Egyptian Government, and it has undergone no change."

MR. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!

MR. CHAPLIN: "Hear, hear!" says the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, go on.

MR. CHAPLIN: That is the only quotation I have got. The right hon. Gentleman is welcome to it.

MR. GLADSTONE: It is perfectly right so far as it goes, but it is incomplete.

MR. CHAPLIN: But the right hon. Gentleman's charge against the hon. Member for Evesham was not that his quotation was incomplete, but that it was inaccurate in the extreme.

MR. GLADSTONE: And so it was.

MR. CHAPLIN: I should like to know in what respect it was inaccurate. Does the right hon. Gentleman imagine for a moment that anyone in this House or in Egypt, or even the Mahdi himself, believed when he made the statement that he had a mental reservation in favour of England? Everyone supposed—and naturally supposed as a matter of course—that the right hon. Gentleman meant the evacuation of the Sudan without any reservation whatever. I must say that the observation that fell from the hon. Member for Evesham was entirely justified by what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman in the first instance. It is impossible, in my opinion, to over estimate the mischief that was caused by declarations of that character. I need not go further for an illustration than to ask hon. Members to remember what has occurred in the House of Commons to-night. Immediately after the speech of the noble Marquess—the speech of probabilities—up got the hon. Member for Northampton Mr. Labouchere, and said, as a supporter of the Government—and his words will go all over the world and will reach the Sudan—that the Government evidently never meant to go to Khartoum at all, and he said—"I am certain they are not going there now." Nothing has been said by the right hon. Gentleman to remove that impression. I am somewhat tempted to quote other extracts to show the mischief that has been done in this matter from the first. When the policy of evacuation was first announced by the right hon. Gentleman—somewhat more than a year ago, I think—Sir Samuel Baker wrote home quoting The Standard Correspondent, the gallant but unfortunate Mr. Cameron, who met his death at Abu Klea. He said—

"The announcement by the British Government that the Sudan is to be abandoned has come like a thunder-clap on all here, and has nullified all the efforts of the past weeks."

The same gentleman says—

"The difficulties of the situation have been immensely aggravated by the announcement. On the receipt of the news, the Cadi (i.e., Chief Judge) of Suakin secretly assembled the leading Arab inhabitants and informed them that the English were going to give up the Sudan to the Mahdi; and that he should, therefore, at once go over and make friends with Osman Digna, and he strongly advised them to do the same. The same night he passed through our lines to the enemy."

Another Correspondent says—

"The news that the Khedive is ordered to abandon the Sudan has destroyed all the diplomatic arrangements made by Isker Pasha with the quasi-friendly Arab tribes."

I should also like to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, in case he has not seen it, to a paragraph which, I think, must touch his kindlier feelings, because it comes, or purports to come, from the friends and relations of the Forces in the field at the present time. The paragraph in question was communicated by the Correspondent of The Times. It says—

"With some pardonable excitement, the persons in Cairo who have relations and friends in the British Forces ask whether nothing can be done to prevent the safety of our troops from being imperilled by the acts of the English Cabinet. Differences, they urge, may exist as to the British policy or as to our humanitarian duties to the hitherto friendly tribes, but even Party exigencies may surely give place to care for the safety of our troops in the existing crisis. In our anxiety to enforce the policy of 'retire' we are likely to render the 'recue' of our troops the next task."

I would recommend that paragraph to the serious reflection of hon. Gentlemen opposite, who, consistently I admit, because they have done so from the first, have advocated a policy of "retire," and nothing else. But, Sir, with regard to the Government, I do think we may make a different appeal to them. In the interest of Lord Wolseley and in the interest of the troops themselves, I appeal to them to abstain from uncertain speeches and uncertain words, which, under all the circumstances, I can only consider as of the utmost cruelty to our Forces at the present time. Sir, so long as the Government remains a Government it is the duty of the House of Commons—and I am sure it will be the course of the Opposition—to give them every support and every assistance that is requisite and necessary for the success of our Forces in the Soudan; but if all the expenditure of blood and treasure which Parliament is ready to sanction is to be counteracted by fatal speeches of this nature, then I say, upon my responsibility as an independent Member of the House of Commons, that it will be necessary for Parliament to consider whether it will not become their duty to refuse Supplies to a Government who have proved themselves utterly incapable of dealing with the crisis which they, and they alone, have themselves created.

MR. W. FOWLER said, he only wished to say a very few words with reference to the proposal now before the Committee. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), who had just sat down, had taunted the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) with supporting the Government in the policy they had enunciated upon the Vote of Censure, and at the same time supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Newcastle. Well, he (Mr. Fowler) himself had also voted with the Government in the division on the Vote of Censure. Why had he done that? Because he had more confidence in Her Majesty's Government than in hon. Gentlemen opposite. The object of the Vote of Censure was to turn out the present Government and to bring in hon. Gentlemen opposite in their places, and he, of course, could not vote in condemnation of the policy of the Government, unless he had wished to place the Opposition in power. He had no desire to do that; but, at the same time, he did not approve of all that the Government were doing, and therefore he contended that the vote he had given had been perfectly consistent. There was another object before the Committee at the present moment, and the question was whether the object of this Vote was an object of which they could approve? What was the object of the Government? Why, plainly, it was to go on to destroy the power of the Mahdi, and to go on to Khartoum, but not to stay in it—to leave it to its inhabitants. That was a policy which he must confess he could not understand. He could understand a policy which said—"We will go to Khartoum and stay there;" and he believed that if the Government ever got to Khartoum they would stay there, because he did not believe the people of this country would ever endure their leaving Khartoum if they once got there. If they expended so much blood and treasure in getting to Khartoum they would have to stay there; and therefore it was that he so strenuously objected to the policy that the Committee were now asked to endorse. A policy which said—"We will bring back our troops, and do all that is necessary to secure their safe retirement—we will endure any sacrifice to insure their safety," he could understand; but they were asked to do a great deal more than that. They were not asked to bring the troops back, but to send them forward. Hon. Members opposite had used every exertion to induce the Government to send them forward, and hon. Members below the Gangway on the Ministerial side of the House had, on the other hand, done all they could to discourage the Government from sending forward the troops now that it was not possible to rescue General Gordon. The logical position of the Government now would be to say—"We cannot do that which we intended, and we therefore will not embark upon operations of an indefinite kind, and the end of which we cannot see." Some hon. Members opposite not only wanted the Government to go forward, but to hold the Soudan; and to that he (Mr. Fowler) was also strongly opposed. He was perfectly confident that this country was commencing an undertaking the full extent of which they were unable yet to understand. The operations they were entering upon, and the work they were setting themselves to do, was so stupendous that he absolutely dreaded to think over what it might involve in money and in blood. As he had said, if the object of the Government was to come away from the Soudan, he could understand it. In carrying out that object they would have to undertake some serious military operations; it might be that in order to get away they might have to take Berber, and to make the railway from that place to Suakin. If that were necessary, let it be done by all means; but he must protest against undertaking those operations all for nothing—for the object of going to Khartoum and then coming away, which seemed to him totally inconsistent with common sense. He was talking to a Member of the Government the other day, who had asked him—"What difficulty do you see in our going to Khartoum and coming away?" And he (Mr. Fowler) replied—"Why, Parliament will not endure such a waste of money, and the reckless murder that it would involve. It would be absurd to go to Khartoum, unless you have some object in the Expedition which you have not told us." If he were told that the Government wished to go to Khartoum in the interest of their Indian Possessions, and for the sake of their Mahomedan subjects, then he replied that the object was much too vague to justify such an expenditure. If it were said—"But we must show our power," he would reply—"But we have shown our power." Never in the whole history of the English Army had operations been undertaken and carried out in a manner more creditable to the English Force. They had shown their power, and had indicated to the whole world that they were still a great and gallant people, with immense fighting powers. It was not necessary to show that any further. Let them rather show the strength of men not afraid to be thought afraid. Strong in the power they possessed, let them also be strong enough to say—"We are not afraid to let you see that we know not only when to go on, but also when to retire." It was, in his opinion, a very important moment when the Government first heard of the death of General Gordon. The gallant General could no longer be rescued, and the Government then had the great opportunity of saying, logically and consistently—"We cannot do what we wanted to do; therefore we will do what all along it has been our policy to do—namely, leave the Soudanese to govern themselves." But the Government had lost that opportunity, and had committed themselves to a policy the end of which it was impossible to foresee. As to the fine distinction drawn by the Prime Minister with regard to Egypt in the Soudan and England in the Soudan, it was much too subtle for his poor mind. He could not understand it. They had all understood on the first night of the Session that England was going away from the Soudan. ["No, no!"] Well, at any rate, he and others had so understood it; he had understood that both Egypt and England were to retire from the Soudan. But they were told afterwards that the right hon. Gentleman had only referred to Egypt.

MR. GLADSTONE: I merely cited the words.

MR. W. FOWLER said, the effect on his mind, when he heard the words of the Prime Minister, was that it was intended to go to Khartoum and then to come away, and that both Egypt and England would then leave the Soudan to be governed by the Soudanese. Then they had the statement that only Egypt was to leave, and if that were so they were to remain. England was there at the present time; but if the Soudanese were to govern themselves, then it followed as a matter of logic that England would have to go away, so that his contention that when they got to Khartoum they were to come away again was perfectly sound, and he must strenuously protest against a sacrifice of men and money for the purpose. He could not believe that it was either necessary or right, and he emphatically denied that it could be in the interest of India. The arguments as to India had great weight with many; but he could not consent to sacrifice so many lives because, forsooth, some people in the East might think that England had of late lost her power. He did not, however, think that people in the East had any contemptuous opinion of them. It seemed to him that their Indian allies were actuated by the most friendly spirit towards them, for he could not forget the generous offer made quite recently by the Nizam of Hyderabad.

That offer did not look as though Indian Potentates considered our power to be on the wane. The more they reflected upon this matter, the more serious did the situation appear. They seemed to be going into an undertaking for no good object. If he could see what would be the ultimate extent of these operations, he should be more inclined to vote with the Government. The more he thought of the history of this terrible country, which had been so graphically described by General Gordon in his letters, the more he wished that they had never sent a single soldier into it. It was no use repeating their blunders. He did not blame the Government for having sent out General Gordon; but he blamed the newspapers. [Laughter.] Yes; in spite of [the laughter of hon. Gentlemen, he maintained that it was the newspapers who sent out General Gordon. The Government were led away by the outcry of the nation, expressed through the newspapers. It was a national blunder. [Mr. J. COWEN: Nonsense!]] It was not nonsense. He maintained that it was a national blunder—a blunder of the Government, backed up by the whole nation. There was almost universal consent that to send out General Gordon was the right thing to do. The Egyptian Government had demanded a British officer to be sent out, and he did not blame Her Majesty's Government for acceding to the demand. When the gallant General was sent out, and his position became critical, the nation again demanded that he should not be left there, and the Government very rightly took steps to rescue him. But the nation did not now demand that they should proceed any further; and his contention was that they had now a good opportunity of doing that which they had always professed that it was their desire to do—namely, to leave the Soudanese to govern themselves. No doubt, it would be a difficult thing to abandon the tribes who had helped them in their operations in the Soudan; but in what they did, let them, at any rate, have a right object set before them, and then they could vote their money with more confidence. He took that opportunity that night of protesting against the first step in an undertaking which he believed would be bitterly regretted by the whole nation before many months were over.

Mr. W. Fowler

MR. DALRYMPLE said, they had heard from the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down an explanation of the vote he gave 10 days ago on the Vote of Censure. The hon. Member told them that he had not given his vote on the merits of the case, but in order to keep Her Majesty's Government in Office, lest by any possibility the Opposition should defeat them, and should come into power. Well, he (Mr. Dalrymple) perfectly understood the hon. Gentleman's explanation. Whether, in the present critical stage of affairs in which the country was now placed, that was a very satisfactory kind of vote, it was for the hon. Gentleman himself to decide.

MR. W. FOWLER said, he was sure the hon. Gentleman did not wish to misrepresent him. What he had said was that he had objected to the Motion of the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), who wished to pledge us to hold part of the Soudan, as well as to the policy of the Government.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, at any rate, the hon. Member distinctly disapproved, on the present occasion, of the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and yet had voted 10 days ago for keeping them in Office at all hazards. The hon. Member had said he was sure he (Mr. Dalrymple) would not misrepresent him, and that was perfectly true. He could understand a policy of scuttle, though he could not approve of it; he could understand a policy of revenge and retire, though still less could he approve of that; but what he could not understand was, in the vast undertaking upon which the Government were entering, the very poor and inadequate account which they gave of their policy. The hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) had complained of hon. Members having censured the Government in strong language, and, presumably, the hon. Baronet reserved to himself alone the privilege of reflecting on the Government, because in his speech he had quoted over and over again statements made last year in direct conflict with those now put forward by the Government. What he (Mr. Dalrymple) thought the Committee had a right to complain of was that they were once again in the presence of an illustration of the see-saw policy of the Government. The Committee, he thought, was under the impression that the ultimate result of the declarations of the Government in the important debate that recently occupied several nights was this, that some idea of a policy had been shadowed forth; but the noble Marquess at the head of the War Office—the Marquess of Hartington—had resorted to a series of adverbs which threw considerable doubt on the Government policy. This intention of “ultimately probably taking Khartoum” was not a very satisfactory basis on which to bring forward this Vote of 3,000 men. He, Mr. Dalrymple, could understand perfectly well why this very vague language was used. The Government presented at times the appearance of a policy to satisfy one set of persons, and at another time they took up a different attitude and indulged in the “ultimately probably” style of language to satisfy another class. But that was not a basis upon which the noble Marquess could put the demand for an increase of the Forces of the country. As for the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), he had no difficulty in this matter, because he could not reconcile the minimizing adverbial accounts of the noble Marquess with the Vote for 3,000 men; and so, unlike the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, Mr. W. Fowler, the hon. Member for Northampton, Mr. Labouchere, voted as he spoke. What he, Mr. Dalrymple, felt about this matter was, that there never was a Government which asked more and told them less. The Government treated them to dissolving views of their policy which, in view of the very grave circumstances in which they were placed, were of an extremely unsatisfactory kind. The Government ought to tell the Committee definitely that they had a policy, that they would adhere to it, and that the country would not have a repetition of the terrible slaughter which took place about a year ago in the neighbourhood of Suakin, for which, so far as he knew, no reason had ever been assigned. He should like to know whether there was anyone either in or out of Parliament, on either side of politics in England or Scotland or anywhere else, who would give them a notion of a reason for the inexplicable slaughter at the battles of El Teb and Tamanieh? That slaughter, unaccountable and terrible as it was, and not followed by any definite proceedings afterwards, was due to what was very well called the policy of reluctance on the part of Her Majesty's Government. Not long ago, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland stated in the country, as if it was quite a satisfactory description of the policy of the Government, that their policy with reference to Egypt and the Soudan was one of reluctance. Well, what was a policy of reluctance? It was a policy of chopping and changing, a policy of chance, a policy of uncertainty, a policy of bloodshed, a policy of great disappointment, and very likely of ultimate disaster. Yet the policy of the Government had been a policy of reluctance throughout; and it was in the presence of a fresh declaration of that policy—for how else could they explain this “ultimately probably” reference of the noble Marquess?—that they were asked to grant these 3,000 men. He should not be inclined to take upon himself to refuse the demand which Her Majesty's Government made on their responsibility. He did not think they would ask for these 3,000 men if they did not see the necessity for having them. He gave them credit for that. But he thought that people who were prepared to agree to the demand had a right—he would not say to a more exhaustive explanation of policy—but to see some exhibition of consistency in the present declarations with those made in the course of the recent important debate. Yet it really would appear that for the purpose of removing an amount of uneasy feeling in the minds of some of their supporters the Government were making an attempt to water down and dilute the small amount of policy which had been previously put before the country. He should not give his vote against this demand for 3,000 men. He would not do so on any account, in the presence of the grave emergency in which the country was placed; but he certainly thought the Committee had a right to more information from the Government, and had a right to a more consistent declaration of policy than had yet been given.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR pointed out that the Government was under an obligation to India to provide that country with an European Force of Infantry of the Line of 41,000 men, rank and file. For some years past, however, the European Force in India had been considerably under the proper strength, and against that state of things he now publicly protested to the Committee of the House. The deficiency of strength would have been much greater but for the large payment made out of Indian Revenues to induce soldiers to extend their service. Indeed, upwards of 7,000 soldiers, of all four Arms, had anticipated their time for retirement by agreeing to serve from two to seven years longer, at a large cost to India. It was not necessary for him to remind the Committee of the strained relations they had with Russia on the Frontier of Afghanistan. At any moment it might be necessary to assemble a large European Force on that Frontier; and therefore he appealed to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) to see that they proceeded to fulfil their obligation to India with as little delay as possible.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he did not think any Member of the House could conscientiously refuse to vote the number of troops required by Her Majesty's Government, seeing the very black look out there was all over the world so far as they were concerned, and seeing especially that at any moment they might be drawn into war on the Afghan Frontier. But there was one question he wished to bring before the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War. The new system of organization in the Army was now being very severely tested; it had, of course, been tested before, but never so severely as now. From the experience he had had of the new system, and the study he had made lately, he was satisfied that the Army was not in a fit position, especially as regarded officers; and if he did not hear that some arrangement had been made for increasing the garrisons at home, and the staff of officers, he should bring the subject forward as a substantive Motion on the Estimates for the year. They had the greatest difficulty in putting an Army Corps in the field, and when they did so they took away all the valuable men and officers of the Home battalions. It might appear an extravagant statement; but the other day he was present at a parade in a regimental district, and he found there were only four officers, including an adjutant of Militia, for 450 men. If all the recruits contemplated were to be enlisted within the next few months, it was quite impossible they could be properly trained with the present staff of officers. He trusted arrangements would be made for increasing the number of officers.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, it appeared to him that the Government's asking for 3,000 men was very similar to their request last summer for £300,000. Everyone who knew what military operations were, knew at the time the Vote was proposed by the Government that £300,000 was an utterly inadequate sum for the work required to be done. In his opinion, 3,000 men was a wholly inadequate addition to the Army if they were to follow up the military policy which had been commenced. Let him remind the Committee of the different steps taken in the Soudan business. Gordon was sent to negotiate for the release of 27,000 soldiers, with their families, and the civilians attached to them, amounting in all to about 100,000 persons. Those people were scattered up and down the Soudan. Gordon went to the Soudan as a messenger of peace, and he was instructed to negotiate with the Mahdi for the release of the Egyptian garrisons. His first step was to make the Mahdi the Sultan of Kordofan; but the Mahdi declined to accept that proof of friendship, and returned the testimonials and insignia which were sent to him. That step having failed, Gordon changed his tactics, and the messenger of peace became one of war. He (Sir Alexander Gordon) had never yet seen that the Government condemned General Gordon's change of tactics. When he found that his peaceable message was at an end, Gordon adopted a smashing message without any remonstrance on the part of the Government so far as he (Sir Alexander Gordon) had been able to ascertain. Hence the hostility of the Mahdi. The change of policy was, he thought, a very great mistake. The next step was that Lord Wolseley was sent out to relieve Gordon. Wolseley's Expedition had been as abortive as the attempt to relieve the 27,000 soldiers and their families, the relieving of whom was the original object of Gordon's mission. Not a single soldier had been relieved by their action—a few

had escaped from Khartoum; but that was all. How many of the 27,000 soldiers were now living to be released? He did not know of any, unless they were those now defending Kassala. The object of the Government now, he feared, was a bloody triumph, a war of revenge, as was said by the Financial Secretary to the War Department—Sir Arthur Hayter. Their object seemed to be to wash out their mistakes in blood. He always thought it was a proof of the strength of this country when they did not attempt to obtain a bloody revenge after the disaster at Majuba Hill. They felt so impressed with the strength of England that they could afford to lose the credit which they did lose at Majuba Hill owing to military incapacity. The decision not to avenge the defeat they sustained in the Transvaal did not in any degree militate against the strength of England. He feared that another great mistake had been made by the Government in sending Prince Hassan with Lord Wolseley's Army; that, in itself, would create great opposition from the Mahdi and his followers. The origin, he believed, of the mission of Prince Hassan was that the Prince said he would like to be the new Ruler of Khartoum, but that he would not go unless he was proclaimed Governor with full Civil authority. It seemed he was not to be proclaimed Governor, but that he was sent there to be the Ruler under their protection. As a matter of fact, these 3,000 men were asked for in order that they might force Prince Hassan on the Soudanese against their will. It was only necessary to read Gordon's admirable diary when he first went to Khartoum to know what the fitness of the Egyptians to rule the Soudan was. General Gordon in that diary stated that the Egyptians were utterly unfit to rule any country, and he deprecated their being put over the Soudanese. That was General Gordon's opinion when he was Governor General, and knew well the people he was appointed to govern. He (Sir Alexander Gordon) was fully persuaded that the Prime Minister's private views must be very much in sympathy with the feelings expressed lately below the Gangway, but that circumstances prevented him from acting upon his pacific views. He (Sir Alexander Gordon) did not see why negotiations should not now be opened with the Mahdi, as it was originally intended. The Mahdi was not a cruel man; as the Prime Minister said only the other day, there was no great effusion of blood at the taking of Khartoum. The Mahdi treated his prisoners well; in fact, he (Sir Alexander Gordon) had never heard of the Mahdi exercising any cruelty upon his prisoners. That was a great deal to say for a man who was little better than a savage. He did hope they would pause and consider very carefully whether they ought to enter upon the war of revenge which was advocated in many quarters. He trusted that, in the words of a Motion placed upon the Paper by the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock), they would only take such steps as might be necessary for the security of Egypt Proper, and nothing else. If they took a stand, for instance, at Assouan or its neighbourhood to defend Egypt at that point from any invasion of the Soudanese, should an invasion be attempted, they would be doing what would really be for the benefit of Egypt; they would be much more likely, by adopting a step of that kind, to consolidate the strength of Egypt than they would if they waged in the Soudan any war of vengeance. He hoped that Parliament would not take any precipitate action in this matter.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I do not rise for the purpose of going into any extended question, but rather for the purpose of reminding the Committee that the question now before it is a limited and a narrow one—comparatively narrow, although undoubtedly in itself a very important one. I do not think it necessary to make any remark upon this occasion to accusations against the Government and against me individually, which have been made a great many times and answered a great many times in this House, and which have been advanced against me with great loudness and confidence, but without any new verifying particulars or statements which could become matters of argument other than such as the House has long been acquainted with. Those, therefore, I pass by; but I have risen for the purpose of saying one word in relation to the speech of my hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Alexander Gordon) who has just sat down, and to another speech from my hon. Friend the Member for the town of Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler). They have referred to a declaration made by me on behalf of the Government on the 19th of February, the day on which the House re-assembled; and they argued upon the meaning of that declaration, and upon the question whether we are to go to Khartoum, and whether on reaching Khartoum we are to remain there. Now, that declaration of mine, made as it was, is a most fair speech for quotation and for comment; and I have no doubt there will be a great deal to be said upon it at the proper time. But what I wish to point out to hon. Gentlemen is this — they are not at this moment asked to take any step whatever bearing upon or connected with that declaration. I stated, I believe on the first night of the Session, or certainly in the debate on the Motion which was made by the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote), that the Expedition, which is to have for its object the saving of the British Army from any risks connected with the force of Osman Digna and his operations, was an Expedition demanded, I believe, on military grounds quite apart from the Expedition to Khartoum. It is important that that should be clearly understood, because that is undoubtedly a question of fact in itself of considerable weight. The time will come, and it cannot be very long distant, when the House may think it necessary, and probably will think it necessary, to discuss at large the question of going to Khartoum; but my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington), on whose statement I, for my part, rest entirely content, and whose statement, I think, I am only going now to repeat—my noble Friend has now stated distinctly in his speech to-night that the Vote that is going to be asked from the Committee—I mean, Sir, not only the Vote now in your hands, but the Vote which is to follow, and which in substance we have been debating all the evening—is a Vote relating to the Expedition that is to be made with the view of neutralizing the action or destroying, if necessary, any action of Osman Digna, and that that is a military operation absolutely necessary, whatever view you may adopt with respect to the Expedition to Khartoum. That is a point it is material to bear in mind. Do not let it be supposed I am at all endeavouring to escape discussion, either from one side or the other, in respect of the Expedition to Khartoum. I think I understand the views that are held. If I understand the speeches which have been made from the opposite Benches, they mean the reconquest and the retention of the Soudan; and if I understand the speeches made on this side of the House, they mean objection to going to Khartoum and the reconquest and retention of the Soudan. The proper time for that debate will come, and come before long. The subject of debate now before us is of a more limited character, and it was to remind the Committee of its character that I rose.

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I think the hon. Members in the House will hardly be able to agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, that this debate is of the limited character the right hon. Gentleman desires to give to it, because it is unquestionable that some of the considerations which are involved in this Vote are considerations which open questions of the widest importance. I took note, Sir, of the announcement of the right hon. Gentleman, that at the proper time, if not now, he would be willing to answer the questions which have been addressed to him with great force from this side of the House, and from below the Gangway on his own side, with regard to that declaration of his policy which he made on the first night of the Session. Well, now the right hon. Gentleman says this is not the proper time to discuss that declaration of policy. At the proper time, he says, he will be quite ready to discuss it, and he seems to anticipate that the proper time must be at an early date. I suppose that I am not very far wrong in believing that in the opinion of the Prime Minister the time for discussing the future policy of the Government will be when the Vote of Credit is moved. I must say it was not without some amusement that we on this side of the House heard the denunciations of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) and some other hon. Members who sit below the Gangway on the opposite side of the House with regard to the line which the Government are taking on this occasion. One cannot help thinking what would have been the position of these hon. Gentlemen if they had for a moment supposed that we were likely to support them as against the Government, and to endeavour to refuse these Supplies on this occasion. One cannot help thinking that they have, so to speak, hedged I with their own consciences—that they, imagining that the Government were all right so far as getting the Vote was concerned, felt themselves free to indulge in whatever violence of language they chose. I cannot say that I rise on this occasion with the cordial feeling one generally supports any military operations of the Government which are proposed. So far as we on this Bench are concerned, I rise merely to support that which the Government have claimed in the exercise of their functions as the Executive Government of the country—have claimed as necessary for the Military Service of the country. We cannot help feeling that the Army in the Soudan, unfortunately—I do not now enter into a discussion as to the cause why that Army was too late to effect its object—is now in a position which, though it is not one about which one need speak in language of undue despondency, is one which cannot but raise feelings of considerable anxiety. Lord Wolseley and the gallant Army with him, we all know, will do anything that men can be expected to do; the Government have placed them in a position which must be one of inaction for some time, and necessarily of anxiety; and they are now asking for measures which they believe, and which they tell the Committee, are necessary for the purpose of the further operations of this Force. It is necessary that we must study the safety of Lord Wolseley's Expeditionary Force, and in that sense I, for one, will not be found voting against the proposal of the Government. But I do feel there is very much left to be explained on a future occasion by the language in which the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War the Marquess of Hartington proposed this Vote. We all know that if there is one thing more than another which characterizes the ability with which the noble Marquess fulfils his duties it is the straightforwardness and the directness with which he makes any statement to the House that it is his duty to make, and therefore it is with a double feeling of regret that we heard the hesitating and, I must say, halting manner in which he spoke to-night. We are now told that what was formerly announced as a distinct part of the basis of their policy is now only probably to be carried out—I think the noble Marquess spoke of the operations which might probably be ultimately necessary. Now, anyone who hears that language from the mouth of the noble Marquess must know and be fully persuaded that it must have been with considerable difficulty that the noble Marquess consented to use such very vague and general terms; therefore, I do think the Committee and the country require to know whether, about these matters, the Government are in earnest or not. Even the noble Marquess, in his best efforts to-night, could not give an idea of reality as regards the Government proposals with respect to the railway from Suakin to Berber. He spoke of that railway very vaguely; more than once he said—"If it should be necessary to carry it out." I think we have a right now, or at the proper time that the Prime Minister indicated, to challenge on all details and on general principles, if we so find it necessary, the forward policy of the Government in respect of these matters. I content myself now with saying that when the Government, on their responsibility, ask for the necessary Supplies for the service of the country, we, on our side, are bound to give them our support.

MR. R. T. REID said, he would not detain the Committee for more than two or three minutes; but he wanted to say that he should vote for the Government on this occasion, inasmuch as what was now asked was a military necessity for the safety of their troops. It was quite true that hereafter might come the opportunity of fully discussing the question whether or not Her Majesty's troops were to go to Khartoum. It was not difficult to see that they were drifting, or might drift, into a policy which might make it necessary hereafter to go to Khartoum, and therefore those Gentlemen who did not like to intrude themselves in important debates might be permitted to say a few words on this question. Now, the going to Khartoum, or the smashing of the Mahdi, could only be justified, in his opinion, on three grounds—namely, the protection of Egypt itself, the safety of their troops in Egypt, and the necessity of doing their duty to the friendly tribes. As regarded the necessity of doing their duty to the friendly tribes, they had already practically withdrawn to a line between Korti and Dongola, and it seemed to him probable that that had been done having in view entirely their obligation to the friendly tribes, and having taken care that those friendly tribes had not suffered by their withdrawal. Now, was it not fair to bear in mind that to go to Khartoum for the purpose of smashing the Mahdi, or as the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, on the 19th of February, said, to effect the overthrow of the Mahdi's power, must necessarily involve them in a terrible amount of expenditure, both of blood and money? If it was necessary for the safety of their Army he could understand it, but their Army was now out of danger; if it was necessary for the protection of friendly tribes he could understand it, but there was no assertion that the friendly tribes were now in danger. It could not be supposed that it would be otherwise than a great enhancement of the military danger, if at some time hereafter they should endeavour to penetrate the African Desert. He hoped the Government, therefore, would take courage in the fact that their supporters, not only in that House, but in the country, would stand by them in the determination not to carry out the intention of proceeding to Khartoum, or in doing anything but that which was necessary for the protection of the Frontier of Egypt, for the protection of the tribes who were friendly towards them, and for the protection of their own troops. He thought everybody must have listened with pain to the constant attacks that had been made by hon. Gentlemen opposite upon the Government, and especially upon the Prime Minister. It was, too, with feelings of great regret that he heard his hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard Mr. Courtney tell the right hon. Gentleman, in the most solemn tones, that the consequences of the Sudan policy would rest upon his own head. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would understand that there were a great many who would sympathize with him, and support him in any pacific policy he might adopt.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR wished to say only a few words upon the Vote which was before the Committee—namely, the Vote for 3,000 more men than were comprised in the existing Establishment of the Army. The Prime Minister entered, what he (Mr. A. O'Connor) thought, a well-grounded protest against the discursive nature of the discussion which had arisen upon this Vote. He expected the right hon. Gentleman himself would have limited his remarks to the subject-matter of the Vote; but the right hon. Gentleman went on to make an observation which struck him (Mr. A. O'Connor) as an extraordinary one—namely, that they were to consider now the placing in the field of a Force which should enable the threatening attitude of Osman Digna to be counterveiled, so that any further or future advance against Khartoum might be made with ease or with safety, and the right hon. Gentleman seemed to hint that the railway to be made from Suakin to Berber was of itself no certain proof or indication that an advance must necessarily be made afterwards to Khartoum. It struck him as a very dangerous game to play to put a large Force into the field at Suakin to establish railway connection, if it should be established, between Suakin and Berber, and then to propose to the House or to any other Assembly the question whether they should or should not go to Khartoum. He could scarcely conceive a House of Commons which would assent to not going on to Khartoum, after having taken the trouble to spend large sums of money in establishing such a base. But he did not propose to follow the Prime Minister into the digression of which he was himself guilty on the Vote before the Committee. The Government desired to increase the number of soldiers, and even right hon. Gentlemen then sitting on the Front Opposition Bench said that it was really necessary for the military interests of the country to have 3,000 more men. That statement appeared to him to involve the most complete admission of administrative failure which ever came from a Government. He recollected hearing, only some three or four years ago, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer—then Secretary of State for War—standing by the box on the Table of the House, and speaking before Ministers, say that the Military Authorities had made such arrangements that they could, at a moment's notice—he believed the words were “in a very short time”—send 17 regiments fully up to their establishment on any service for which they might be required. In the year 1882, the right hon. Gentleman repeated very much the same thing; and when he asked for the increased establishment, he declared the readiness of the War Office to provide two fully equipped Army Corps for action in any part of the world. The House granted the 3,000 men, and the right hon. Gentleman said that he had so many regiments of so many men each, and that in no future small or little wars—he had forgotten the word used—would it be necessary to apply for anything special or extra, but that there would be always a sufficient Force to send on any Expedition that might be necessary without calling on the Reserve. Now, there was no war at all; no war had been declared, and no serious reverses had been sustained in the field; the Forces abroad were concentrated on their base, and the Government was not undertaking any fresh Expedition. But, because Khartoum had fallen into the hands of the Mahdi, the Government declared that they had to come on their Reserve, and that they required 3,000 more men. If that were the case, all he would say was that the design and plans of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he was Minister for War, had not been carried out, or, if they had been carried out, that they had signally failed. Under the circumstances, it certainly appeared to him to rest with Her Majesty's Government to show why, the War Minister having obtained from the House all that he asked, immediately there came any little difficulty in the military operations, the Government should be obliged to come down to the House and make the demand that had been made that evening. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not now in his place, but he should be astonished if it were not in the recollection of the officials of the War Office that the right hon. Gentleman did make use of the expression he had quoted; and he suspected the noble Marquess could well recollect when those declarations were made by his Predecessor in Office. The Committee were now asked to meet the expense of an increased number of men, and that simply because Lord Wolseley had been required to concentrate his Forces. Simply because it was in contemplation to have an Army of 18,000 men in the Soudan, it was now necessary to have recourse to the Reserve, to embody the Militia, and to ask for a Vote of 3,000 more men, notwithstanding that at the time when the War Office last increased the Establishment, it was distinctly understood that thenceforward no small war would make any further demand in that direction upon the country.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not recollect the speech which the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) has referred to. I think the hon. Member has misapprehended what was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the time, because it could never have been contemplated, in my opinion, by my right hon. Friend that our Military Establishment should be framed on such a basis as would maintain an Army of 25,000 men like that now in Egypt and the Soudan without calling upon the House for some increase of the Establishment. But, as a matter of fact, it is not correct to say that we have had recourse to the Reserve. All that has been done is to suspend the transfer of men from certain corps to the Reserve, and to accept the services of volunteers from the Reserve. Everything that we have done now has been done on the Establishment of last year. The Committee, I think, cannot expect that very considerable operations should be conducted by the Army without steps being taken of the kind which Her Majesty's Government propose. When we come to the Vote of Credit, it will be my duty to make a statement with regard to next year; but the whole of the Vote now proposed is connected with the Establishment of the past year.

MR. LEAKE said, he wished to give his reasons for supporting Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had described the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) as one than whom there was no more obsequious follower of the Government. He (Mr. Leake) should also put in his claim to be considered as obsequious as the hon. Baronet, because, although he differed from the policy of the Government in sending troops to Khartoum, he intended to support them on the present occasion. It was only a few nights ago that, by a vote of the House, the Government were again firmly placed in Office; and to put them in that position, and then on every occasion to deprive them of the tools with which they could govern, was simply to stultify themselves, and by their votes to make government impossible. Instead of demanding more pledges as to policy, more earnest declarations of what the Government intended to do, he would rather ask for fewer declarations of policy. Even if the Government pledged themselves to a "six-months'-hence-policy," how were they to foresee the circumstances which alone would make that policy possible? Having given their trust to the Government, he maintained that they ought to trust them in the management of any enterprize in which they were engaged; and so long as the House kept them in Office, they ought to give them a wide margin of discretion. He should show his adherence to that principle in the vote he was about to give, and he believed there were hundreds of thousands of voters in the country who would also support the Government for the reasons he had indicated. He believed that, whatever Her Majesty's Government might declare as to their future action in the Soudan, or whatever hon. Members might demand or oppose with regard to their policy there, circumstances would prove themselves stronger than either the Government or the respective Parties in that House. It was with the full conviction of this that he should put his trust in the Government, and should support them in the demand now made for the means wherewith to carry out their present policy.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 98; Noes 21: Majority 77.—Div. List, No. 43.]

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £912,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, to meet additional Expenditure for ordinary Army Services and for Military Operations in the Soudan."

Mr. Leake

SIR JOSEPH PEASE rose to move, as an Amendment,

"That the Item (Vote 13), of £235,000, for Works and Buildings, be reduced by £100,000."

Mr. CARBUTT rose to a point of Order. He desired to speak upon Vote 12, and he understood that the hon. Baronet's Amendment referred to Vote 13.

THE CHAIRMAN said, there was no doubt it would be for the convenience of the Committee if hon. Members would speak to the various subjects which were comprised in the Estimates in the order in which they stood in the Votes; but there was nothing in the course the hon. Baronet proposed to take which would prevent the hon. Member from speaking afterwards.

Mr. CARBUTT pointed out that the hon. Baronet was going to take a vote upon his Amendment, and asked whether, in the event of Vote 13 being agreed to, he would not be precluded from entering into a discussion on the preceding Vote?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the course proposed to be pursued would not prevent the hon. Member from bringing forward his objections to Vote 12.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL stated that he objected to all the items in the Vote with the exception of £25,000, which appeared on the Votes as having already been appropriated in aid.

THE CHAIRMAN said, there would be nothing to prevent the hon. Member making his objections when the hon. Baronet's Amendment had been disposed of.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE said, he had already given Notice at the commencement of the Sitting that he would confine his Motion to an objection to the sum of £100,000, which it appeared from the foot-note on the Estimates was the sum proposed to be expended upon the Suakin-Berber Railway up to the 31st of March. There was no position in the House so little to be envied as that of the hon. Member who was out of harmony with his Party, and who rose to oppose some part of the policy of the Leaders he usually followed. This was his position that afternoon. Nothing but public duty would induce him to speak and vote against the Government in regard to their Soudan policy; but, on this occasion, he felt bound by his conscience to do so. As far as regarded the policy of the Government, both in Egypt and the Sudan, he had done all he could to give his reasons for protesting against it, and he thought that the policy indicated that night was one which was entirely at variance with those laws, moral and Christian, which not only ought to govern the actions of individuals, but also to govern the action of one nation towards another. He had endeavoured to say all he could, from the very beginning, against the present policy of the Government. In June, 1882, before the bombardment of the Alexandrian Forts, he had put his name to a public protest forwarded to the public Press on the subject. To that bombardment he attributed a great deal of the trouble that had come upon this country. He had opposed the Vote of £2,500,000 which the Government asked for in July, 1882, in order to strengthen their Forces in the Mediterranean, on the ground that they were taking upon themselves a protectorate of Egypt, and involving themselves in responsibilities which future generations would never be able to discharge. Before the Suakin Expedition attacked Osman Digna, he joined in an address to the Prime Minister begging him to pause before they attacked the Arabs. After sacrificing 3,000 or 4,000 lives, Her Majesty's Forces immediately retired, without reaping any benefit what you mean that terrible loss of life. Now, again, he ventured to protest against the policy of trying to break the power of the Mahdi at Khartoum. That policy seemed to him to have involved an enormous sacrifice of life which was not justified by the circumstances of the case, and up to the present moment they had reaped no advantage from it. To begin with the bombardment of Alexandria, he contended that the bombardment of those forts was the immediate cause of the riot, and the sack of Alexandria which followed it. He thought they might say, therefore, that those proceedings were caused by the policy of Her Majesty's Government. Nothing could have justified the attack on the forts of Alexandria, but if anything could have palliated it, it would have been that they had a Force of soldiers with them to keep order and protect the city. But as they had not, the attack was wholly without justification or palliation. They ought either to have left the forts alone, which he thought would have been the right policy, or they ought to have had a sufficient Force to land to protect Alexandria. He found nothing in the Correspondence which showed any justification for the bombardment; but they were told that the reason of it was that they were bound to fulfil all their agreements with Tewfik Pasha. He denied, however, that Her Majesty's Government were bound to fulfil the Treaty with the Khedive after France had retired from joint action in the matter. They were then in exactly the same position as they were when Russia, some 14 years ago, repudiated the Black Sea Treaty. They then declined to enforce that Treaty for the reason that the other Powers, who were parties to it, did not think it their duty to go forward with them for that end. That was exactly the same position they were in at Alexandria. Then they fell on the Egyptian Army, and killed and wounded, it was calculated, 3,000 of that force at small loss to themselves. Next, they attacked Osman Digna in those two engagements which cost so many of those brave Arabs who formed his force. These preliminary events must have cost nothing less than 15,000 or 20,000 men, killed or wounded by their arms; and he contended that nothing that had happened could have justified such a loss of life. He gave the Prime Minister credit for far more than he had laid claim to in the better government of Egypt. He believed the right hon. Gentleman might have laid the foundation for a more permanent and better government of Egypt; but ends did not justify means, and those means were inconsistent with that international morality which ought to exist between nations. They had failed to rescue Khartoum. He was one of those who believed that it was an impossible task from the first, and when future historians looked more calmly at those events, they would come to the conclusion that the man whose life was forfeited since they failed to carry out his mission. Now, they were preparing for a needless war in the Sudan, and they were asked to take this railway to carry out these objects—namely, to break the power of the Mahdi, to frustrate the Slave Trade, and to protect Egypt. With regard to the first object, that of breaking the power of the Mahdi, what offence had the Mahdi committed against this country that his power was to be broken? Gordon was sent to deliver the garrisons, and then to hand over the government of the Soudan to the Soudanese. What was this Egyptian government of the Soudan. It had been shown on the authority of General Gordon and Colonel Stewart to be a rule that "plundered and oppressed" the people of the Soudan, and Sir Samuel Baker's view of it was expressed in very terse words. He said they were "plundering the villages, violating the women, maltreating the men, and generally making hell upon earth."

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the hon. Baronet was discussing the general Vote; but the Amendment he had given Notice of was as to the sum of £100,000 for a railway. He did not think the hon. Baronet would be in Order in discussing in full the general question of the Government policy in Egypt.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE understood that this railway was to "smash" the Mahdi; and what he was endeavouring to show was why the Mahdi should not be smashed, and why this railway, which was one of the instruments for smashing the Mahdi, should not be made. As to the railway being intended for the suppression of the Slave Trade, the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) had told them that night that it was wanted purely for war purposes, and that it was not likely to be a permanent railway; and if that was so he thought the Anti-Slavery Society, which was largely composed of Peace Society members, in their zeal for this line, would have very little encouragement from the view which the Government took of it. The noble Marquess that afternoon said that this railway was required in order that Lord Wolseley's troops might be protected, and that it was necessary in order to "smash" the power of Osman Digna. But three or four nights ago a Member of the Government in the other House (the Earl of Morley) stated that the security of the Forces under Lord Wolseley could not be affected in the slightest degree by any considerations connected with the making of the railway. Now, he objected to the railway being made at all, because it seemed to him to be the most substantial guarantee the Government could place before them of its disposition to take the Soudan, hold the Soudan, and govern the Soudan. He and those who thought with him had been accused by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) of speaking against the policy of the Government and voting with it. They voted with the Government the other night; but the truth of the matter was that they only had a choice of evils, because they had the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) advocating a policy of holding more tightly Egypt and the Soudan than the Government, from their utterances, appeared prepared to do. They understood that the Government were going to retire from the Soudan and Egypt as soon they could, and they asked for still further assurances in that direction. If the object of making this railway were to put down slavery, and was to be a peaceful work, done with the consent of the Soudanese, he was glad to say that there was no one in that House, except, perhaps, his hon. Friends behind him, the Members for Andover (Mr. Francis Buxton), and Kendal (Mr. Cropper), who had more anti-slavery blood in their veins than he had, and nobody would rejoice to see it made more than he would. But if, on the other hand, it was to be made for purely military reasons, and not as a permanent work, as the noble Marquess stated that night, to break the power of the Mahdi, he would be no party to its construction. The Prime Minister, many years ago, had, in eloquent and glowing terms, denounced the wrongs of those who had suffered under the cruel despotism of the Bourbons at Naples, and the effect of his denunciation was to arouse a thrill of indignation throughout this nation. Again, at a later period he had, with the same force and eloquence, roused the whole country against the Turkish atrocities in Bulgaria—atrocities which almost froze the blood of those who read the narratives as they were published; but now the right hon. Gentleman was at the head of the Administration of his own country he was ready to use the power with which he was entrusted to crush the power of the Mahdi and those Native populations of the Soudan who had risen against the terrible tyranny of the Egyptian Government. It was said that they must take care of those tribes who had shown a friendly disposition, and who might otherwise be imperilled. To this he fully assented; but it should be remembered that Osman Digna was 500 miles from the district held by Lord Wolseley, and that between the two were deserts almost as difficult for the Arabs to cross as for British troops. In his opinion, the position of their Forces for all needful purposes would be both safer and stronger, militarily and morally, if they were not sent upon a wild-goose chase across the Desert in order to crush the Mahdi at Khartoum, but were to retain the hold they had acquired on what might be the arranged Frontier of Egypt. Before they began to make the proposed railway they had to attack Osman Digna, and in doing that they would in all human probability add some 4,000 or 5,000 to the horrible list of killed and wounded, of which their policy in the Sudan had already made so terrible a sacrifice; and in addition to that there would be the loss that must be sustained by their own troops. The Government would have to land the materials for the railway during the terrible hot weather that was approaching at a harbour which had no very great capabilities. They would also have civilians as well as soldiers to look after and take care of. With regard to the contract for making a railway, which the noble Marquess the Marquess of Hartington had spoken of, it was one of the most extraordinary contracts he had ever heard of. It was a contract made entirely with Messrs. Lucas and Aird. He had no fault to find with those gentlemen, whom he believed to be straightforward and honourable men. Fifty miles of the railway had been ordered; and whatever the results of that railway might be in a military sense, he thought that Messrs. Lucas and Aird would take pretty good care of themselves. He should have thought, however, that the Government might have had in their Army or Navy Establishments men who were capable of supplying plans for laying down a line of railway; and if it were so, he wanted to know why this country should have to pay something like £40,000 more than would be otherwise needed, or 4 per cent commission to

Messrs. Lucas and Aird, for doing work that could be done by the highly skilled engineers already in the Government employ? It should be remembered that while the line was in course of construction the contractors' men would have to be protected, and that they would also have to be taken care of in case of sickness. He thought it would be found that the difficulties that would attend the construction of the railway would be much greater than had been anticipated. The route over which it was proposed to construct 250 miles of railway rose, he was told, over very severe gradients. He believed he was right in saying—and the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) would contradict him if he were wrong—that it would have to be carried over ground which was nearly 2,700 to 3,000 feet above the level of the sea, or 1,000 feet higher than the highest point of any railway in the United Kingdom—higher than the London and North-Western Railway at Shapfell, or higher than the Barnard Castle and Tobay line where it crossed the ridge that was called "the backbone of England," forming part of the line of hills between Yorkshire and Westmoreland. And yet Her Majesty's Government called this a contractor's line. If such a railway were entitled to that description, he did not know what a contractor's line was. He might say that he had had considerable experience in regard to railways. If it were intended to be a line that would carry troops and stores from Suakin to Berber, and on which locomotives might be safely run, a great amount of expense would necessarily be incurred, and incurred under difficult and dangerous circumstances. They would have to shelter their men from the spears and bullets of the retreating foe, who, not being able to meet the British troops in the open field, would have recourse to guerilla warfare, and would pick off, by means of their sharpshooters, our officers and men. As the railway went further and further away from the base of operations, it only being possible to lay it down from one end, the work would necessarily be a slow one, as railway plant as well as Army stores would have to be forwarded together. And when the railway was finished—if it ever should be completed—as far as

Berber, they would still be 200 miles from Khartoum and 480 from their base at Suakin, and they would still have before them the task of breaking the power of the Mahdi. It seemed to him to be one of the most hopeless tasks in which any country was ever engaged; and the result to be derived from it would certainly be not worth a tithe of the pains and trouble, blood and treasure, that would have to be expended in the prosecution of the policy initiated by Her Majesty's Government. All the while the railway was being made the troops would be lying inactive at Suakin, and every day they remained in that climate would only add to the dangers by which they were beset. In a paragraph which he had seen in a letter from one of the numerous correspondents who were at that moment engaged with the Army in the Soudan, the writer made use of the pregnant observation that "the sun of the Soudan is more fatal than the spear of the Arab." Indeed, the reports they had already received from Lord Wolseley's Army showed that fever and dysentery had already made their appearance among the troops at Korti. He did not claim to prophesy; but he considered it as among the probabilities of the case that the troops who would be stationed, during the hot weather, on the Eastern Coast of the Soudan at Suakin would have to suffer from those complaints which, according to the ordinary laws of Nature, invariably presented themselves among large bodies of men compelled to camp together under similar circumstances. He asked the Government to look for a moment at the history of the past, and not to hide from themselves the dangers of the future. Lord Wolseley's Army, which was now being gathered together at Korti, was being distributed up and down the Nile in order that they might pass the summer months in greater safety. The difficulties they had had to encounter in reaching their present position had been recorded. General Earle had spent 16 days in making a progress of 48 miles, between Handab and the scene of his victory and death. That encounter had cost them 10 soldiers, dead and missing, and 43 wounded, out of a force of 2,200 men. After that, it took 10 days for General Brackenbury's Force to get as far as Hobbeh, a distance of only 23 miles, or a little more than two miles a-day. General Buller's Army had returned to Korti, after one of the most wonderful campaigns ever recorded of the British Army—a campaign that had undoubtedly been conducted with the greatest possible bravery. The loss of that Force, including its able and gallant Commander, had been 30 killed and 450 sick and wounded out of the total of about 2,000 men. Was it to be supposed that the troops now being sent forward by Her Majesty's Government would be able to go from Suakin to Berber, in the face of Osman Digna's dispersed Army, and the Army of the Mahdi, which had not yet been dispersed, without encountering similar casualties, losses, dangers, and privations? They had already buried in the sands of the Soudan General Stewart, Colonel Eyre, and General Earle, all of them men of whom the country had every reason to be proud. When the Government Forces had reached Khartoum, after all these losses, and those that might be anticipated, what was to happen? Would the losses they would incur in the chase of the Mahdi be less than they had hitherto been; and, furthermore, would the Mahdi wait for them in Khartoum? If he did, he would probably wait for them at the head of a very large Force; and, although he might be conquered by British arms, the conquest would probably not be effected without considerable loss. If this railway were made, and the policy indicated by Her Majesty's Government were pursued, they would, he was afraid, have little to show for it but the graves and prowess of their countrymen, as the Mahdi would still be ranging loose in the Soudan, a country which General Gordon himself had told the Government it was hopeless to conquer, and which, if conquered, it would be useless to retain. What, he asked, was the present position of their Military Forces? They were sending to the Soudan the very pick of their Indian troops at a time when they might be much better employed in going to the Frontier of Afghanistan. The best regiments in this country were also being sent out to a deadly and inhospitable climate. They were calling up the Militia from their industrial pursuits, and sending them to their garrison towns—one of the largest and best Militia regiments in the County of Durham having recently been sent to do garrison duty at Colchester. And all that was being done in order to carry on a war which Her Majesty's Government might have avoided, or which, at least, could be fought out in a better place than the Soudan. If the Mahdi chose to advance to the North, or Osman Digna desired to overrun the Eastern Frontier, it seemed to him (Sir Joseph Pease) that both could be met and fought on better terms, and certainly on much better ground, in a neighbourhood much further from the Equator. What, he asked, was the effect of the policy of Her Majesty's Government upon the relations of this country with Foreign Powers? Russia, following her usual policy, was advancing on our Afghan Frontier in a way to which no hon. Member of that House could shut his eyes. Russia had always found the difficulties of other countries to be her own opportunity; and, seeing England engaged at the present moment in a hopeless movement in the Soudan, she was taking advantage of that position to advance on our Afghan Frontier. This policy of advance on the part of Russia could only be met by a display of firmness which he hoped would characterize the action of Her Majesty's Government. The result of their policy in the Soudan had shown itself in the Army and Navy Estimates, which gave evidence of an increase this year, as compared with last; while, as compared with the first year in which the Government took Office, there was a total increase of between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000. Their policy would also show itself specially in the taxation they were compelled to lay on the people; and although the present year would close more favourably for the Government than was at one time anticipated, owing to certain sums required for military purposes not coming within the financial year, he felt tolerably certain that they would have to do that which he should be sorry to see done—namely, ask the House to put off the annual payment which had been made for so many years in reduction of the National Debt, the alternative being that they would have to tax the people, whose industries, both agricultural and commercial, were at the present moment in so depressed a condition. He begged to thank the Committee for having listened with so much attention to his somewhat lengthened remarks. He certainly entertained a strong feeling against the policy of the Government in what he regarded as their fruitless search after the Mahdi. He was no pessimist. He fully believed in the gallantry and bravery of their soldiers, which was displayed at the present day as conspicuously as in former times. He believed, also, in the immense resources of this country, as a rich and powerful nation, able to back up, by its own wealth and vigour, the armies it might send forth. But he was of opinion that the blood and treasure of this country ought not to be expended in operations that could be attended neither with honour nor glory to the English nation. He opposed the policy of Her Majesty's Government on those grounds; and he might add that his opposition was based on grounds even higher still. He opposed that policy because he believed it to be internationally wrong, contrary to the best precepts of morality, and out of harmony with the teachings of that common Christianity which most of them professed. He, therefore, begged to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum which he had mentioned.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item (Vote 13), of £235,000, for Works and Buildings, be reduced by £100,000."
—(Sir Joseph Pease)

MR. BRAND: The hon. Baronet who has just spoken has made a severe attack on the proposal to construct a railway from Suakin to Berber, as well as upon the agreement that has been made between Her Majesty's Government and Messrs. Lucas and Aird; but I noticed that in the course of his speech the hon. Baronet did not mention any details of that agreement to which he took serious objection; and I must here remark that, looking at all the circumstances of the case, I do not think the terms of that agreement as between Her Majesty's Government and Messrs. Lucas and Aird can be regarded as specially advantageous to that firm. The hon. Baronet has, to my way of thinking, enormously exaggerated the difficulties of the proposed undertaking. He seems to have imagined to himself that the difficulties in the way of constructing such a railway are immense; and I am bound to admit that if they are anything like those he has described it certainly would be impossible to make that railway. But let us see what those difficulties are, according to the view taken by the hon. Baronet. In the first place, the hon. Baronet has said that, during every day the railway was being made Her Majesty's troops would be lying inactive at Suakin. But he seems to have forgotten that with those troops there is a sufficient amount of camel transport to take them away to the hills and place them in a fairly good climate, which is much better comparatively than that of Suakin. The hon. Baronet further told the Committee that it would be impossible to make the railway in the face of the attacks that would be made upon those engaged upon its construction by the enemy. I think, however, the Committee will be inclined to agree with me that the able Generals who have been consulted on this matter, and the other military men whose opinions have been taken upon the question, are entitled to have more dependence placed upon their opinion than can be accorded to the opinion of the hon. Baronet. The military opinion we have received upon the subject of this railway is that, as far as the question of attack from the enemy is concerned, there will be no difficulty in the construction of the contemplated line of rails if the Forces under Osman Digna are, in the first instance, met and defeated. My object in rising to answer the hon. Baronet was not to follow him through those parts of his speech which related to the policy of Her Majesty's Government in Egypt generally, but simply to reply to what he has put forward with reference to the question of constructing the Suakin-Berber Railway. Upon this point I have to say, therefore, that in my belief the proposed railway is rendered absolutely necessary as long as the policy stated by Lord Wolseley is followed out—I refer to the military policy advocated by him of operating on Berber by converging two Forces, one having its base at Suakin, and the other its base at Cairo—or, to speak more accurately, I should say, with its base at Alexandria, its head-quarters being, however, at Korti. I maintain that there are three grounds on which this railway is necessary. In the first place, it is essential that the railway should be constructed—and I will show that it is so—because it is a military necessity, or, at any rate, there are matters of such military importance involved as really amount to a military necessity. In the second place, to the extent to which the railway may be finished it will afford the means of saving expenditure; and, in the third place, I would say, in answer to the criticism of the hon. Baronet, that assuming the railway to be a necessity, and that it should be made in the manner proposed, Her Majesty's Government are taking the best means—and, indeed, the only means in their power—to insure its construction. Let the Committee look for a moment at the circumstances in which we are placed. We have, at the present moment, two Armies operating in the Soudan. There is the Army of General Graham with its base at Suakin, and there is also the Army of Lord Wolseley with its base at Korti. Surely the construction of the proposed railway must be a matter of immense importance to the Force under the command of General Graham. Unless the country around Suakin is pacified, and Berber is occupied by a friendly Force, it will be impossible for General Graham's Force to advance on Berber in the absence of the proposed means of railway transport, without a huge provision of transport camels; and I may here state that the War Department has had a careful calculation made with regard to the amount of camel transport that would be absolutely indispensable to the requirements of such a Force as that of which General Graham has command, and I find that from 50,000 to 70,000 camels are estimated as being necessary to meet the wants of that contingent in the matter of transport. To maintain such an array of camels with the Force for a period of one year would involve an expenditure of something like £3,350,000. Therefore I repeat that, as far as regards General Graham's Force, assuming it is to advance on Berber, a railway, if it can be made, is a military necessity.

An hon. MEMBER: Why should we go there?

MR. BRAND: The hon. Gentleman asks a question of policy with which I do not propose to deal in the remarks I now feel called upon to make. I am simply dealing with the military question as it affects the railway proposed to be made from Suakin to Berber; and I ask the Committee to consider whether, as regards Lord Wolseley's Force, the projected line is not of almost equal importance to the position it assumes in the case of General Graham? If Lord Wolseley is to advance with his Force on Berber, is it possible to exaggerate the enormous importance to the progress of that Force of Lord Wolseley having for the transport of supplies and munitions, as well as his sick and wounded, a railway within 100 miles of his headquarters, and less than 250 miles from the sea at Suakin? For however great may be the advantages of the Nile route, and to whatever extent it may be possible for Lord Wolseley to improve that route, we, nevertheless, have to recognize the fact that the Nile route from Berber to Cairo covers a distance of 1,420 miles. I do not say it is an impossibility; but I do say it would be a difficult thing to maintain a line of communications extending over so great a distance. I have said I will show the Committee that the railway from Suakin will afford the means of effecting a considerable saving of expenditure, always assuming that these operations are conducted in the manner contemplated; and I will now proceed to prove that it will be a saving, not only in its entire length, should it be completed, but to the extent of every 50 miles of rail that may be laid down. It must be obvious that for every 50 miles of railway we may make we shall necessarily require fewer and fewer animals for purposes of transport. I have had a calculation made, and I find that if we succeed in making a railway as far as Ariab, instead of a camel transport to the number of 60,000 or 70,000 animals, only from 15,000 to 20,000 would be required. Then there remains the question asked by the hon. Baronet, whether the intended railway can be made in time? I am not about to commit myself to any confident prediction on that point. I have no doubt that hon. Gentlemen will be able to quote the opinions of civil engineers on the one side, while I, again, am able to quote the opinions of civil engineers on the other. In point of fact, we might have almost as many opinions as there are engineers. But, at any rate, we do know this with regard to the route that has been chosen—that an engineer, Mr. Wyld, went over the line of country, some time ago, on behalf of a syndicate that had been formed for the purpose of making such a railway, and that in his Report it was estimated that a railway, such as that which we propose, could be made at a cost of about £4,500 per mile. Mr. Wyld reported that there were no serious engineering difficulties; and from this source, as well as from other information in our possession, we have every reason to believe that the gradients are not severe. We believe that the railway can be made, at any rate, to a certain distance that cannot but be useful. A great deal has, unfortunately, been said about this railway, in absolute ignorance of what are the real facts. There was a statement made in "another place" the other day with respect to this railway; and it was then suggested, or asked, whether we were sending out stone materials and iron girders for the bridges? The answer is, of course, we are not doing anything of the kind. It would be absurd to say we are going to build stone and iron bridges. Bridging material will, no doubt, be sent out; but it will be composed of timber. I will not say that this railway can be made in its entirety for the use of the troops sent to the Sudan; but I will say this—that I feel confident that 50 miles of railway can be made; that I believe 100 miles can be made; and that I see no reason why 170 miles should not be made in the time at which it will be needed. But what I desire to insist on is this—that whether 50 miles, or 150 miles, or 170 miles of railway are made, whatever is done in that direction will be of immense military importance. Having shown, as I think I have succeeded in doing, that, granting certain premises, this railway will be of importance in a military sense, and having further shown, as I also think I have done, that if it is made for the purposes I have stated, it will affect a saving of expenditure, I have now only to deal with the statement of the hon. Baronet that we ought to have employed other means. I contend that Her Majesty's Government have adopted the best and the only means that were available. It would have been impossible for the Royal Engineers of this country to have made such a railway as that which they propose to construct from Suakin to Berber unless they had at their disposal an organized Railway Corps, which, at the present moment, the country does not possess. I may state that I was convinced, from the evidence before the Committee on Commissariat and Transport last year, that it would be madness to attempt to carry out such an undertaking without an organized Railway Corps. On the other hand, it is perfectly true that if we had been able to obtain the assistance of the Public Works Department in India it might have been possible for us to have made the railway. But for certain reasons, into which I will not enter at the present moment, it was not deemed desirable to adopt that course. Under these circumstances, therefore, the only means that were at the hands of Her Majesty's Government were to accept the offer of Messrs. Lucas and Aird, who are eminent contractors. I believe the decision arrived at as to the gauge of the railway—the English gauge—to have been the right one. The English gauge does not require such careful and accurate laying as the narrow gauge, and it has the advantage of possessing more stability than any other gauge. I may add that the whole of the materials and tools were actually in the hands of Messrs. Lucas and Aird, and were supplied at once. They were shipped, indeed, within a week of the time the order was given; and I do not believe that anything better could have been done by any other country. I have now dealt, as I said I should do, only with the question of the necessity for this railway from a military point of view, and the capacity of the agents who have been employed to construct it. I am quite certain of this—that if we have a clear course—that is to say, if, in a military sense, the country can be cleared sufficiently for the purpose, and if we have a sufficiency of Native labour, there is no reason why a considerable portion of this railway may not be made. I will go further, and say that, under these circumstances, I feel confident that a considerable portion of the railway will be made in time to be of great service to our Forces in the Soudan.

THE CHAIRMAN: I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the mode in which I propose to put this Question to it. It is as follows:—"That the Item (Vote 13), of £235,000, for Works and Buildings, be reduced by £100,000."

MR. CARBUTT: I wish to ask, as a point of Order, whether, if you put that Vote 13, it will be competent for me to go back to the previous Vote?

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already informed the hon. Member that there is nothing to prevent his speaking on any portion of this Vote. He himself informed the Committee that he did not intend to propose a reduction of the Vote of any item at any time.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he did not propose to deal with the admirable political and financial résumé of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Joseph Pease). He entirely sympathized with it, and, on some points, he agreed with it; but he would say to the hon. Gentleman, as he would say to certain Gentlemen below the Gangway, that it was no use crying over spilt milk. They had got into a very great mess. He did not say how they had got into it, because hon. Gentlemen had been labouring for weeks past, he might say for months and years past, on that side of the House to point out how very faulty the policy of the Government had been; and he only regretted that, as the hon. Member for South Durham (Sir Joseph Pease) and other Members below the Gangway on the Ministerial side held such strong views about the policy of the Government that they had not helped the Opposition about 10 days ago when the Vote of Censure was under discussion. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) had, that evening, given them a reason—and a very bad one—why these Gentlemen had not supported the Opposition; it was a bad reason from the hon. Gentleman's own point of view, but a good one from the point of view of the Opposition, because he (Lord Eustace Cecil) was sure no one on the Opposition side of the House was at all anxious to undertake the task of Government at this moment. The question before the Committee had been very properly narrowed by the ruling of the Chairman—in the spirit if not in the letter—to this—whether the railway could be made under the circumstances detailed; and whether it was advisable, from a military point of view as well as from a political point of view, to construct it? The hon. Gentleman the Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Brand) had commenced his speech by telling them that the railway was to be made from Suakin towards Berber—and the preposition "towards" was a very doubtful part of his speech. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) was at a loss to know what the "towards" alluded to. Was the railway to widen out on an uncertain course—no one could tell where—in the Desert? He did not know; nor did he know whether it was to lead to transactions which would involve the expenditure of an immense treasure as well as a great deal of blood. But this he did know—that when the hon. Gentleman went on to say that there would be no difficulty—he had marked the words—about making the railway, provided Osman Digna was defeated—

MR. BRAND: I said no military difficulty, so far as the enemy was concerned.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Provided Osman Digna was defeated?

MR. BRAND: Yes.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: But Osman Digna had already been defeated, and defeated twice over; but he had never yet been caught. It was one thing to defeat him, and it was quite another to catch him. Osman Digna was as ubiquitous as the Mahdi; and probably if they succeeded in doing that which they were going to attempt—namely, the smashing of his Force—Osman Digna himself would retire to the hills with the troops that remained with him after the slaughter which doubtless would take place. In a very short time after his defeat, more especially as the summer season came, and as the weather got hotter and hotter, Osman Digna would descend again with his marauding parties, and, no doubt, would make the construction of the railway an almost superhuman task. He had read lately—and, no doubt, other hon. Members were also acquainted with the fact—that over and over again in their attempts to construct fortifications at Suakin the Arab Tribes had harassed Her Majesty's soldiers. The Arabs, it was said, were so clever and so venturesome that every night, whenever a fortification had been partly made, numbers of them descended upon it, and took away the sandbags or partly destroyed them. In this way sometimes the work of days was destroyed in a single night. He would ask his hon. Friend, and every reasonable man in the Committee, how they were going to insure, without an enormous amount of trouble and expense, the making of this railway by Natives and workmen brought from he did not know where? How many troops would be required to keep the marauding parties off? How was it intended to sustain these troops, because, after all, the construction of a railway was a work of time? They knew that it could not be made in a moment, and that even if the 50 miles which were talked of were finished it would probably be months before even that part of the work was out of hand, and all this time they would have to feed their troops, their camels, and their animals, and they would have to look after their labouring parties. It was absurd for the hon. Member to tell him, or to tell anyone else, that there would be no difficulty in making the railway when Osman Digna was defeated. He contended that there would be the greatest difficulty, and that it would entail the greatest expenditure both in money and men. As he thought the hon. Baronet the Member for South Durham (Sir Joseph Pease) had said, it was not so much the Arab spears that they had cause to be frightened of as the sun. When they considered that many of the men who would be employed upon the railway—many of the labourers and navvies—were brought from this country, that they were men whose habits were not those of the strictest sobriety, and that they would have to be exposed to the fiercest rays of a tropical sun, with, at the best, extremely bad water to drink, it must be apparent to everyone that the danger was enormous. Could it be supposed that these men would not be subjected to the danger of enteric fever, and that, labouring as they would be, they would not be visited with disease? Why, it was possible that during the hottest months it might be found necessary to stop the work on the railway entirely. But, to proceed, he would refer to the three reasons which had been given in favour of the making of the railway. The hon. Gentleman had said, first, that it was a military necessity. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War the Marquess of Hartington, early in the evening, had said that the railway was absolutely necessary. The noble Marquess had said that whereas their going to Khartoum was only probable—and that was understood to be the military opinion of Lord Wolseley—the making of the railway from Suakin to Berber was an absolute necessity. Well, when Lord Wolseley gave that opinion he (Lord Eustace Cecil) presumed he meant to say that the making of the railway was an absolute necessity if the Government wished to avoid the great mortality which, no doubt, would take place amongst the camels and the beasts of burden employed in the Transport Service. But beyond the fact of saving a certain amount of money when the railway was made—and he laid some stress upon that—and beyond its being a military necessity, he could not see that there was any positive necessity for bringing up troops and stores from Suakin. It could be done, but it would be done at very great expenditure. It certainly could not be done before the autumn, and they certainly could not make any advance before that time. He did not suppose that it was intended to make any advance before the completion of the railway. Then it really came to this—that it was a question of expenditure. With regard to expenditure, they were on exceedingly doubtful ground. When he looked upon that side of the question he stood perfectly appalled at what the Government proposed. He had listened in astonishment and with amazement that night to the noble Marquess as he detailed the various works that were to be executed, and the expenditure which was to be incurred, by this country. Tramways had been spoken of as well as steamboats on the Nile, and a Nile railway; an increase in the Army had been spoken of, and the construction of a railway from Suakin to Berber. They heard also that a quantity of huts were to be obtained, and, no doubt, these were in the highest degree necessary for the housing of their troops in the hot season; and on this matter he would express an earnest hope that care should be taken to have the huts properly fitted and constructed of the best material. Well, every one of the items he had mentioned would be costly, and the whole undertaking seemed to land one into a perfect sea of expenditure; and what he complained of, so far as the noble Marquess's statement was concerned, and also of the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Brand), was that no estimate was given to the Committee of the prospective expenditure. Whenever they came to ask about the expenditure they were put off by such observations as—"Oh, it will all be included in the Vote of Credit." Well, that Vote of Credit they were all anxious to see. He was sure hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on the opposite side of the House, whom he had no doubt felt very deeply on this question of expenditure, were extremely anxious to see what the total expenditure of the Government would be, and what burden all the outlay that was taking place in the heart of the Soudan would lay upon the shoulders of the people of the country. Those hon. Members, and hon. Members sitting on the Opposition side of the House, not only wished to know what the policy of Her Majesty's Government was generally, but were anxious to know whether the Government had any minds at all as to what sum was likely to be spent on the military operations in the Soudan? They were not without precedents in regard to these matters—they were not without precedents of a very disagreeable kind in regard to these matters in Africa. It must be in the recollection of the Committee, as it was in his recollection, how enormously the expenditure in connection with the Abyssinian Campaign had grown. The Conservatives were in Office at the time, and he was not now saying anything about who was responsible for the drawing up of the Estimates. All he knew was that the Estimates were drawn up, and that those who had to officially submit them in that House declared that, according to the figures which were put before them, the expenditure on the war would only amount to some £3,000,000. But what was the fact? Why, the expenditure in connection with the Abyssinian War came to £9,000,000, showing how completely falsified had been all the Estimates drawn up by hon. Gentlemen seated at their desks in Downing Street or elsewhere, though, no doubt, they were prepared as carefully as their knowledge enabled them to prepare them. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) contended, therefore, that the noble Marquess and the other officials interested in this matter were bound to take the House of Commons into their confidence, so far as they could, upon this question of expenditure. What he urged the Government to do was to give every item of information they had, not to pledge themselves to any limit; because, even with all the information at the hands of the Government officials, he very much doubted whether the Estimates founded upon it would be very trustworthy in the end. The Government were bound to put every single figure they could before the Committee; and what he complained of particularly that night was that the noble Marquess had given them a very meagre statement indeed. The hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Brand) had told them that a railway of this kind might cost £4,500 per mile; but he (Lord Eustace Cecil) would put it to anyone who had ever had anything to do with the construction of railways in savage or semi-civilized countries whether such a figure was trustworthy? Let them take South America, and he would put it to anyone who had any knowledge of what Brazilian railways had cost whether such works could be carried out for £4,500 a mile? He happened incidentally to have some little information upon this point, and he believed that it was not at all quoting an out-of-the-way figure when he said that Brazilian railways had cost as a rule £10,000 per mile. Therefore, when the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Brand) told him that the railway was only going to cost £4,500 per mile—

MR. BRAND: I never said anything of the kind.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: But the hon. Gentleman led the Committee to suppose that railways of that kind could be constructed for £4,500 a mile.

MR. BRAND: I did not say anything of the kind. My noble Friend misunderstood me. What I said was, that some time ago Mr. Wyld, an engineer, went over the line for a syndicate that had been formed—the construction of a railway being at that time contemplated—I cannot say whether of a metro gauge or of an ordinary English gauge; and that it was believed at the time that the work could be completed at the rate of £4,500 per mile.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he quite accepted the hon. Gentleman's explanation; but, at the same time, when figures were put before the Committee, it was always supposed that they were intended as a guide, or to lead hon. Members to form some judgment upon the question of cost. When that sum per mile was put before the Committee, he had thought himself entitled to take it as a possible or probable estimate—for they were in the land of probabilities—which the gentlemen who had given the information to his hon. Friend (Mr. Brand) and the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) had arrived at after due consideration of the subject. Well, he now came to the question which the hon. Baronet the Member for South Durham (Sir Joseph Pease) had lightly touched upon. The hon. Baronet, he thought, had stated that a great deal of the material to be used in the construction of the Suakin-Berber railway was old material from the Hull and Barnsley railroad. He had understood the hon. Baronet to state that some of this material was not in the very best state of preservation.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE: I do not wish to imply that by any means in what I said, or that Messrs. Lucas and Aird had shipped old and worn-out material from the Hull and Barnsley Railway. I would give them credit for the highest integrity in the matter.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, that at any rate, although he did not mean to say that the material was improper material to be used for the construction of the railway, still it had been used, and could not, therefore, be said to be in the same condition in which it was when it was perfectly new. He should like to know whether the material taken out was fitted for the purpose of railway construction in a country like the Soudan? Hon. Members knew that in these tropical climates great mischief was done by insects—by such things as white ants. These insects devoured almost everything before them. He had even heard of their eating tin cans. Altogether, without wishing to cast a slur upon the integrity of Messrs. Lucas and Aird, it was quite possible that this railway material sent out to the Soudan might be found hardly fitted for railway purposes in such an exceptional climate. On such matters as these he should like very much to have a little further information. Then, again, with regard to water. They had had hinted, in answers which had been given to Questions put in that House, that all the water to be used by the labourers and by the troops along the railway was to be taken from the Red Sea, and pumped through pipes.

Questions had been asked of his hon. Friend the Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Brand), where the pumps to be used in these operations had been ordered—whether in America or in this country? He (Lord Eustace Cecil) had understood, from the answer the hon. Member had given, that there was no doubt that pumps and pipes had to be used. Then it must be borne in mind that pumps and pipes added very much indeed to the expense—that whether the whole outlay could be covered by any figures corresponding to £4,500 per mile he should take to be exceedingly doubtful. He said, therefore, without going further into detail in this matter, that it was perfectly clear they were really taking a great leap in the dark. They really did not know enough of the country, or of the conditions under which the railway was to be constructed and laid down, or with regard to the number of men who would be required to make it, or the number of soldiers who would be required to defend it from the hordes which Osman Digna might collect and send down against it at any moment after he had been smashed. And they were not sure that after all, when all the expenditure of blood and treasure had taken place, when this railway had been constructed “towards Berber,” wherever that might be, the Government would be quite certain that they were going to Khartoum, or even going on with the war at all. They were in a state of uncertainty in consequence of the speech of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington); and he entirely agreed with what had fallen from the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) that they were left in a state of uncertainty whether the policy of March, 1885, would be the policy of September in the same year. If the hon. Member was right, what would become of the present Estimate of expenditure? Though he did not quite agree with the views of hon. Members below the Gangway on the opposite side of the House, yet he sympathized with their objections with regard to expenditure. He also objected to the expenditure the Government were incurring; but he did not wish to oppose it. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laughed, but he would tell them why. He did not object, because they had got into such a tremendous mess. They had sent their troops out, and, as had been stated over and over again, it would be quite impossible, without a loss of prestige—of which they had not too much now-a-days—to retire before the Mahdi. There was only one alternative left—they must go on with the operations. He had been opposed to the policy of the Government from the first—that was to say, from the moment of the bombardment of Alexandria to the present time. He had been opposed to all their expenditure in Egypt; but he was in that unfortunate position in which he thought other hon. Gentlemen in the House who had any share of responsibility found themselves—that was to say, he could not refuse the Supplies to the Government. But he did stand there and say that he had a right to exercise the critical powers at his command. He had a right to say that the Government, who had brought them into this scrape, should now take them into their confidence and make a clean breast of the whole business, so far as their information enabled them to do, and that they should tell them the full extent of the vast expenditure of treasure and blood which was likely to take place. He was glad to see that the Prime Minister had just entered the House. He held that right hon. Gentleman to be primarily responsible for what was taking place. He did not intend to quote the Prime Minister's speeches. He had attempted to do that once or twice in the House; and on every occasion, if he had not happened to have the precise extracts from those speeches in his pocket, the right hon. Gentleman had come down upon him. But he had read and listened to the right hon. Gentleman's speeches and statements over and over again; and he was bound to say that he had formed very much the same opinion with regard to them as had been formed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin). He could not help saying—and he did not think it could be too often repeated—that a great many of the answers of the Prime Minister in the House itself, and a great many of his speeches outside of it, had had a very mischievous effect both in the Sudan and elsewhere. They had had a mischievous effect in this country, although the evil created at home had been very small in extent as compared with that created amongst the Natives in Egypt and the Soudan. Whether it was that they approached these questions without the power of duly understanding the Oriental and Native mind he did not know; but he was quite certain that if the Prime Minister would give that calm consideration which his great capacity and great intelligence enabled him to give to these matters, he would see, perhaps, that there was a little reason in that which was constantly being urged from the Opposition side of the House—namely, that the more guarded a speech on the question of policy was it would be far better for their troops, and for everybody concerned in the Government service at the present time in Egypt. He was quite certain of this—that if the troops were asked, and if the bonds of military discipline permitted them to speak, they would say one and all, from Lord Wolseley down to the smallest drummer boy, that the statements and the speeches which had been made had increased their difficulties enormously; that unless there could be adopted some firm, some real substantial policy of a permanent nature which the whole world could acknowledge and believe in, and which would not only be stated but acted up to, they might just as well pull down the flag of this country at once, make terms with the Mahdi, and, to use a well-known word, carry out that policy of rescue and retire, or, as he ought to say, retire and scuttle, as soon as they possibly could. He made these remarks in no spirit of hostility to this particular Vote. He was prepared, and he thought all hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House were prepared—to support Her Majesty's Government, simply because they wished to support the country in its great difficulty and in its great danger, and in the great trouble which, unfortunately, by the action of the Government, and the action of the Government alone, it was placed in at that moment.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE: I am anxious that my noble Friend (Lord Eustace Cecil) should not run away with the impression that I intended to imply that the plant shipped by Messrs. Lucas and Aird was not fit to be sent out for the construction of the railway from Suakin to Berber. Messrs. Lucas and Aird are men of the highest character and experience, and I would not for a moment cast the slightest reflection upon their integrity. What I did mean to imply was that it might be a very good arrangement for them, as they were getting "fair and reasonable" prices for the plant—prices according to the contract to be fixed by themselves.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he quite accepted the explanation of the hon. Baronet.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he wished to protest against the policy which he believed the Government had adopted in great haste and in a moment of great excitement. They had decided to send Lord Wolseley to the relief of General Gordon and when the gallant General plunged into his great enterprize, no doubt, the great majority of the people of this country approved of the step decided upon by the Government, although there must have been in many minds serious misgivings with regard to the advisability of the course General Gordon had pursued. He submitted to the Committee that they were now in a somewhat different position than they were when the hasty decision was come to about going forth to Khartoum and overthrowing the Mahdi there; the proposal that was now before them was for making a railway from Suakin to Berber. But when that suggestion was first made by Lord Wolseley he did not contemplate withdrawing his troops some hundreds of miles from the position he then occupied. They were told, in justification of the course the Government had determined upon, that it was absolutely necessary that they should go to Khartoum, in order, amongst other things, that the friendly tribes who had been co-operating with them might not be discouraged and left in the lurch; but he wished to ask in what position they had left those friendly tribes upon the hundreds of miles of their retreat? Now, at that moment the House of Commons was in this position. Right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite were most cordial, almost gushing, in their readiness to support the Government in this expenditure. ["Oh, oh!"] Why, every hon. and right hon. Gentleman who had spoken from the other side of the House had said he was quite prepared to support the Government on this Vote; but the Committee had received the intimation that their support was to be given on one condition; and that was that the Party on the other side of the House, when possibly all the mischief had come out of the policy which the Government were pursuing, might then be at liberty to turn round and brand the Government, and the Liberal Party generally, not only as blunderers, but as political criminals. It was said there was a large party who wished to save the Government from that future humiliation; and it was for that reason he had ventured, as representing a large constituency, to express what he believed to be the feeling of the great majority of the town of which he had the honour of being one of the Representatives, against the course which the Government had entered upon. From what had dropped from the mouths of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, he still believed there was a disposition on the part of the Government to reconsider the decision they had come to. He thought the Party on the Ministerial side of the House would not necessarily hurry the Government into any hasty declarations of a change of policy. Happily, there were six months of hot weather abroad, and of cooling temperature at home; cooling, because this country would look more deliberately into the situation. Further, the political temperature would be reduced by the consideration that the expenditure which the Government was incurring, and the increased taxation which would ensue, would bring into play the feelings and the determination of large numbers of people in the country, who, up to that moment, had counted for little in the decision that had been taken. Now, he wished to point out that most of the Gentlemen who had spoken from the other side of the House were county Representatives. The hon. and gallant Baronet Sir Walter B. Barttelot was a county Representative; and he, and almost every Gentleman who had spoken from the other side of the House, had not as yet felt the touch of the new voters in the country. It was worth notice that those who had opposed the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and sought to restrain them in their undue ardour for these military enterprises, did represent the great populations of the country; and he ventured to intimate to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite that they might find they had miscalculated the feeling of the country when, at the next General Election, they came to deal with Hodge, and with those persons to whom increased burdens were by no means agreeable. He could not help saying, in passing, that the Party opposite had attempted to hang by the skirts of General Gordon in a most unworthy manner. Up to the 4th of February everybody in the country had a right to believe that the Military Expedition sent for the relief of General Gordon was about to be successful; and on the 4th of February the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) happened to be speaking at the "True Blue Club" in the City of Gloucester. The right hon. Gentleman replied to the toast of the county Members of the House of Commons; and in The Times of the 5th of February he was reported to have asked the members of the Club—

"Were the lives and was the money spent in the Soudan to go for naught but the rescue of a man who had said he was perfectly able to take care of himself?"

His (Mr. Illingworth's) belief was that, judging from what was just let out at the most unfortunate moment possible, if the Military Expedition had been successful, and Gordon had been rescued, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) would have turned round on the Government and have said that the success was a paltry business, and that Gordon was never in any serious danger, and ought to have been left to himself; but, having gone to the Soudan, it was their duty to retain the whole of it and get out of it, whatever profit it was capable of. In his (Mr. Illingworth's) opinion, the duty of those who represented large constituencies where the householders had votes was to intimate to the Government that there was really no enthusiasm for the line upon which they had entered. He and his hon. Friends were willing to make every allowance for the position in which the Government had found itself. The noble Lord who last spoke (Lord Eustace Cecil) had said that he objected to the whole of the policy of the Government—from the first blunder of the bombardment of Alexandria to the last enterprise which ended before Khartoum. It was somewhat singular that, so far as he, Mr.

Mr. Illingworth.

Illingworth) had been able to ascertain, the entire Party opposite, whenever a critical moment had come, had supported the Government. The Conservative Party had been so concerned to maintain the Executive, whether right or wrong, that it had never at any moment, so far as he knew, separated itself from that Party whose policy the noble Lord said was so disastrous and so unsatisfactory. There might be individual exceptions; but, speaking generally of that Party, and especially of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench, it was unfortunately true that the Government would be able to include them in whatever misfortunes and crimes this country had been guilty of in this Sudan business. He only wished to say, further, that they were not very far from the time of a General Election; and he hoped the electors of the country would speak out unmistakably with regard to these military enterprises, which had resulted in great loss of life, and in political disasters from first to last. Now, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had pleaded over and over again, with some force, that the Government found itself in a very unfortunate position in taking Office, owing to engagements to which the previous Government had committed them. Well, that was true; but the blame which, he thought, might fairly be against the Government was this: that, with all the right hon. Gentleman's power and ability, he did not extricate himself and his Government from those conditions. He (Mr. Illingworth) believed there were moments when it might have been possible—it might have been done. When France refused to join them and withdrew her Fleet from Alexandria, surely that was a time when the right hon. Gentleman and the Government might have asked themselves whether an opportunity had not been afforded for the reconsideration of the terms of the agreement by which the two Governments had bound themselves. He (Mr. Illingworth) was bound to make in some respects a painful confession, and that was that no Government found it easy to escape from the spirit which was generated by the London Press, London society, and the official classes in the country, and he, for one, was not at that moment expecting to influence the decision of the Government; but he was venturing to suggest to many outside, who only wanted to know the right course to pursue, what it was possible for them to do. Now, if they were really to restrain the Government, it would be necessary for the people of the country to speak out most distinctly. They had had strained relationship, they were told, with France, with Germany, and they were also in a somewhat critical position, it was to be feared, with regard to another Great Power. Well, Governments, he believed, found themselves so hemmed in by the militarism of the day that unless the people spoke over the heads of the Government there was no escape from the misfortunes which now surrounded them. He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt) was in his place, because he did not hesitate to say that he entirely sympathized with that hon. Gentleman's speech the other day to the working classes of Paris. A better Representative of the working classes in this country could not be found than the hon. Gentleman; and therefore none was more fitting to make the appeal from nation to nation than the hon. Gentleman, in order to induce an international effort to overthrow the greatest curse of the present day—the militarism of all the countries in Europe. He (Mr. Illingworth) believed it was the duty of the Representatives of the people, and those who had some regard for the burdens that were to be put upon the shoulders of the people, to speak out at a moment like the present. They were all aware that in every direction there was severe commercial, industrial, and agricultural depression, and that few men could point out any substantial signs of improvement in the commercial horizon. If, then, the country was descending to a lower position of comfort, surely this was a time for the people's Representatives in the House of Commons to use every endeavour to curb the disposition which was shown in so many quarters to indulge in doubtful military enterprises. From the outset he had deplored and voted against these enterprises in Egypt. He thought that by what they had done in the Sudan they had been guilty of little short of crime, and he beseeched the Government to remember their pacific pledges, and not to be carried away by the fatal desire to overthrow the Mahdi at Khartoum. If Her Majesty's Government would allow wiser counsels to prevail, it was his conviction they would be supported by the great majority of the people of the country.

MR. GORST said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) found fault with hon. Members sitting on the Opposition side of the House, because they had supported Her Majesty's Government in times of national difficulty. He (Mr. Gorst) felt bound to confess that speeches such as they had just heard received in silence by Her Majesty's Government, and not at once renounced and repudiated by them, rendered it extremely difficult for anyone on the Opposition side of the House who had the welfare of the nation at heart to continue to support the Executive Government. He was very much struck with what the hon. Member for Bradford said—he who knew his Leaders, he who knew those who sat on the Treasury Bench much better than he (Mr. Gorst) and his hon. Friends did. The hon. Member said he had every reason to expect that in the course of the coming summer the Government's present projects in the Soudan would be abandoned, and the policy of the Party sitting below the Gangway would be adopted. The hon. Member thought it would be so. He (Mr. Gorst) was afraid it might be so; but he could not help thinking of something that would happen before that change of policy on the part of the Government took place, of something which was likely to happen in the neighbourhood of Suakin within the next two or three weeks, and that was what was so glibly talked about in that House—the dispersion of Osman Digna's Forces. What was the meaning of the dispersion of Osman Digna's Forces? It meant that some thousands of poor Arab people, rightly struggling to be free, were to be slaughtered; that a number of homes were to be made desolate; and that, in addition to the evils that had already been inflicted upon that unhappy quarter of the globe, further slaughter and further devastation was to take place. Well, they might reconcile themselves to witnessing a horrible event of that kind brought about by their power, by their money, and promoted by their Government, if it was to lead to any satisfactory result for the benefit of mankind at large. But if that slaughter was to take place, and the result was to be that the policy of the Government was to be abandoned, and that nothing was to come of it; if neither they nor the persons against whom they made war were to be any the better, it really made one pause and doubt whether one ought, after all, to support the policy of Her Majesty's Government. He recognized to the full the great responsibility this country was undertaking that night. It was going to vote the men and the money for this Expedition to Suakin. He did not grudge the money, though, in the present distressed condition of the country, it was not pleasant to think that they were going to embark on an expenditure of many millions of money. But that was the smallest part of the consideration. They were going to sacrifice a great number of their soldiers and sailors, and of thousands of their enemies. He could not help asking himself and asking the Committee, what better should they be for it all a year or two hence? If he felt sure that the Government would persevere in a policy which they said they considered necessary for the welfare of this country and for the welfare of Egypt he would support them cheerfully; but when he heard one of their own supporters, one of their most cherished supporter, a man whom he believed was in their secrets and confidence, boldly announcing from his seat below the Gangway, amidst the cheers of the supporters of the Government, that they were going to change their policy, and when such a speech was received with silence by right hon. Gentlemen who sat upon the Treasury Bench, and when not one of them rose when the hon. Member sat down, for the purpose of denouncing and repudiating such a speech, he confessed it was enough to make those on the Opposition Benches pause before giving their votes to the Government. Another consideration which ought to make them pause was that this was not the first time that this state of things had been exhibited to the world. There was an Expedition to the Soudan last year. He believed that that Expedition was commenced when the Government had some settled purpose. He did not think so ill of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister as to believe he would have sent a body of English troops to fight two bloody battles and come away without some result. He believed the right hon. Gentleman had a purpose, and he believed that purpose was abandoned in consequence of the pressure put upon him by hon. Gentlemen sitting below the Gangway on the Ministerial side of the House. Having seen that done one year, he confessed he did not think they were unreasonable in having apprehensions that the same thing might be done again. He thought that, at the present moment, the Government had no business to halt between two opinions; they ought either to make up their minds to pursue the policy already announced to the House in the debate on the Vote of Censure in such strong terms by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War the Marquess of Hartington—they ought either to make up their minds to follow that policy out to the end and tell the House of Commons and the country so, or they ought at once to agree with the hon. Member for Bradford Mr. Illingworth. It might be that they might lose some small amount of prestige, it might be that they might have a good deal of ridicule to encounter at the hands of foreign nations; but rather let them do that now than change their minds after they had slaughtered a few thousands more of Arabs. The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) said, and said truly, that their relations with foreign countries were strained. No doubt their relations with Russia were so strained that it would be almost unpatriotic to say a word upon the subject in that House at the present moment. Their relations with Germany were very strained; but he did not hesitate to speak about their relations with that country, because he believed it was absolutely impossible for the most reckless Minister in the world to cause a war, or even a serious quarrel, between this country and Germany. He thought that was the opinion of Prince Bismarck, that however the Rulers of the two countries might quarrel at each other, the two nations would insist upon peace being observed. Surely, when their relations were strained with all Foreign Powers, when they had this great difficulty of the Sudan upon their shoulders, the Government ought to have one single set purpose and one single determined mind, and they had no right to call upon Members who sat upon the Opposition side of the House for their assistance and support, unless they meant honestly and fairly to carry out the policy they had announced.

Mr. SLAGG said, the Prime Minister had assured the Committee that the Vote which had just been passed had no necessary relation with the operations in the Sudan. As a matter of fact, it might very well appear that there were reasons at the present time which made it prudent for Her Majesty's Government, and those who sat behind Ministers, to be prepared in every reasonable way for military operations whenever and wherever they might happen to be necessary. On that ground he had supported the last Vote. The Vote now under consideration, however, related to the railway between Suakin and Berber. There could be no ambiguity about the objects of that railway; its construction related to one thing and one thing only, and that was the prosecution, in some form or other, of military operations in the neighbourhood of Khartoum. Against those operations, in any degree, he must record his most emphatic protest. He objected to them on grounds of humanity; he objected to them on grounds of policy. The construction of the railway he regarded, indeed, as an absolute impossibility. It was not necessary that one should pause at this moment to inquire what was the exact policy of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the present operations. He was not concerned to know whether it was the object of the Government to smash the Mahdi, to square the Mahdi when smashed, or to do any other thing which had been described to the House in the somewhat divergent speeches of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench. He had recently paid a visit to Egypt, and although he should hardly presume, on the strength of a very short residence in the country, to pose as an authority on Egyptian questions, he thought it might be admitted that one gained by a short sojourn in Egypt a somewhat more vivid impression as to the state of affairs than could possibly be obtained by a perusal of the Blue Books, and still less of the speeches delivered in that House. While in Egypt he formed one strong impression, and it was supported by authority which, if he could only give the names, would be admitted by Members of the Committee to be absolutely undeniable. That impression was that the proposed railway was a practical impossibility. He had also formed the opinion that any military operations in the Soudan were destined to failure, for the one sole and simple reason that the climate in that region forbade any hope of success. He knew brave men at Cairo at the present moment who had been ordered to go to the Soudan, men who never flinched at the call of duty, but who were appalled at the prospect of the horrors and miseries which were in store for them and all those who were ordered by Her Majesty's Government to go to the Soudan at this season. He had reviewed with competent authorities the dangers and probabilities of the situation; and he was assured that no British troops could hope to cope successfully with the climate, either now or under the circumstances of a permanent occupation. To bring troops from India to fight the Mahdi would be a measure fraught with very grave consequences. To attempt to fight battles there by the assistance of Black troops from the West Indies was clearly out of the question, because he was assured by good authorities that they did not possess the qualities needed for that sort of warfare, and the Committee knew from recent events how little confidence could be placed in the Egyptian Army. That being the case, it seemed to him little short of madness to continue military operations in the Soudan. But as to the railway, he believed that that railway could not be made in face of the hostility of the Native Tribes. Members of the Committee knew the geographical and physical difficulties of the country; but perhaps they did not all remember the fact that the tribes who inhabited the country through which the proposed railway was to go were very largely interested in the carrying trade between Khartoum and the sea coast. For that reason alone the tribes would present the most strenuous opposition to a scheme which would doom to destruction their greatest industry. He believed there were insuperable difficulties in the way of that project, and he certainly hoped that Her Majesty's Government would abandon the idea. He had no doubt that his hon. Friends on those Benches who, like himself, desired the commercial development of the Soudan, and who hoped that the country might at some time or other be thrown open to British commerce, did look favourably on the construction of a commercial railway from the fertile regions around Khartoum to the sea coast; but this was a purely military railway, and he was perfectly certain that it could not be made in the teeth of the enormous opposition which the tribes would bring against it. The only way they could make it was by pacific commercial arrangements; by convincing the inhabitants that their commercial and agricultural interests would be advanced by such a project, and by gaining their hearty co-operation and good will in the work. He knew that the great objection to the abandonment of—and yet he would like to abandon—all attempts at further military operations in the Soudan was that the Mahdi might thereby be encouraged to invade Egypt. He was willing to give his own personal testimony to the fact that the successes of the Mahdi had elicited abundant sympathy amongst the Mahomedan population at Cairo. But they must not lose sight of the fact that this was a religious as well as a political war, and that the fanatical inhabitants of Cairo were looking on to see whether the Mahdi was by his successes proving himself to be the true Prophet, and whether on account of his successes he ought to be religiously recognized or not. Naturally the sympathies of the Mahomedan people were with a Mahomedan Chief, even if he were a pretender, as against Christians; and he believed that the antipathy and fanaticism aroused by the Mahdi's successes was not directed against English people alone, but comprehended the Copts, the Germans, the French, and all other peoples of the Christian faith. But he asked how it was possible that a Chief like the Mahdi, with the military resources he commanded, could be a threatening power to the position of this country in Egypt? That this Mahdi was not a great military commander in the sense of possessing huge resources was a fact which must not be lost sight of. His military operations were necessarily of the most limited nature possible, and another point which he wanted to impress on the Committee was that his followers were not the members of an Army in an ordinary sense; they were not the paid, organized, and enrolled elements of a systemized military arrangement, but members of tribes with families, homesteads with little portions of cultivated land which he was sure they would be loth to leave behind; which they only deserted for a brief period for the purpose of taking part in the neighbouring military operations, and which there was good reason to suppose they would not permanently desert and leave at the mercy of turbulent forces in their rear, with the object of undertaking the impossible task of crossing into Egypt. He thought they might calm their minds with regard to that apprehension. Surely the British power was sufficient to keep off any possible incursion of the Mahdi on the true Frontier of Egypt. That Frontier he should, with all deference, be disposed to place somewhere about Assuan, the defence of which was easy owing to natural conditions. He believed that it had been absolutely stated that there was no difficulty whatever in regard to Lord Wolseley's retirement by the Nile; that even at that moment his retreat by boats was quite a possible undertaking. He was not advising retreat; he did not pretend to suggest what the military course should be; but when it was said that these new operations were needed to provide means of escape for General Wolseley he was bound to say that he could not credit it. Another important point which appealed to him, as an Englishman and a man of honour, was the question of a proper attitude for those friendly tribes which had stood by them in their need. But he was bound to confess that some of the declarations of Her Majesty's Ministers had been more perilous to those friendly tribes than any desertion of them could possibly be. He believed that if it had been understood by them that we were going to do one thing or the other, both the garrisons, some of whom were massacred, and those tribes to whom we were allied, would have made better provision for their own safety than they had made. He was convinced that the country had as much on hand in Egypt Proper as it could well manage without embarking on enormous and indefinite operations in the Soudan, a region so vast that their imaginations were taxed to grasp its full dimensions—a region full of horrors, full of diseases and disasters, an arid waste which had swallowed up many and many an Army already, and which awaited with its devouring jaws any Army they might have the unwisdom to send into it again.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, the question which I apprehend is immediately before the Committee is the propriety of passing a Vote which is to commit us to the establishment of a railway from Suakin to Berber, or, as the noble Marquess, I think, put it, towards Berber. But the speeches which have recently been delivered, especially the admirable speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), and that of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, raised the question beyond the mere detail of the construction of a railway, and rather compelled us to consider what ought to be our position in respect of the policy which Her Majesty's Government are now pursuing. We have within the last few days challenged the position of Her Majesty's Government and explained our views with regard to the errors we think they have committed, and have given our reasons for calling upon Parliament to express an opinion hostile to their management of affairs. Parliament has refused—or rather this House has refused—to respond to that appeal, and has determined to continue to place its confidence in Her Majesty's Government. That being so, we are obliged to look at every question that arises from a point of view different, of course, from what we should have done if we had been able to rely on the support of the House of Commons for our policy. At the present time the Government are proceeding to take certain steps which are intended, in the first place, to relieve our Army, already committed deeply in Egypt; and, in the second place, I hope, to establish something in the nature of a firm and settled and orderly Government within the regions of the Soudan, towards which we have contracted very deep obligations. What is our connection with the Soudan? If the Committee will follow me they will see that it is really this. For various reasons which I need not pause to mention, we have a deep interest in the maintenance of a stable condition of affairs in Egypt Proper; from circumstances which I will not trouble the Committee with, and with which they are familiar, we have secured a position in Egypt which gives us the power, and with that power the right, and even the duty, of advising Egypt with regard to various parts of her conduct and administration; and amongst those parts of her administration which gives the greatest anxiety, and upon which Her Majesty's Government some time ago thought it necessary to interpose rather vigorously, was the question of the relations between Egypt and the Soudan. The conclusion at which Her Majesty's Government arrived was ultimately to call upon the Egyptian Government to abandon the Soudan and to withdraw their garrisons. That was the counsel given, and which was expressed by our Representatives; and it was expressed with such force, and insisted upon with such pertinacity, that the Egyptian Government had to be changed, and we practically took the whole responsibility upon ourselves. Well, Sir, if we had left the matter at that time, the Egyptian Government, acting on our assurances, would no doubt, in some way or other, have accomplished that which we had ordered, or would have taken steps to accomplish it by the withdrawal of their garrisons in the Soudan; but, instead of that being left to the Egyptian Government to manage as they pleased, we committed ourselves to the mission of General Gordon, who went to Khartoum in the hope—and in the not altogether unfounded hope—that he might be able, by the exercise of his great influence, and by the knowledge he had of the country, and the character he had established among the people, that he might be able, in a peaceable manner, to accomplish the object of the withdrawal of the Egyptian troops, and establish something like order in the Soudan. When we go through the general features of General Gordon's mission, it seems to us that, on several occasions, Her Majesty's Government were not giving him all the support he desired, and that they had made his task all the more difficult by not carrying out the proposals which he made. But, whether it was so or not, it seems it was impossible for General Gordon to accomplish the object he had in view, unless some very different course were taken, and that it would be necessary for the Government to take some decided steps to enable him to retire from Khartoum, and to bring with him those who were to be brought away. Well, Sir, that led to the recent Expedition, with which we are cognizant—an Expedition which was undertaken under circumstances which did not reflect altogether high credit upon the discernment of Her Majesty's Government. I think they fell into their old error of acting reluctantly, and therefore with indecision, and without force. Her Majesty's Government says this will be a very cheap Expedition; but it seems to me that it will be one of the dearest Expeditions ever known. One of the most costly, in point of money, was the Abyssinian Expedition; but I venture to say that this Expedition is much more costly than that, for we have to take into account not only the money spent, but the blood to be shed; and if more money were spent on the Abyssinian Expedition than was consistent with the strictest details of economy, it had, at least, this result—that no blood was shed until the last moment, and then only a very small action took place, which completed the object of the Expedition. But the reluctance of Her Majesty's Government to put sufficient force into their military measures, their evident hesitation, explanations, apologies, excuses, and explaining away, which have accompanied everything they have done, have robbed their actions of a great deal of their moral force. If you act with hesitation and uncertainty at first, it requires greater force and violence in the end to accomplish your object. With regard to this particular proposal before us, we on this side of the House should, I think, feel the greatest reluctance to appear in any way unwilling to grant that which Her Majesty's Government tell us is necessary, in order to accomplish the ends which they have in view. It would be a disgrace to us if we were in any way to hold back from giving Supplies which may be necessary to disengage our gallant troops who have suffered so much; and we feel that nothing can be more unfortunate than that the Army of Lord Wolseley should be compelled to retreat after failing in its object altogether. We feel also that we should be guilty of a very grave crime towards those people in the Soudan, for whom my hon. and learned Friend the Member for

Sir Stafford Northcote

Chatham Mr. Gorst) is so much concerned, if we were now to retire from the country, destroying our influence in Egypt; if we were to retire from the Soudan practically defeated, and leaving matters in a state of confusion, such as would result from our intention not having been carried out. With regard to the policy of the railway, as I understand it, it is looked upon as a question of a military character. I do not pretend to that military knowledge which would entitle me to speak of it from that point of view; but, looking at it as a political question, and regarding it upon general grounds, it appears to me that the railway gives the key to that which ought to be the true policy with regard to the Soudan. We cannot leave the Soudan altogether; we do not wish to hand it back to Egypt. On the other hand, we do not want to plunge our Forces into the heart of Africa; we have occupation for them elsewhere; but we do want to open the country, as we can do from our base in the Red Sea, and that will give us great advantage in any settlement we may be able to make with regard to the future government of the country. I do not say what would be the precise form of that settlement. But there would be a settlement. That some rulers could be found to undertake the administration of important points, such as Berber and Khartoum, appears to me to be unquestionable, if we only set about it in a proper spirit—if we set about it with the intention of impressing the people of the Soudan with our power and determination, and with a firm conviction that this is not with us a question of a year only, but a question of their permanent good, and of the permanent settlement of that part of the country. I believe it is open to us to accomplish it in this way; but we must have courage and firmness, and we must endeavour, as far as we can, to look at it unanimously here. But not only the language used by the Government, but even the language used by hon. Gentlemen who hold different views with regard to our duties in Egypt and the Soudan, is, I think, unfortunate. Such language, although I do not complain of hon. Members using language which represents their opinions, cannot but weaken our arms in dealing with this question. I cannot say that our feeling is one of confidence in, or satisfaction with, the Government; but believing that it is necessary for us, in the present state of affairs, to support the action they are taking, and especially with regard to this question of constructing a railway, we feel it our duty to support them on this occasion.

Mr. WARTON said, he took the liberty of interposing for a few moments between the Committee and the division, in order to state what he thought had not been clearly brought out in the course of the debate. He pointed out that if after Tel-el-Kebir, when they had Egypt at their feet, when they had destroyed the Egyptian Army, when they were masters of the country, and had not incurred any peril with regard to other Powers—if their Ministers had been statesmen, they would have been able to take a correct view of the position and of their duty in connection with it. He said they ought then to have settled at once what parts of the Soudan were necessary and absolutely essential to Egypt; and that they ought then to have set about making the railway from Suakin to Berber. He hoped, although at the time in question the Government had no idea of their position, that they had a correct idea of it now. The Government, in his opinion, should clearly state their policy, and tell the House and the country what they really intended to do; if they did not make a clear statement, the country would, perhaps, find fault with the blood which might again be shed in vain; and it might be necessary for the Prime Minister to publish a new edition of Lessons in Massacre, with illustrations by the author.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 56; Noes 173: Majority 117.—Div. List, No. 44.)

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL desired to ask the Prime Minister what Her Majesty's Government intended to do in regard to the Indian Vote?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he hoped that after the two discussions which had taken place on these Votes the Committee might be inclined to discuss the Indian Motion at once.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the Committee would be aware that he had a Motion on the Paper somewhat different to that which had just been passed; and, supposing they were to go on with these Votes now, he should like to say a few words on the subject. He objected not only to the railway, but to the whole of these Votes in respect of the Soudan. He listened to one part of the noble Marquess's speech that evening with some satisfaction, for it gave them reason to believe that that Campaign had been conducted more cheaply, more satisfactorily, and more brilliantly than any other Campaign they had been engaged in. He only hoped that the noble Marquess would telegraph his speech to Lord Wolseley, so that that General might be induced to refrain from making any more speeches as to their determination of going on to Khartoum before that House was committed to such a step. It seemed to him, however, that what was said by the Surveyor General of the Ordnance (Mr. Brand) was a direct contradiction of that which had been stated by the Secretary of State for War. The noble Marquess had said that they were not committed to go to Khartoum; but the Surveyor General of Ordnance had declared that the object of the construction of the railway would be effected when Lord Wolseley had advanced to Berber. He thought the country ought to realize the enormous cost which those operations would involve; and, on that account, he could not allow the Vote to pass without a word of protest.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he could not make out if his hon. Friend was going to divide against the Vote or not. If he did not, he (Mr. Labouchere) would not divide the Committee, because it appeared to him that the Benches behind him constituted the most illogical side of the Committee. He had voted against the railway, but it struck him that he might not have been quite right in doing so. The railway was a military work, and if they were to go to Khartoum at all the railway might be desirable. For his part, he would have preferred to have voted against the whole Vote. He could not understand how hon. Members who strained at a gnat could swallow a camel. They had voted once against the Government on this subject; but it was too much to expect them to vote twice in the same evening against their Leaders, so he would content himself with protesting against this Vote, as he would against every shilling that was spent of the taxpayers' money for these operations in Egypt and the Soudan.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR believed that the necessity for the 3,000 men and their pay, which had been voted that evening, was really due to the maladministration of the War Office. He contended that if the present Government had followed out the plan of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, there would have been no necessity for the Votes that night. In 1881, speaking of War Office reform, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer said the arrangement which he then proposed to make would prevent the necessity of asking for further additions to the Army in the case of short wars. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

“According to the Establishments of the year 1880-1, there were:—Six battalions at home, consisting of 800 rank and file; 6 of 720; 6 of 640; 6 of 560; and 43 of 480, all with depôts of 80, except in the case of 8 brigades having both their battalions abroad, which had 280. In the Colonies there were 24 battalions, of which 16 had an establishment of 600 rank and file, and nine of 800. We propose that in future there shall be at home 12 battalions of 950 rank and file; 4 of 850; 4 of 650; 8 of 500; and 43 of 480. Eight of the battalions of 950, and four of those of 850, will have depôts of 150 rank and file, which will furnish drafts to the other battalion of the regiment; the remainder small depôts of 50. In the Mediterranean and the Colonies there will be 20 battalions, each of 800 rank and file. The 12 first regiments, containing, with their depôts, 1,100 rank and file each, and six of the Mediterranean regiments, containing 800 men each, and ready to be raised to 1,000 efficient from their home battalions, will, with three battalions of the Guards, six regiments of Cavalry, and 17 batteries of Horse and Field Artillery, be always in a state of preparedness; and next to the 12 home regiments will come four of 850 each, which could also promptly be raised to war strength. We shall thus, after these changes have been completed, be able at any moment, and on the shortest notice, to bring together and despatch a corps d'armée, consisting of 18 battalions of the Line, three of the Guards, six regiments of Cavalry, and 17 batteries of Artillery; and this without trenching on the four regiments of Infantry required for our annual reliefs, under a system which I will endeavour to explain to the House.”—(3 Hansard, [259] 205-6.)

That was the plan which the right hon. Gentleman put forward in 1881; but in 1882 he again alluded to the subject, and he said this—

“First of all, I should like to explain what has been the result of that change which I proposed last year; and to which, I confess, I attach almost higher importance than to any other change in our military arrangements—I mean what I proposed to do in order to meet, as far as we could, the want of preparedness for small wars about which so much has been said, and which, to a certain extent, must be admitted to have existed during previous years. It is quite true that when we had, in the August of the year in which we first took Office, very suddenly to send out a considerable force to India after the battle of Mairwand, and, again, when, in the early part of the following year, we had to send out a considerable force to South Africa, we succeeded in despatching both those bodies of men without incurring the remarks and the censures which had been made on former occasions, but I am bound to admit that we succeeded at the expense of a serious dislocation of our Roster, and that measure of success did not warrant me in abstaining from submitting to Parliament such changes as I thought should be effected in order that we might be always able to send to distant parts, if necessary, a sufficient force for one of those minor wars without the dislocation which we had experienced."

The right hon. Gentleman added this—

"And I proposed to effect this by adding nearly 3,000 men to the Infantry, by which means the regiments at the top of the Roster might be so strengthened as to give us always a complete Army Corps ready for service."—(3 Hansard, '867) 833-4 :

The right hon. Gentleman went on further to say—and these were the last words he would quote—

"I may say, also, that we have not neglected the other arrangements necessary for the despatch of an Army Corps in case of emergency—an Army Corps comprising not only Infantry and Cavalry, but Engineers, Artillery, Ammunition Reserves, Commissariat, and Siege Train. We are now in such a position that, if it were necessary to despatch abroad an Army Corps with all its equipment, it could be despatched as soon as the transports were prepared."—(Ibid., 837)

Well, the statements from which he had read extracts were made in perfectly good faith by the then War Minister (Mr. Childers); and if the right hon. Gentleman's system had been kept in view, of maintaining at the highest strength those battalions which were next on the Roster for foreign service, and of keeping the other battalions up to adequate strength in proportion to their position on the Roster, there would have been no necessity, in the event of 20,000 or 30,000 men being required, for such a Vote of men as had been passed that night. It was evident that there was a very great difference between the present administration of the War Office and the administration of three or four years ago, and that the change had not been made for the better.

EAST INDIA EXPENSES (MILITARY EXPEDITION TO THE SOUDAN).

RESOLUTION. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [5th March].

"That, Her Majesty having directed a Military Expedition of Her Native forces charged upon the revenues of India to be despatched for service in the Soudan and Nubia, this House consents that the ordinary pay of such troops, as well as the ordinary charges of any vessels belonging to the Government of India that may be employed in the Expedition, which would have been charged upon the revenues of India if such troops or vessels had remained in that country or seas adjacent, shall continue to be so chargeable: Provided, that if it shall become necessary to replace the troops or vessels so withdrawn by other vessels or Native forces, the expense of raising, maintaining, and providing such vessels or forces shall be repaid out of any moneys which may be provided by Parliament for the purposes of the said Expedition."—(Mr. J. K. Cross)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. J. K. CROSS: In rising to support the Resolution which I had the honour to move the other night, I must say that the discussions which have taken place in this House during the last few weeks, and the decision to support the policy of the Government at which the House has arrived, render it unnecessary for me to enter into the controversial question as to whether it is or is not desirable to send a Force to Suakin for the prosecution of military operations. This decision having been taken, we have to consider the means by which it may be carried out; and we ask the consent of Parliament to the despatch to the Soudan of a certain number of Her Majesty's Indian Native Troops for such time as they may be required, still keeping them on the Establishment of India. Hon. Members are, doubtless, aware that by the 55th section of the Act of 1858, for the better Government of India, it is necessary first to obtain the consent of Parliament before any portion of the Revenues of India can be even temporarily advanced for the purpose we have in view. Perhaps it will be as well that I should read that section to the House. It is as follows:—

“Except for preventing or repelling actual invasion of Her Majesty’s Indian Possessions, or under other sudden and urgent necessity, the Revenues of India shall not, without the consent of both Houses of Parliament, be applicable to defray the expenses of any military operation, carried on beyond the external frontiers of such Possessions by Her Majesty’s Forces charged upon such Revenues.”

Now, I may remind the House that upon several occasions when it has been proposed to employ Native troops beyond the Frontier, and especially beyond the sea, various opinions have been expressed as to the exact construction to be put upon this section; but everybody who wishes to look straight at the law must come to the conclusion that it is necessary to appeal at once to Parliament to sanction the proposal. Hon. Members are aware that several Expeditions have taken place in which Indian troops have been employed; but one strange thing is that the division or apportionment of charge between India and England has not been made according to any definite rule. In the first China War of 1839-40 all the ordinary charges were borne by India, and all the extraordinary charges by this country; in the China War between 1856 and 1859 all the expenses were paid by England. In the Persian War of 1856 all the ordinary charges were paid by India, while the extraordinary charges were paid half by India and half by this country. In the Abyssinian War the ordinary charges were paid by India, and the extraordinary charges by England. In the Perak Expedition of 1875 all the ordinary charges were placed upon the Indian Government, and the extraordinary charges upon the Imperial Government. In the Malta Expedition of 1878, when a number of Indian troops were brought from Bombay to Malta, the whole expenses were borne by this country. Then we have the last Expedition undertaken in 1882, the Egyptian Expedition, where all the ordinary charges were borne by India, and 60 per cent of the extraordinary charges were also borne by India, while about 40 per cent were borne by this country. Hon. Gentlemen will notice the very considerable difference between the proportion of the charge borne by India and that borne by England. Let me just explain to the House what is the difference that is to be found between the ordinary and the extraordinary charges on the various occasions I have mentioned. The ordinary expenses of the Native Forces of the Indian Army, including everything that could be charged against them, such as superannuation charges, and all charges for pensions, &c., cannot be reckoned at more than £50 per man per annum, or just over £4 per man per month; but the charges in the Abyssinian Expedition we found came to £70 per man per month, and we found that the extraordinary expenses were about £60 per man per month. It therefore seems that the extraordinary charges on that occasion came to at least 15 or 16 times as much as the ordinary charges maintained in India. The same thing is observable in the extraordinary expenses of the Indian Contingent of the Egyptian Expedition in 1882, for they amounted to about £66 per man per month on the effective strength. I may be asked what precedent we intend to follow on this occasion? We may, on the one hand, be challenged to follow the precedent of 1882, or, on the other hand, we may be challenged to follow that of 1878; and I am bound to say that, if the circumstances were similar, we might take either the one precedent or the other. But, Sir, is the present case similar, either to that of 1882 or to that of 1878? In 1882 we were afraid of the closing of the Suez Canal. Our direct road to the East was supposed to be in danger, and the maintenance of the great waterway to the East was so important to India, that Indian troops were asked for to take part in the Expedition for its preservation, because it was held that India benefited immensely by the communication with Europe—more, indeed, than almost any country in the world, because the Channel cheapened everything that India had to buy in Europe, and gave her a distinct advantage in everything she had to sell in Europe, especially when compared with the position in which she would have been placed had there been no Canal, or if the Canal had been closed. My noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington), who at the time held the Office of Secretary of State for India, then explained this matter by showing that the proportion of the trade of India which was carried through the Suez Canal was, with England, 87½ per cent; with France, 88½ per cent; with Germany, 95 per cent; with Italy, 99 per cent, and so on; and that such an amount of trade could not have been carried on at all were it not for the Suez Canal. The Canal was therefore proved to be of vast importance to India—more important, indeed, to India than to almost any other country. Well, Sir, that is the precedent of 1842; but what is the precedent of 1878, when the whole charges, both ordinary and extraordinary, were borne by this country? I do not think that that is a parallel case to the one which is now to be considered, because in that case Indian troops were brought from Bombay to Europe as a demonstration against a European Power, and the charges were taken over by us, because those Indian troops were considered to be acting in English interests. The present Motion, therefore, does not stand on the same footing as that of 1878. It may be said, indeed, that the present Expedition arises out of our position in Egypt; but it does not directly come into connection with our present position in Egypt in the same way as in 1842, because India has not anything like the same financial interest in the present Expedition as she had in that of 1842. The present Expedition arises, to a considerable extent, out of the generous and philanthropic impulses of the people of this country, who could not bear to contemplate the possibility of what might happen to the Soudan garrisons, and who, therefore, determined to attempt their relief by military measures. While, Sir, on the one hand we cannot say that India has anything the same interest in the present Expedition that she had in the Expedition of 1842, yet, on the other hand, it must be allowed that she has a considerably greater interest in it than she had in the Expedition of 1878; for anything which occurs to disturb the equilibrium of the Mahommedan world, either in Eastern Africa or in Western Asia, or anything which affects the success of our arms in countries at no great distance from India, must much more affect India than anything which occurs in the Bosphorus or in the Balkan Peninsula. I do not wish to exaggerate the importance of what is going on in the Eastern Soudan, but I may put the question very plainly to any individual man of common sense, and simply ask this—will the knowledge that a barbarian military leader has baffled the efforts of Her Majesty's troops be an element of good or evil in India; and is it, in that sense, an Indian interest or not? So great an Indian interest does it appear to be, that some of the Native Princes of India—those who govern Hyderabad, Bhopal, Puttiala, and Jheend—have offered contingents to help the Forces of Her Majesty in the prosecution of this work; and I may say that I am very glad to have the opportunity of acknowledging as fully as I can on this occasion the loyal and generous offers of assistance which have been spontaneously made to us in this way. On behalf, not only of the Government, but on behalf, I hope, of Parliament, and on behalf also of the people of this country, I do wish to express the lively emotions of satisfaction which these loyal efforts have evoked. But, Sir, could we expect, unless these Native Princes of India did look upon this question to some extent as an Indian interest, that they would have sent or offered contingents in the generous manner that they have done? Well, Sir, as the Native Princes of India consider this an Indian interest, I do not think the House of Commons will refuse so to consider it. I do not wish to assess the exact monetary value to India which this Expedition ought to possess. I do not wish to say what exact proportion of advantage will accrue to India from it; but it will be clear to the House that India has at least as much interest in this Expedition as she had in that which went to the relief of the captives in Abyssinia in 1867-8, which is the precedent on which I ask the House to pass this Resolution. I notice that my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy Sir George Campbell, has entered a protest against this proposition, and that he is supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan). They both object to any portion of the expense of this Expedition falling directly or indirectly upon the Revenues of India. But I would point out to them that the sending of these troops will not increase the Indian Budget by one single rupee, for not one penny of the expenses of these troops will be borne by India, which would not be borne by India if they stayed at home. I will say, also, that, should the operations of this war be prolonged, and should it become necessary to recruit additional men to take the places of those who are sent to Suakin, all those expenses will necessarily fall on this country, because we have arranged that they should, and a note has passed between the India Office and the Treasury in which it is specially stipulated that that shall be so.

An hon. MEMBER: And other expenses also?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Other expenses may fall on this country; but no more expenses can fall on India. The carriage of the men from and to India will necessarily fall on this country. The principle on which we act is a very simple one. India lends us 3,200 of her troops, and the use of four of her ships. She does not—as was well said by the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) when he proposed a similar Resolution to this for the Abyssinian Expedition in 1867—she does not wish to make money by the loan of her troops. Nor do I think India would wish to be placed in the position in which my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy would place her—she lends her troops to serve with their brethren in arms from distant Colonies and quarters of the Empire; but she does not lend them as mercenaries, hired out to the Mother Country, but free of charge, without any idea of benefiting financially by the loan. The reasons why Her Majesty's Government think it well to employ Indian troops are not obscure. In the first place, I may point out that Lord Wolseley has asked for these troops—for the service of three regiments of Infantry and one of Cavalry—and it is for the sending of those troops, thus asked for, that we ask the sanction of the House. I do not think there would be any difference of opinion among hon. Members as to the propriety of sending Indian troops to Suakin instead of depending entirely either on our own troops or on the Volunteers from the Colonies, much as we welcome the offer which the Colonies have made to us. When we consider the extremely trying nature of the climate of this part of the Soudan, and when we remember how difficult it is for Englishmen, accustomed to a generous diet of beef and beer, to bear up against the heat of the spring and summer sun, even when they have a plentiful supply of water, we must see how much better it is that some of our Indian fellow-subjects should be allowed to take part in these operations. They will be at home, and even at ease, on the exposed plains and in the stony defiles of the Soudan, where our men, however gallant they may be, would be absolutely prostrate. I do not for a moment mean to say that the work which these men will have to do will not be both difficult and dangerous. I do not attempt to disguise from myself, nor from the House, nor have I attempted to disguise from many people to whom I have spoken on the subject, the dangers which must necessarily be encountered by any of our troops who go to the Soudan, or the difficulties under which all these operations will have to be carried out. No one who has considered the water supply of the Soudan can fail to realize the great care which will have to be exercised to secure even a moderate supply of water for a considerable force; indeed, it is not too much to say that in these fights in which we may have to engage our hardest fight will be with nature, not with man. The duties of this Indian Force, which we hope the House will allow us to send in connection with the proposed railway, will be of no light nature. I presume that, until the military operations have been to a considerable extent concluded in the country through which the railway will have to run, all the working parties will require strong guards, both by day and by night; and the forming of these guards will be one of the most onerous duties which these troops can possibly have to perform. No more onerous work could be placed on any portion of Her Majesty's subjects. But some of these Indian troops that we propose to send now had the same duty to perform in the Pishin Valley in 1879, so that they are by no means unused to it. The country in which they will have to work, though much more desolate than any portion of India, is not altogether dissimilar: and the enemy they will have to encounter will not be unlike the mountain warriors they have met before. I do not know whether hon. Gentlemen recollect the battle which was fought under Sir Donald Stewart, when between 3,000 and 4,000 of our Indian troops were encountered by from 10,000 to 14,000 of the enemy—a fanatic enemy, much the same in character as the enemy whom our troops will have to meet in the Soudan. For two hours the attack was hurled against our troops with almost irresistible force; but the enemy was repulsed by some of those troops whom we are now sending to the Soudan—who formed rallying squares, and delivered such a destructive fire as to stop the foe when apparently about to be overcome. These troops, then, are fully equal to the task they will have to perform, and they will do it well. I do not think I need say much more on this occasion; but I will simply state that the Force has already left Bombay, and, indeed, is now at Suakin; and it has been placed under the command of General Hudson, who has been selected by the Commander-in-Chief in India to take charge of this Indian Contingent. I am well aware that it would only be presumption in me to speak of the experience and capacity of that gallant officer; but I may point out that he began the Service many years ago, that he served in the Persian Expedition of 1856; after that he went through the Mutiny, was on the Staff with Havelock and Outram at Cawnpore, was at the relief of Lucknow, and was in the subsequent operations of the Mutiny. He was in the Abyssinian Expedition, and he had command of his regiment during the whole of the Afghan Campaign. I do not think we need despair of success attending the operations of that gallant officer. May I say one word in favour of the troops he will have in charge? They have done good service, and are all men of whom we may well be proud. The 17th Bengal and 28th Bombay Regiments were through the Afghan Campaign; the Madras Sappers, of whom there are 150, have performed severe and onerous duties in times gone by; and the 15th Sikh Regiment is the one which so gallantly withstood the enemy on the occasion I have spoken of at the battle of Ahmed Khel. The Cavalry Regiment is the 9th Bengal Cavalry. It may not be known by that name to the people of this country; but when I recall to mind that it was known in the Mutiny as the 1st Regiment of Hudson's Horse, it will at once be remembered how well they distinguished themselves. I do not think I need say any more. I would simply commend the Resolution to the House, and wish the men God speed in the work they have to do. I ask the House to pass the Resolution which I have already moved.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I desire to say a word with respect to the Resolution which has just been proposed by the Government; and it is simply to say that, speaking generally, I should approve of its terms as being, on the whole, and looking at all the circumstances of the case, a reasonable one. For my part, I am not going to be guided by precedents. I think if I were to argue the matter on the ground of precedents, and were to follow the hon. Gentleman through the precedents he has put forward, I could show that some of them are not altogether applicable to this case. I would rather argue the question on its own individual merits. So, also, I would not like to argue it on the ground of following the example of the Colonies. The Colonies, in my opinion, stand on a totally different footing. The Colonies have control of their own finances, and are offering us, voluntarily, the services of their troops, and voluntarily offering to pay their expenses. But in India we are the trustees of the finances. We control the finances. We decide whether or not the troops should be sent, and we ought to be most scrupulous as trustees about allowing one shilling to be spent which we do not think just, and reasonable, and beneficial to India. The question before us to-night is, what is the interest of India? So far as regards Egypt, the House has already decided—and, we think, quite reasonably decided—that the objects for which we went into Egypt are objects of interest to India. Those objects were, as I understand it, to secure a solid and permanent Government in Egypt, and also to secure our route to India. Now, we have introduced a further element—that of the Soudan. Well, the Soudan undoubtedly stands on a somewhat different footing, and I must say that the motives which the hon. Gentleman has urged for the Expedition to the Soudan appear to me to be altogether inadequate for the purposes of this Motion. For my part, I think he would find it rather difficult to reconcile the objects he put forward to-night with those recently put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Trevelyan), who said the Expedition was based only upon military reasons. But the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cross) says it was mainly forced on the Government by philanthropic motives. All I can say is that those who desire to practise philanthropy had better pay for it; and if this country is going merely to send this Expedition on philanthropic grounds, I should say this country ought to find the money necessary for the purpose. But I do not base it on that at all. I believe you cannot altogether separate the case of the Soudan from that of Egypt; and it is proved that unless we are able to secure the objects for which we have been contending in the Soudan we cannot permanently secure peace or tranquillity in Egypt. That alone appears to me to justify our asking India, as before, to assist us in this Expedition; to assist us so far as to provide from her surplus of troops certain Forces to aid us in this Expedition, but without any extra cost being entailed on India by so doing. That being so, I should like to conclude with one word of caution. It seems to me that although we may safely agree that the proposal of Her Majesty's Government is sound at the present time, and although we may carry it, as we carried a similar Resolution two years ago, we ought to bear this in mind—that if Her Majesty's Government were suddenly to adopt the policy—and I, for my part, do not feel at all sure that they may not adopt it—of abandoning Egypt, and giving up the idea of enabling us by means of Egypt to secure our road to India, then the circumstances would be altogether changed, and I should say that India had been induced to lend troops and spend money for no purpose whatever. The purpose for which India is now lending troops is to secure the objects I have mentioned; but if we abandon Egypt without attaining those objects, India will have been led into an expense which she ought not to have been put to; and I should say with the Prime Minister that it would be a swindle and a sham to call on India to find money for purposes in which she had no interest, and we ought to refund every shilling paid, or likely to be paid, for the purposes, whether of the past or of the present Expedition.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he thought that he personally had been rather hardly treated. The Under Secretary of State for India had induced him to give up an opposition to this Motion on the understanding that the discussion should be brought on at a convenient hour, and the subject fully debated. He (Sir George Campbell) did not think that a Motion made at 20 minutes past 12 o'clock was convenient. He objected to the Vote—though he admitted it was only a little one. Still, he objected on principle to the Vote; and as to the precedents which had been quoted, all he could say was that two blacks did not make a white. He was not altogether averse to a mutual support between the English and Indian Armies, provided it was upon equal terms; but what he did object to was that the terms upon which this mutual support was given were not equal. The Under Secretary of State for India had spoken in sarcastic terms of the possibility of India wishing to lend her troops in a mercenary way for pay; but this country had never hesitated to lend her troops to India for payment. In the very direst necessities of India this country had not scrupled to take the ordinary pay of her troops from India. In the terrible crisis of the Mutiny every regiment sent out to India had the whole of its ordinary pay transferred to India. It was not, then, acting on equal principles of mutual support if the Indian troops lent for Egyptian purposes were still to be paid for by India, while English troops lent to India had also to be paid for by India. In proposing this Motion Her Majesty's Government were not putting India and England upon equal terms. He would have viewed this matter in another light if the troops were only to be lent to assist in the retirement of the Forces from the Soudan; but he strongly objected to their being used in an aggressive war. Whenever a Jingo cry was raised in this country, and they had serious difficulties to meet, he was very much afraid that there was too great a disposition to say—"Oh, let us send for Indian troops; they will take us through all our difficulties." It seemed to him that the strength of their Indian Army was very much exaggregated. It was not a large Army, and there was only a portion of it which was fit for foreign service. He doubted whether, under the present circumstances, they could spare any troops or camels, and other means of transport from India—it was quite possible they might soon be needed in another direction. He somewhat doubted the policy of employing Indian troops in the Soudan. It was all very well to parade Indian troops on great occasions and in times of prosperity; but the Soudan Campaign was beset with very great dangers. They were bound to take very great care how they employed Indian troops. Then he objected altogether on principle to applying any part of the Revenues of India to the expenses of this war, because he maintained that India had nothing whatever to do with it. He understood his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. Cross) to trot out again their old friend the Suez Canal; but, really, the Expedition to the Soudan had no connection whatever with the policy of that waterway. No reason at all had been given why the expenses of the Expedition should be charged on the Revenues of India. He was alarmed by words which had been used by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War the Marquess of Hartington, and which were somewhat amplified by the Home Secretary Sir William Harcourt, with regard to the interest India had in this war. The noble Marquess spoke of the war as if it were a religious war, and said they owed something to their Indian Empire; and asked what would be the consequences if the British Forces had to retire before hordes of Mahomedan fanatic? He (Sir George Campbell) protested against the introduction of the religious element. He believed that if the Mahomedans of India sympathized with the Mahdi there was no danger to the Indian Empire. But he did not believe the Mahomedans of India sympathized with the Mahdi. The great majority of the Mahomedans in India were the quietest and most peaceful of their subjects in India. Possibly a very small minority of that race would be found to sympathize with the Mahdi; but they would be so few in number that it was impossible they could give them any trouble. The Under Secretary (Mr. Cross) had referred to the spontaneous offers of assistance. Some of those offers came from States with which he (Sir George Campbell) had had a good deal to do; and he could testify to the loyalty of those States during the Mutiny, and to the assistance they had at all times rendered. But if the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary knew Indian habits and manners as well as he (Sir George Campbell) did, he would not for a moment believe that the offers to send troops to the Soudan were in the least degree prompted by any interest the States had in the war in the Soudan. The offers showed that the people were loyal and obedient subjects; but they did not show that the people took the slightest interest in the Soudan. He maintained that, as a matter of fact, they took no interest in the affairs of the Soudan. The vast majority of the Indian people did not know whether the Soudanese were Mahomedans or Pagans; and they would not have heard of the name of the Mahdi if they had not heard of it from us, through the English newspapers; it was only in that way that they had any knowledge at all of the Mahdi. He altogether denied the possibility of the operations of the Mahdi affecting the allegiance or disturbing the peace and quiet of the Natives of India, be they Mahomedans or anything else. It seemed to those who had been connected with India absurd to talk of the affairs of the Soudan affecting very much the minds of the Indian people, especially when it was borne in mind that much greater events had happened much nearer to them than the Soudan without affecting them. We had suffered great disasters at Cabul, and still the people of India were little affected. Even when a great part of India was given up to anarchy and our power in some districts was effaced, little effect was produced upon the people in the Provinces which were not subjected to the Mutiny; their allegiance was not in the least shaken. He thought that the Mutiny served to teach them an important lesson. The mutineers set up a Mahomedan King as the Representative of the Great Mogul; and who were their great allies in putting down the Mutiny? Why, the two Provinces in which Mahomedans were most numerous—namely, the Punjaub, where half the population were Mahomedans, and Bengal, where a very large proportion of the people were Mahomedans. He read with great interest the article from the pen of Sir Richard Temple which was lately published in one of the Reviews. He was anxious to see whether the writer would say anything alarming; but, as a matter of fact, he had nothing alarming to tell them; and he went out to curse, and he blessed altogether. Sir Richard Temple made some allusion to the disaster at Cabul; but he (Sir George Campbell) failed to see what connection there was between that disaster and the Mutiny. Now, the House know that the object of the Expedition to Suakin was to smash Osman Digna. He (Sir George Campbell) protested against the policy of smashing Osman Digna. Indeed, he cordially agreed with some of the remarks on that matter which were made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). He (Sir George Campbell) was one of those who by his vote expressed the opinion that the last Expedition under General Graham was one of the most unjustifiable acts of unreasonable slaughter which had ever been committed in the history of this country; and when the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) told the House that they had not committed themselves to go to Khartoum, then he asked — "Why were they going to smash Osman Digna?" He did not see any reason whatever for it. If the House and the country had decided to go to and hold Khartoum, he could understand that it might be necessary to smash Osman Digna on the way; but when the House were told in so many words by the noble Marquess that in passing the Votes asked for that night they were not committing themselves to go to Khartoum, it seemed they were liable to the imputation of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), that in smashing Osman Digna they were doing an unjustifiable act, causing, as they would do, the death of many thousands of innocent people without rhyme or reason. What possible justification could there be for the slaughter which would unquestionably take place if it so happened, as he believed it would, that this country would determine not to go to Khartoum? He said a little while ago something about the terrible effect of the Soudan climate upon European troops. He confessed he thought his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. Cross) had spoken with somewhat too light a heart of the Indian troops. The hon. Gentleman said the Indian troops would be entirely at their ease in the Soudan. It must be remembered that Indian troops were, after all, human beings, and that they could not exist without water. When it happened, as sometimes it did, that disease broke out amongst the troops, the Indians suffered even more than the Europeans. He could testify to the excellence of the Indian troops who had been sent to the Soudan. They were regiments for whom he had a great affection, and therefore he was very unwilling to see them exposed to the terrible climate of the Soudan unless there was sufficient cause and justification for the exposure. Indian troops would willingly shed their blood and expose themselves in a tough fight in the interest of the British Empire; but he did not think they ought to be called upon to do so in order that Her Majesty's Government might get at the Mahdi by first of all smashing Osman Digna. He would not detain the House longer. It was not his fault that this Motion had come on at so late an hour—at an hour when hon. Members were exhausted by a previous debate, and when the subject could not be sufficiently discussed. He was decidedly opposed to the Vote, and would vote against it.

MR. BUCHANAN said, the real question at issue was, were they, or were they not, endeavouring to relieve themselves at the expense of the Indian people of a charge which could fairly be held to devolve upon us? He had put an Amendment on the Paper—which, however, he should not be able to move—in which that issue was directly raised in those very words. He regretted particularly that he could not move it, for the words used were not his own words, but those of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War, in a despatch which he wrote on the 5th of October, 1882, as Indian Secretary to Lord Ripon's Government, on the subject of the expenses of the Indian Contingent sent to Egypt in that year. He did not wish, especially at that hour of the night—12.45—to go into details respecting the Expedition to the Soudan. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. Cross) had given up any attempt to make out that this was an Indian Expedition or that it was an Expedition in any way connected with the interests of India. Therefore, he (Mr. Buchanan) took it that the Expedition was undertaken for Imperial purposes; that the objects in view were exclusively Imperial. If for the purpose of bringing the Expedition to a speedy termination it was thought advisable to make use of Indian troops, they were justified in using them; but they ought certainly to pay the Indian Government for the aid so rendered. His remarks upon the Motion now before the House he should confine to one or two points which were raised by his hon. Friend (Mr. Cross). He should endeavour to point out that the Motion brought forward by the Government on that occasion was contrary to the spirit of the Act of 1858; then he should say a word or two with regard to the precedents relied upon, particularly those of the Abyssinian War and of the Perak Expedition. Now, with regard to the Act of 1858, his hon. Friend the Under Secretary (Mr. Cross) had read to the House Clause 55, in conformity with which the Motion had been brought forward by the Government. The origin of that clause being inserted in the Act was well known. It was due to the initiative of the Prime Minister. The original clause as inserted by Mr. Gladstone was withdrawn in the Upper House; and the Earl of Derby, the Prime Minister of the time, substituted for it the present clause. In his speech of the 19th of July, 1858, the object of the clause was thus distinctly laid down. The noble Earl said—

"The effect of the clause would be, that Indian troops, except for the purpose of preventing anticipated invasion or of repelling actual invasion, should not put their own territory, or if they did, the expense should be defrayed out of the revenues of this country, and not out of the revenues of India. If the troops were employed out of India, it would be for Parliament to decide whether they were employed on Indian or Imperial objects. The clause did not prevent the Crown from making use of the Indian troops, subject only to this—that as a general rule the expense of these troops must be defrayed by Parliament."—Hansard, [1858] 1667.

The Earl of Derby laid down the general rule that if the Home Government wished to employ Indian troops out of India it should defray the expenses of such employment out of Imperial funds; and therefore the House ought to ask themselves whether there was anything in the circumstances of the present case to justify a departure from this general rule? The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cross) alluded to the Expeditions to China, all of which took place, and were practically carried out, anterior to the Act of 1858 coming into force. In two of the three Expeditions to China the Imperial Government bore all the expenses, ordinary as well as extraordinary; in one the ordinary expenses were thrown on India. In fact, on no occasion on which Indian troops were employed outside of India after the passing of the Act had the Imperial Government given such good terms as they gave before the passing of the Act, except in the case of the conveyance of the Indian troops to Malta. Reference had been made by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cross) to the course pursued in the precedent of the Abyssinian War. It was, however, probably within the knowledge of hon. Members that the conclusion arrived at by the Government of the day to throw the ordinary expenses incurred during that war by the employment of Indian Forces upon the Indian Exchequer was not allowed to pass without grave question. The Motion proposed by the late Mr. Fawcett, whose loss, on an occasion like the present, was painfully realized, was supported by very distinguished Members of the House—by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) and by the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan); and outside of the House it was supported by very high Indian authorities—by, for instance, Sir John Lawrence, who was then Governor-General of India, and Sir William Muir. The Minutes that were recorded by these two distinguished civilians, together with the despatch of the Government of India of February 3, 1869, had unfortunately never been published. But Sir John Lawrence's opinion was also on record in a letter which he addressed to the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon

(Sir Stafford Northcote), at that time Secretary of State for India, and which had since been published in Lord Lawrence's life. He (Mr. Buchanan) desired to read an extract from that letter, because he believed the words of Sir John Lawrence, with regard to the Abyssinian Expedition, were applicable to the present Expedition to Suakin. Sir John Lawrence, on the 2nd of January, 1868, wrote—

"I hope you will forgive me when I say that I cannot go with you in what you advanced in the debate regarding the Abyssinian Expedition. I am sure that the general feeling in India, especially among the Natives, will be that it is unjust to charge India with the cost of the ordinary expenses of the troops. It seems to me that Lord Cranbourn effectively disposed of all the arguments in support of the measure."

Then Sir John Lawrence went on—

"I cannot admit that India has the slightest interest in the question at issue between England and King Theodore. We shall be neither stronger nor weaker out here if he is duly punished for his misdeeds. Abyssinia is too distant from India; the communications between the two countries are too slight for the people of India to take any interest in what goes on in the former part of the world."

Now, he (Mr. Buchanan) submitted to the House that if for King Theodore they substituted the Mahdi, and for Abyssinia they substituted the Soudan, Sir John Lawrence's words in 1868 were almost exactly applicable to the present occasion. In the Correspondence regarding the Abyssinian War Sir John Lawrence pointed out that if the proposal of the Home Government to place any of the expenses upon the Indian Government were accepted, it might set a very dangerous precedent for Indian finance hereafter. Sir John Lawrence's foresight had been amply justified. The precedent of the Abyssinian War was cited to justify what was done in the case of the Perak Expedition, and the two precedents were now brought forward as a justification of the present Motion. This was a matter which was of great importance to the future of Indian finance. The power of resistance possessed by the House of Commons was diminished on every occasion. Motions of this kind were made; and there was a distinct danger that with frequent repetitions of precedents they would establish a principle which, once accepted, would operate unfairly to India, and prejudicially to England. It would operate unfairly to India, because of the many calls which might be made upon that country; and it would operate prejudicially to England, because India would come to be looked upon, as the Marquess of Salisbury, speaking on the 28th of November, 1867, in the debate on the subject of the Abyssinian War, feared it might be, as a

"Barrack in Oriental seas, from which we may draw any number of troops without paying for them."

It was alleged that, after all, this was a very small matter. It was said that they were only putting the ordinary expenses of the Expedition on the Indian Government, and it was asked—"What does it matter whether the Indian troops are paid in cantonments in India, or in huts in the Soudan?" In point of fact, there was an important principle at stake; and if they were to go on making precedents of this sort, they might do permanent damage to the interests of India in the House. He was delighted to hear from his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. Cross) the assurance that no extraordinary expenses whatever would be thrown upon the Indian Government. He noticed that in the case of the Abyssinian Expedition the India Office, when it was demanded that all the ordinary expenses of the Indian Contingent should be put on the Indian Government, entered into an arrangement that all extra allowances, pensions, or gratuities to officers or soldiers, and pensions to the families of killed or disabled men, should come out of the Imperial Exchequer. He should like to know whether similar terms had been made with the Indian Government on the present occasion? There was still another point on which he was somewhat doubtful—namely, as to India being surcharged under the present arrangement. He put a Question the other day to his hon. Friend (Mr. Cross) with regard to the purchase of some camels to be used for transport purposes in the Soudan. The hon. Gentleman replied that camels were being bought in India, and all the expenses of purchase, shipment, &c. would ultimately fall on the Imperial Exchequer. Knowing what the experience of India in the past was, the use of the word "ultimately" caused him some anxiety. In the cases of the Abyssinian and Perak Expeditions India was to pay only ordinary expenses; but she had to advance the money for all the expenses of the Expeditions, and in the repayment there was a delay which would be incredible if it were not recorded by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary (Mr. Cross) himself. In a letter which he wrote to the Secretary to the Treasury in March, 1883, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cross) said—

"In the instance of the Persik Expedition which occurred in 1875-6, no repayment of the sums advanced by the Government of India was made until May, 1881, and the account was not formally adjusted until June, 1882. In the case of the Afghan War, the sum granted by the British Government towards the expenses of the Expedition is being spread over six years, and in that of the Abyssinian Expedition, where in order to make the necessary advances the Government of India were themselves obliged to borrow, the accounts were not formally closed for more than 12 years after the operations were undertaken."

It did seem to him that if payments from this country to the Indian Exchequer were delayed for so long a period there was a decided loss to India. The Indian people must indeed be surprised to see the difference between the treatment served out by England to India and that which England demanded from India to her. It was not creditable to us that when there was a debt due to England it was exacted with promptitude, and even interest was demanded; but that when there was a debt from England to India payment was long deferred, and not one half penny of interest was ever paid. Under the circumstances he thought that a Parliamentary Inquiry would be useful into the way in which Indian finance and administration were affected by the delays and difficulties caused by the Offices at home, particularly of the Treasury and War Office. He trusted that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cross) would provide, by getting advances from the Treasury or otherwise, that India should not be out of pocket by the obligation laid upon her of defraying in advance the whole of the expenses connected with the despatch of her Contingent. They heard mention made from time to time of the duty of the House of Commons to India. What that duty was it was often difficult to define; but in this case the duty was laid upon them by Act of Parliament and the question they had to ask themselves was this—

"Are we to discharge that duty fearlessly and unselfishly?" Naturally, they had to look first for the due discharge of that duty to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the two Front Benches. Their hands had, however, been weakened by what they themselves had done; the hands of those on the Front Opposition Bench by what the late Conservative Government had proposed with regard to the Afghan War; the hands of the Front Bench on that side by their original proposals with regard to the Indian Contingent sent to Egypt in 1882, which were so unfair and so unwarrantable that they had ultimately to recede from them. It devolved, therefore, on independent Members of the House on both sides to do what they could to protect the interests of the unrepresented millions of India. Even though they could do no more than make a protest, it was right that without the strongest protest no new precedent should be established. If this Motion were carried, it would be almost impossible in the future to resist any proposal for the employment of Indian troops in countries East of the Suez Canal, and of throwing at least all the ordinary expenses on the Indian Exchequer. In that event, the object of those who inserted Clause 55 in the Act of 1858 would have failed. The House would be forced to the humiliating confession that the Indian taxpayer was better protected when he had to look to the selfish interests of the shareholders in the East India Company, than when he depended upon the guarantee of an Act of Parliament, the responsibility for the due execution of which rested with the House of Commons. In conclusion, putting the matter shortly and on other grounds, what the Imperial Government had done was this. They had called upon their Indian troops to help them, and to do them a service at Suakin; and right well, he doubted not, they would perform it. In private life, if a man did to another a service at his request, the least the person benefited could do was to relieve him of all expense entailed upon him. What, therefore, would be mean in an individual could not be honourable in a nation and they ought not to make a demand from a subject race that they would not dare to make from one that was free.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, although he did not agree with the arguments of

hon. Members on the other side of the House, he quite agreed with the conclusion they had arrived at with regard to this question. He had always looked at any attempt to tax the people of India with great jealousy. They were a poor people and were not represented in that House, and the House ought, therefore, to be very careful in putting any taxation upon them. He agreed with the action of Her Majesty's Government in sending Indian troops to the Soudan, because, if the war was to go on, a sufficient number of troops should be sent there. He should have been glad if they had sent 10,000 men instead of 3,000. But it seemed to him that when they employed Indian troops it was doing no more than their duty to pay for them. Certainly, in this case, they ought to look to the interests of the people of India, and if the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) went to a division he should vote with him.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he thought the taxpayers of this country ought also to be considered, and that it was only just that the people of India should pay some portion of the money for several reasons. First, because the military operations were not without benefit to the Indian Force, because they got military training in the field which was extremely useful to the Indian Army; secondly, because the money paid to the troops and for their equipment would fructify in India; and the third reason was that the cost of these troops would be very great, because the Home Government would not be able to control the Indian expenditure upon them. These troops would land at Suakin under entirely different conditions as compared with English troops. They would land with beasts to carry water and other followers—five or six times as many as there would be in the case of English troops. He would not deal with the argument that it was mainly on account of India that they were in Egypt and the Soudan, but would rest his contention on the reasons he had given, which, he said, ought to be taken into account in deciding this question. The camp followers when in India could be paid for cheaply enough; but when once these requirements had to be provided for Indian troops across the sea, they became most expensive. The Paymasters and Controllers would have no means of checking the accounts, and, that being so, the expenditure would be on an extravagant scale. But if some of the expenses were charged on India, the accounts would be properly checked and the cost kept down. For these reasons, he thought this proposed charge on the Revenues of India was perfectly fair.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR reminded the House that although the Government of this country, prior to the first War in China, made it a condition that the entire cost of the troops sent from India should be paid for by England, the matter ended, after a discussion which lasted many years, by the English people not paying a fraction of the ordinary pay of the troops, though money paid by China under the Treaty of Nankin more than covered the war expenditure of the first China Expedition. He thought that whatever expense might be incurred with regard to sending Indian troops to Egypt and the Soudan, it should not be paid for by the Indian Government. The example of the Abyssinian War, as well as that of the first China War, should be borne in mind—the first China War was carried on during the first Afghan War. For that war about 90,000 Native troops were added to the Indian Army, and the European Force was also increased, yet England employed 12 Native regiments and 4 European regiments, besides a large force of Artillery and Sappers, without payment of the pay and allowances, which India paid. In the Abyssinian War, though India raised 10,000 European and Native troops, to replace the 10,000 European and Native troops sent to Abyssinia, yet no portion of the pay of the extra troops was made good to India. This treatment was in great contrast with that of India to England. In the last Afghan War five battalions of Infantry extra to the 50 permanently stationed in India were sent out, and immediately on embarking all charge was borne by India.

MR. ONSLOW said, he did not think the Government had taken a proper course in bringing forward the Resolution so late in the evening. The question was one in which many hon. Gentlemen in that House, and very many persons outside it, took a great interest, and, if he remembered rightly, the Government had pledged themselves to bring it forward at 11 o'clock, at the commencement of Business; but it was 12 o'clock before it was reached. The hon. Gentleman who brought forward the Motion had said that there was some analogy between the sending of troops to Suakin and sending them to Abyssinia; but he would remind the hon. Gentleman that the war in Abyssinia was a very popular war, and on both sides of the House it was agreed that something should be done to rescue their fellow-subjects in that country. But there was a great difference of opinion in the House and out of it as to whether this war was necessary or not, and therefore he thought there was very little analogy in the two cases. He had not voted for the payment of £500,000 by India for the troops employed at Tel-el-Kebir, because he held that India had nothing to do with that war; but he should support the present Resolution, as India was only asked to pay the ordinary pay of the troops. The House should recollect that the Indian troops which were now being sent were not for the relief of General Gordon, but because they had had a great reverse in the death of General Gordon. If these troops which were to be sent to Suakin were merely for the purpose of guarding the railway, he did not think they would go back to India very well contented. They had the belief that they were to fight for the prestige of the Empire, and for the purpose of the "smashing up" of the Mahdi, but if they were to be sent on a sort of peace only, he did not think they would care very much to come forward again to fight the battles of the British Empire. The hon. Gentleman had laid some stress on the loyalty of the Chiefs in India, and he (Mr. Goslow) thought it ought to be a matter for great congratulation amongst the English people that these Chiefs had come forward to lend their troops as they had done in the Afghan War. The Native troops who were going to Suakin did not really think much of the Mahdi. It had been stated that it was a dangerous thing to send Mahomedan troops to fight Mahomedans in the Soudan, but he did not believe there was any ground for apprehension in that respect. He believed the Native troops were thoroughly loyal to the Empress of India, and that they were ready to show their loyalty in the same manner as they had done before. In his opinion, if they were called upon to fight in the interest of the Empire, they would not care against what foe they fought. He hoped they would not be sent to Suakin merely for the protection of the railway. The hon. Gentleman had remarked that the troops would be somewhat in their element at Suakin; but he seemed to have forgotten that the accommodation they would have there would be very different from that which they were accustomed to in India. He would not speak on this subject any further than to say that he should give a consistent vote on this question in supporting Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. SLAGG said, he rose to express regret that, according to unhappy precedent, Indian questions of great importance to that country should be pushed off to an hour when it was absolutely impossible that they could be adequately discussed. He desired to make a strong protest against and to express his distinct aversion not only to the terms of the Motion, but to the payment by India of any sum towards this service. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) based his approval of the payment by India of a proportion of the cost of the troops on the ground of the field practice which the Indian troops would get in the Soudan. That might be so; but he (Mr. Slagg) altogether objected to their employment. The Contingent would not return to India in the same condition as they were in when they left. A great many of them would leave their bones on the sands of the Soudan; and to take men to be shot in a country and for a cause in which they had no interest in the world was an arrangement which he could not approve. He thought it would constitute a dangerous precedent, one which would be fraught with danger both to India and this country. He believed it could be shown that the Indian Mutiny arose in a great measure from Indian troops serving beyond India; and he would like to know who had gauged Native opinion on this subject, because experience showed that it was dangerous to employ their fellow-subjects in India in this way?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER Mr. CHILDERS said, he had been asked a question as to the meaning of the words "ultimate charge" which his

hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State had used. The first incidence would be a local charge, and the word "ultimate," in this case, meant that the Indian Government would be repaid by us. Then he had been asked as to the time of payment. He was told that, although the accounts between the two Governments were not finally settled for sometime, as a rule the balance outstanding was exceedingly small. The Government was asked whether they intended to tax the people of India in connection with this transaction. The Government intended to do nothing of the sort. Their intention was that India should neither gain nor lose one penny in this matter, and therefore no tax whatever would fall upon the people of India, who would stand in exactly the same position as now.

MR. CHEETHAM said, that when Indian troops were proposed to be employed a little more than two years ago out of India, there were strong protests on the part of the Indian Government and the Indian people. He should like to know whether, on the present occasion, any assurance could be given that the employment of Indian troops, on the terms proposed, had met with the entire concurrence of the authorities in India?

MR. J. K. CROSS said, Her Majesty's Government had received no protests whatever, and he thought that if any objections had been entertained in India to the proposed employment of Indian troops, Her Majesty's Government would have heard of them.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 88; Noes 23: Majority 65.—(Div. List, No. 45.)

Resolved, That, Her Majesty having directed a Military Expedition of Her Native forces charged upon the revenues of India to be despatched for service in the Soudan and Nubia, this House consents that the ordinary pay of such troops, as well as the ordinary charges of any vessels belonging to the Government of India that may be employed in the Expedition, which would have been charged upon the revenues of India if such troops or vessels had remained in that country or service, shall continue to be so chargeable. Provided That if it shall be necessary to replace the troops or vessels so withdrawn by other vessels or Native forces, the expense of raising, maintaining, and providing such vessels or forces shall be repaid out of any moneys which may be provided by Parliament for the purposes of the said Expedition.—MR. J. K. CROSS.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Herbert Gladstone.)

[BILL 52.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to ask Her Majesty's Government, whether they would lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing which clauses of the Bill were a re-enactment of the existing law, and which clauses were new? The same observation would apply to the Land Improvement and Arterial Drainage (Ireland) Bill. Both of these measures were exceedingly long, and he had tried in vain to make out what was new and what was old; but, under the present circumstances, it was almost impossible to obtain that information. If the Return which he asked for was laid on the Table, showing the effect of the alterations, it would facilitate the work of hon. Members in connection with the Bill.

MR. HIBBERT thought there would be some difficulty in the way of complying with the hon. Member's request; but he promised to consider the matter, in order to see what could be done to meet the hon. Member's views.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE said, he wished, with the permission of the House, to insert an Amendment in the Question as it stood on the Paper.

SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND)

NOMINATION OF COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Select Committee on Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) do consist of Nineteen Members—MR. SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND, LORD ARTHUR HILL, MR. FINDLATER, MR. HEALY, VISCOUNT CRINGTON, COLONEL COLTHURST, MR. SEXTON, MR. TOTTENHAM, MR. MANJONIBANKA, SIR HENRY BRUCE, MR. LEAMY, MR. BROWN, MR. THOMAS THORNHILL, MR. CALLAN, LORD MARCH, MR. BIRNFRASSETT, MR. HENRY, COLONEL MILNE HOME, and MR. DEASY:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records. Five to be the quorum."—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

MR. SEXTON said, that this was a subject purely and exclusively Irish, and that he found when Committees dealing with general subjects, or with English or Scotch subjects, were proposed, it was very seldom that the name of an Irish Member appeared in connection with them. Here, however, they had a Committee consisting of 19 Members, five of whom were either English or Scotch Gentlemen who could not in any way be interested in the subject of Irish Fisheries. There were two sections of Irish Members in the House—namely, the independent and nominal Home Rulers and the Nationalists, and he had to complain of undue representation having been given to the former section on the Committee. He contended that the Nationalist Members, looking at the interests they represented, were not in sufficient force on the Committee. It seemed to him that the Committee was most unfortunately composed—most unfairly and most injudiciously—and that no good result from its deliberations could be expected.

MR. HEALY declared that the Committee would have to decide a very heated controversy which prevailed in Ireland between persons interested in the lower water of salmon rivers and the persons interested in the upper waters. The people on the lower waters earned their living by fishing, and it was to their interest that as few salmon as possible should go up the rivers; whereas persons interested in the upper waters were anglers, and were, of course, desirous of having as many fish in the upper reaches as possible. He had examined the names of the Committee as set down on the Paper, and it seemed to him extremely unfortunate that the Committee should be loaded with the names of Gentlemen who had an interest in perpetuating the present laws in regard to salmon rivers. The action taken by the Committee of Selection on this occasion drew attention to the way in which Committees generally were appointed. It was, no doubt, a difficult task for the Government to pick out men to serve on Committees. He quite admitted that there was a difficulty in getting hon. Members to serve; but once the Whips had made their selection and the names were fixed upon, the House was muzzled. In this case it appeared to him that there would be a number of Gentlemen put upon the Committee whose interest it would be to prevent any change in the law being made—Gentlemen who would not be able to approach the subject with unbiased minds, and their action and evidence would tend to the perpetuation of the existing system. No doubt, it was desirable that the views of these Gentlemen should be expressed; but it seemed to him that it would be better to ascertain their views in evidence. Let them call witnesses, and, if necessary, drill evidence in that sense, but do not give them such excessive power on the Committee. He was convinced that this practice of putting upon Committees such a number of interested persons would not make those bodies of the value which they might otherwise possess.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, his noble Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Richard Grosvenor) had, he thought, very fairly constituted the Committee. As the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Healy) had pointed out, the people living on the lower waters of the salmon rivers were interested in preventing salmon from going up those rivers, and if no measures were taken to check their operations, there would soon be an end to salmon altogether. The proprietors on the upper waters were surely quite as interested in this matter as the dwellers on the lower waters. The hon. Gentleman opposite asked what chance would there be of any alteration being made in the law when the Committee was composed in this way? The Committee might find that no alteration in the law was required, and that, on the contrary, the law should be made more strict. The question was a perfectly open one. He (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), however, did not desire to force any names on hon. Members. With regard to English and Scotch Members being appointed upon the Committee, the Gentlemen referred to were well versed in matters connected with fisheries, and their assistance could not but be valuable in the investigation of the subject. There was the hon. Member for Wenlock (Mr. A. Brown) and the hon. Member for Berwick (Mr. Marjoribanks), for instance, both being Gentlemen of considerable knowledge and experience in connection with salmon fishing. He did not think the hon. Gentleman could take reasonable objection to those Gentlemen being on the Committee.

MR. HEALY: Why did you fix the number of Members at 19?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: We began with 15, and we found the Committee grew, as Committees always do grow, to 19.

MR. CALLAN said, the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) represented the interests of the upper proprietors in County Monaghan, and he (Mr. Callan) should have thought that he would have approved rather than objected to the upper proprietors being largely represented on the Committee. He (Mr. Callan) could not understand why, on an exclusively Irish Fishery Committee, they should have English engineers or Scotch Fishery proprietors. What earthly right had the hon. Member for Wenlock (Mr. A. Brown) in Irish salmon fisheries? When they could have the evidence of such Gentlemen as Mr. Bailey, who was well acquainted with the Irish Fisheries, they would have evidence sufficient before them without having to appeal for assistance to an ex-Cavalry officer, like the hon. Member for Wenlock (Mr. A. Brown). Then, again, what had the noble Earl (the Earl of March) to do with Irish Fisheries? The hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. T. Thornhill) was, no doubt, an excellent Whip; but he was an Englishman, and what did he know about Irish Fisheries? What interest, also, had the hon. Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) in Irish rivers? Probably he knew something about the Tay or some other Scotch rivers, but was he familiar with fishing in Ireland? He would be a good man to have on a Scotch Committee, but they did not want him on a Committee dealing with Irish matters. He (Mr. Callan) objected to having Englishmen on the Committee. He knew how they would vote. No doubt, the Solicitor General for Ireland would be the Chairman, and directly he brought forward a Motion he would be supported by those Gentlemen, irrespective of the interests of Ireland. The English and Scotch Representatives would vote exactly as the Government asked them, and, as a matter of fact, he would rather not have a Committee at all than have the infliction of half-a-dozen Englishmen and Scotchmen, who know nothing about the question to be considered, upon it, to the exclusion of Irish Whigs, nominal Home Rulers, and Nationalists. There was no one representing Limerick on the Committee, and yet no fisheries in Ireland were more important than the Shannon Fisheries at Killaloe, Castleconnel, and other places. Then they should have someone representing Derry and Tyrone. He would propose that the question should be adjourned, so that arrangements might be made for exchanging the names of those Gentlemen who were not interested in Ireland for those Members who knew something of the question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, that with reference to what the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Callan) had stated, he had always understood that, in striking Committees of this kind, it was desirable to put on them a certain number of Members who had an interest in the matter under discussion. On all Committees it was invariably the practice to nominate Gentlemen interested in the subject of inquiry, whilst, of course, on the other hand, Gentlemen were associated with them who had no such interest—Gentlemen who went into the subject for the first time, and were prepared to judge according to the evidence. The hon. Member (Mr. Callan) had spoken with some contempt of the hon. Member for Wenlock (Mr. Brown). [Mr. CALLAN: No, no.] Yes; the hon. Member spoke of him as a mere Cavalry officer; but he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) must point out that his hon. Friend (Mr. Brown) was thoroughly conversant with the question of salmon fisheries.

Mr. CALLAN said, he had simply stated that the hon. Member (Mr. Brown) was not an Irish Representative, and that he had no interest in the question to be inquired into by the Committee. He had said that all hon. Members from Ireland knew of this hon. Gentleman was that he was a Cavalry officer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, that the hon. Member spoken of had no special interest in this matter; but he had special information on the subject of fishing generally. So, again, had the hon. Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks), who would be a perfectly impartial Member of the Committee. He had no interest in Irish Fisheries, but was a specialist on the subject of fisheries, and, therefore, a very valuable person to deal with matters of this kind on a Committee. If they said that whenever there was an inquiry as to one part of the United Kingdom other parts of the United Kingdom were not to take part in it, they would be laying down a perfectly novel rule, and a rule which might be very strongly objected to by the Irish Members at some future time. The Committee consisted of 19 Members, and he was reminded that of that number 14 were from Ireland.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had entirely appreciated the grounds of the objection of the Irish Members. They objected to some of the Members, not because they had no interest in the question to be referred to the Committee, but because they had too much interest in them. The strongest objection was that some of these Gentlemen had a direct personal interest in the matter of Irish Fisheries. The Solicitor General for Ireland had a direct personal pecuniary interest in the matter. The hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) also had an interest in the subject; but it was a very different thing to take an interest in a subject as representing a constituency, and taking an interest in it on distinctly personal grounds. Every hon. Member in the House represented some section of the country, but of the total number of 19 Members on the Committee there were four who had a direct pecuniary interest in Irish Fisheries. Therefore, he considered that the manner in which the Committee had been formed was little short of scandalous. An hon. Member beside him had reminded him that if the Standing Orders were adhered to—and he was sorry to say they were not except against the Irish Members—the votes of these four Gentlemen would be cancelled by any division which took place. So far as to the Irish Members on the Committee. Now as to the English Members. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer entirely misunderstood the objection which had been raised on this point. He Mr. T. P. O'Connor wished to ask a question. The right hon. Gentleman's defence for putting English Members on the Committee was that they were to take an impartial view of the subject under discussion; but what had been done in the case of the Railways and Canals Committee which had just been appointed? Why, there were 12 Members of that Committee, and of these just one was an Irish Member. No doubt, he was impartial on the subject; but unless they could get more than one impartial Irish Member to serve on that Inquiry, they ought not to put four or five impartial English or Scotch Members on the Fisheries Committee. The feeling on the Irish Benches was that the formation of the Committee was calculated rather to impede than to forward the object in view, and the Irish Members regarded the fact as an obstruction to just and reasonable legislation. He did not propose, at that hour of the morning (2 A.M.), to take any hostile step; but at the same time, if he could, he should be ready to prevent the appointment of the Committee altogether.

Mr. O'SHEA said, he was sorry that no Member who was interested in or who represented the counties of Limerick and Clare were to be nominated. Personally, he had no desire to serve on the Committee, though his mind was quite open on the subject of the law on the upper waters of the Shannon. He had constituents who were interested in both the upper and lower waters, and he was interested in another river in Ireland, facts which might make him an extremely objectionable Member of the Committee. Under all the circumstances of the case, however, he thought there ought to be upon the Committee an Irish Member who was thoroughly conversant in the salmon fisheries—such a Member, for instance, as his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan). If the hon. and gallant Gentleman were added to the Committee—[Colonel Nolan: No, no.]—it was very possible hon. Gentlemen opposite would be satisfied. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had no personal interest in the fisheries; but he was thoroughly conversant with the fisheries of the Upper Shannon, and therefore he would prove a very advantageous addition to the Committee.

Mr. KENNY said, that before this Select Committee was appointed, he and his hon. Friends would like to have a clearer understanding as to what the special functions of the Committee would be. Those functions were not at all defined. If the Committee were to inquire into the Bill which was before the House and had been before the House for some time, the Committee were very badly chosen. In the first place, the most important portion of the Irish Salmon Fisheries were almost entirely neglected—namely, the fisheries on the Lower Shannon. It was only natural that the conflicting interests of the men engaged on the lower portion and of those engaged on the higher portion of the river would be brought into question. Now, the only Gentleman who represented on the Committee the interests of the fishermen on the Lower Shannon was the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kerry (Mr. Blennerhassett). The hon. Member might be very well able to take charge of those interests; but it must be borne in mind that against the hon. Gentleman, supposing he did undertake to represent the fishing interests of the Lower Shannon, there were four or five Gentlemen who were interested in the fisheries of the Upper Shannon to be nominated. It was proposed to appoint as Members of the Committee several English Gentlemen. The custom of electing English Members upon Committees of this kind need not in itself be necessarily objectionable; but it seemed to him that in this particular instance their appointment was objectionable, because English Gentlemen who went across to Ireland to fish, as some of the English Members it was proposed to appoint did, went across to fish with the rod. English Gentlemen who went to Ireland to fish went with their minds biased against the lower river fisheries, and therefore it was that he objected to the appointment upon this Committee of any considerable number of English Members. Then, again, it was proposed to appoint upon the Committee Gentlemen who, it was well known to everybody in Ireland, had a distinct and direct pecuniary interest in the upper river fisheries. He was reminded by an hon. Friend that a block was put against the Bill by a Scotch Member who went across to Ireland every year to fish on the Upper Shannon, and that in deference to the wishes of that hon. Gentleman the Government put upon the Committee four or five English Members who, probably, were equally interested with him in the fisheries on the Upper Shannon. He (Mr. Kenny) noticed the names of Gentlemen whose interest in the question was so close that their minds were biased, and they were prevented from arriving at correct and proper conclusions. Furthermore, the Committee was unusually large; the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said it grew imperceptibly. He hoped that if the right hon. Gentleman persisted in the appointment of the Committee, he would take care to have the fisheries on the Lower Shannon properly safeguarded; that he would consent to have their interests taken into account and properly represented on the Committee, in view of the fact that the interests of the Higher Shannon anglers and sportsmen were guarded by four or five Gentlemen who had direct concern in those interests.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, it seemed to him that the lesson of this discussion was very easily learnt. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary Mr. Campbell-Bannerman said that when he made the selection, he was assisted by his noble Friend the Treasury Whip (Lord Richard Grosvenor). He (Mr. A. O'Connor) had no doubt that the noble Lord gave all the assistance he could in the best faith in the world; but he could not have the least idea of the quicksands of opposing interests. If he might make a suggestion, it would be that if a similar occasion presented itself in the future, the Chief Secretary, instead of going to the noble Lord, who had plenty of other things in connection with England and the Treasury Bench to occupy him, should go to those Irish Members who represented the interests which were affected by the provisions of the Bill. It was always an invidious and painful thing to have to make remarks about individual Members of the House. Whatever opinions men might have of each other, no one liked to get up and object to an individual name. It was a thing which anybody naturally shrunk from, and therefore he could understand the unwillingness with which his hon. Friends had approached this subject that night. He understood his hon. Friends did not wish to carry their opposition to anything like an extreme. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would take to heart the lesson he had learnt that night, and that he would, on similar occasions in future, take counsel with the Members from Ireland.

Ordered, That the Select Committee on Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) do consist of Sixteen Members—Mr. SECRETARY GENERAL FOR IRELAND, Lord ARTHUR HILL, Mr. FINLAYSON, Mr. HEALY, Viscount CROMPTON, Colonel CROMPTON, and Mr. SEXTON nominated Members of the said Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. TOTTERHAM be one other Member of the said Committee."—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Mr. HEALY said, that simply as a protest he should take a division against this name, although he did not wish to connect any particular name with the matter.

Mr. SEXTON agreed with his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Healy, as to the necessity of taking a division. He added that if the Government persisted in appointing on the Committee Gentlemen who had a direct pecuniary interest in the fisheries of the Shannon, their action would probably result in great embarrassment, because if he and his hon. Friends found in the Committee that the interests of the fishermen on the Lower Shannon were defeated by the votes of certain Members, they would certainly bring the matter before the House, with the view of having the votes disallowed.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE CAMEROONS—GERMAN OCCUPATION. QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, seeing the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary in the House, I wish to ask him, Whether he can give the House any information with respect to the intelligence which has reached this country as to what has occurred on the West Coast of Africa at the Cameroons? I will not comment upon it further than to say that, looking to the great gravity of the case, I am sure the noble Earl will desire to give the House all the information he can.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am not the least surprised at the noble Marquess putting this Question, of which he was good enough to give me private Notice this morning. I may take this opportunity of saying that it does not happen to be the case that I communicated any telegram on the subject, as has been stated, either to the noble Marquess or to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales yesterday. I have read the Reuter telegram. No confirmation of it has reached Her Majesty's Government, and none has been received at the German Embassy. In any case I may add that, whatever the facts may be as to the action of the civil authorities, not only upon principles of international comity, but from the spontaneous declaration of Prince Bismarck when a report arrived that a Protectorate of Samoa had been proclaimed, and from the fact that our negotiations with Germany on Colonial matters are at present on a very friendly footing. I feel convinced that this incident will lead to no disagreeable complications.

INDIA—THE BENGAL TENANCY BILL.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, he desired to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India a Question, of which he had given him private Notice, with reference to the Bengal Tenancy Bill now under discussion before the Council of the Viceroy. The measure was one which would practically extend to Bengal what was known as Irish legislation. [Cries of "Order!"] He did not say that it was so. What he wanted was to know the real character of the measure and its present position before the Council? [Renewed cries of "Order!"]

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, rising to Order, said, he was quite ready to answer any Question on the subject, but the noble Earl was proceeding, without Notice, to discuss a most complicated and most difficult measure, and he must say he thought the noble Earl was out of Order.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he thought that the course taken by the noble Earl (the Earl of Wemyss) in asking for information, without Notice, was a very usual one, whether the subject was complicated or not; but the question of whether any answer was given depended very much on the knowledge possessed at the time by Members of the Government in the House.

EARL GRANVILLE contended that as this was a Question asked after giving private Notice, it would be out of Order to discuss it. If a Question was likely to lead to discussion, Notice should be placed on the Minutes, not for the benefit of the Government, but with the object of enabling noble Lords who took an interest in the subject to be present.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS gave Notice that he would ask the Question on Thursday next.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—THE WAR IN THE SUDAN —MILITARY CO-OPERATION OF THE COLONIES.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN asked the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Whether it was the fact, as had been stated in some of the morning newspapers, that the Government had in some way, more or less direct, requested the postponement of the Motion of the noble Earl (the Earl of Wemyss) for an Address thanking Her Majesty for having accepted the offers of military service from the Colonies?

EARL GRANVILLE, in reply, said, that the Government had no objection to the Motion, and had not the slightest wish that any delay should take place in bringing it forward; but, unfortunately, the noble Earl who had given Notice of his intention to bring the subject before the House had lost his voice through a cold, and the Motion had accordingly been postponed at his own wish. He was glad to see that the noble Earl had recovered.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, that the noble Earl had accurately stated the facts, and that the Motion had been postponed, at his own instance, from yesterday until Thursday.

LAW AND JUSTICE—FREDERICK MARSHALL, A CRIMINAL LUNATIC MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN, in rising to call attention to the case of Frederick Marshall, who was committed for trial at the Central Criminal Court on a charge of wilful murder, and against whom a true bill was found by the Grand Jury for that offence, but who was removed from the jurisdiction of that Court before his trial and committed to Broadmoor Asylum as a criminal lunatic by a warrant purporting to be signed by the Secretary of State; and to ask whether there was any precedent for the adoption of such a course? and moved for a copy of the warrant means of which such removal was effected, said, that it would be within their Lordships' recollection that a few weeks ago a very barbarous murder of a poor young girl had been committed at Woolwich, and that a man named Frederick Marshall, who had formerly been her sweetheart, had been charged with having committed the crime. After a preliminary investigation before the magistrate, the prisoner was committed for trial at the Central Criminal Court, charged with wilful murder, and in due course a true bill for that crime was found against him by the Grand Jury. So far, there was nothing to call for special remark in the case. But on the first day of the Central Court Sessions in February last, Mr. Montagu Williams, as representing the Treasury, made a most extraordinary, and, as far as he knew, an unprecedented, application to the learned Recorder, it being that the recognizances of those who had been bound over to appear at the trial should be enlarged sine die, on the ground that in consequence of the result of a private investigation into the state of the prisoner's mind conducted under the provisions of the Act which had been passed last year, the Home Secretary either had issued, or was about to issue, his warrant to remove the prisoner from the jurisdiction of the Court, with the view of his being removed to the Criminal Lunatic Asylum at Broadmoor. This application took both the learned Recorder and counsel for the prisoner by surprise, and the latter earnestly protested against the course pursued, on the ground that he had been instructed to defend the prisoner, and that if his instructions were correct he had a good defence upon the merits. The learned gentleman contended that the question of the sanity or the insanity of the prisoner ought to be determined in open Court, rather than an innocent man, as the prisoner was then in the sight of the law, should be sent to herd with criminal lunatics for the rest of his life. The counsel for the prosecution said that however that might be the protest came too late, inasmuch as the warrant for his removal had been made out, and thereupon the learned Recorder felt himself bound to yield to the application. The next day Mr. Baron Huddleston went to the Central Criminal Court in order to try the more serious class of offences, and was extremely surprised when he found that the prisoner had been removed from his jurisdiction, and he made some very strong observations on the course that had been pursued. For his own part, he did not deny that the Home Secretary had acted strictly within his legal powers, and no doubt the Act which had been passed last year had conferred upon him the power which he had exercised. But the time the Act was being passed he, and he thought most of their Lordships, had been under the impression that this power of the Home Secretary was to be exercised after and not before judicial sentence had been passed upon the prisoner. There were two points of view from which this question might fairly be examined—namely, from that of the prisoner and from that of the public. In the first place, it was extremely hard upon a prisoner that he should be liable, upon a mere hole-and-corner inquiry, to be sent to a criminal lunatic asylum without having had an opportunity of establishing his innocence before a jury of his countrymen; and from the public point of view it was extremely dangerous that such a power should be conferred upon a Home Secretary. Take the case of a wealthy and influential person charged with the crime of wilful murder; such pressure might be brought to bear upon—he would not say a corrupt—but a weak Home Secretary which might induce him to exercise this power in favour of the prisoner, and seeing that the same Minister had also power under the same Act to grant an unconditional release of a criminal lunatic, the result would be that such a person might escape altogether having to pass through the ordeal of a trial. He could not imagine anything more dangerous than that such a power as this should be placed in the hands of any one man. It might be said that the Home Secretary could only act upon the certificate of properly qualified medical men; but a diversity of opinion existed in the Medical Profession upon the question of insanity. Although he had the highest respect for members of the Medical Profession, he felt bound to say, after having frequently heard them give their evidence in lunacy cases, that they appeared to be sometimes, to say the least of it, considerably biased in the evidence they gave; and, indeed, the late Sir Alexander Cockburn, in the celebrated case of Palmer, went so far as to speak of medical men being retained on the one side or on the other. He begged to move for a copy of the warrant under which the prisoner in this case had been removed.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for copy of the warrant, purporting to be signed by the Secretary of State, by means of which Frederick Marshall was removed from the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, before his trial on a charge of wilful murder, and committed to Broadmoor Asylum as a criminal lunatic."—(The Earl of Millican.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, that he did not understand the noble Earl to make any attack upon the conduct of the Home Secretary in this matter. The noble Earl complained of the state of the law under which the removal had been made; but the noble Earl forgot that the very object of the legislation of last year was to enable action to be taken with regard to a lunatic prisoner before, as well as after trial. The 2nd section gave power to a Secretary of State, when a prisoner was certified to be insane in the manner prescribed, to order him to be removed to an asylum for criminal lunatics. The noble Earl's speech might very well have been made on the second reading of the Bill when it was before their Lordship's House, because it was a criticism of the provisions of the Act itself rather than of the manner in which the Secretary of State had used the powers conferred on him by the Act. No doubt, the power given was very grave and very serious; but that matter should have been, and indeed was, very fully discussed last year. There were ample precedents for the action of the Home Secretary. In reply to the Question on the Paper, he had to say that the warrant was in legal form, and although originally there was a slight irregularity in the signature, this had since been corrected by the Home Secretary. The Government, under those circumstances, did not see any necessity to produce the warrant, and he was not prepared to promise any amendment of the law upon the subject. If the noble Earl thought the Act was unsatisfactory and ought to be amended, he had ample opportunities of introducing a Bill for the purpose.

LORD BRAMWELL said, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Milltown) had brought forward a matter of great moment. He did not like to say the Home Secretary misinterpreted the Act of Parliament, because he was a lawyer, and he had good advice, and he was sure he would give great attention to any step he had taken. But either he had misinterpreted this law and assumed a power he had not got, or the law was one which ought not to be allowed to continue. It was not every kind of insanity which entitled a man to acquittal—or rather, which caused a man to be held to be not guilty. There was the case of a man, undoubtedly insane, who had murdered his wife by repeated doses of strychnine; but he was found guilty of murder and hanged, to the entire satisfaction of everybody. This man had been guilty of the utmost cruelty, and no one wished to save his life. It was, therefore, not every form of insanity which entitled a man to acquittal. A man must be insane in one of two senses—he must either not know the nature of the act he was doing, or be under some delusion—such as that, if the supposed facts were real, would justify the act otherwise criminal. What were the proceedings which took place in the case of persons supposed to be insane? The proper course was for the Judge to impanel a jury and try whether a person was so insane that he was not competent to plead. Even if the jury found him insane, then the Judge had the power to confine him during Her Majesty's pleasure. But if he was competent to plead, then he was tried for the alleged crime, and if he turned out to be insane, as before mentioned, then he was entitled to be acquitted on the ground of insanity. In the case of a man who could not plead, he would be sent to the asylum, not as a criminal lunatic, for he had not been adjudged a criminal lunatic—he was simply a man who could not plead. What were the facts here? This man Marshall was charged with an offence; the magistrates committed him for trial, but according to the interpretation put on the Act he had not been tried. He was sent away to some asylum for criminal lunatics, although he was not a criminal lunatic, and there he was to remain. He was not quite sure whether the Act said he was to be discharged ultimately or sent for trial. It seemed to him that this was a most unreasonable thing. No doubt, the medical men were quite right in saying that he was insane; but he had not been tried. As the noble Lord said, if he had been tried he might have been acquitted; but the medical men certified he was insane, and then the Home Secretary decided he should not be tried. Was it not much better that he should be tried and acquitted on the ground of insanity, or found guilty if not sufficiently insane? He thought the law ought to be altered if it was as the Home Secretary found it, and was compulsory. But he doubted if it was as the Home Secretary found it. The Act might be quoted as “an Act relating to Criminal Lunatics;” but Marshall was not a criminal lunatic. He thought their Lordships would see that the course adopted in this case was attended with a lot of mischief. The Act was either a bad Act or it had been misinterpreted, or if it only gave a power to the Home Secretary of which he might not avail himself, then it seemed a bad use had been made of it.

LORD FITZGERALD said, the words of the Act were “when a prisoner is certified,” &c., and the word “prisoner” applied equally to the man charged with crime as to the person convicted of crime. “Criminal lunatics” would mean “persons charged with crime.” For the purposes of the law this man was a criminal lunatic. The meaning of the order made in this case was that if the man remained insane he stayed in the prison, but if he recovered he was put upon his trial on the charge for which he was committed. He could not see any issue in this matter of the great importance represented. As he understood the noble Earl, this prisoner had been confined at Broadmoor on the warrant of the Secretary of State made on being properly certified of his insanity. It appeared to him that the course taken by the Home Secretary had been in accordance with the true interpretation of the Statute.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he thought that it would be very inconvenient for arguments to take place in their Lordships' House as in a Court of Law upon the niceties of the construction of this or any other similar Act of Parliament. All he would say was that the Home Secretary and the Law Officers of the Crown had placed upon the Statute the construction which the noble and learned Lord who had last spoken thought was the right one, but with regard to which doubts had been expressed by another noble and learned Lord for whose opinion he had great respect. For his own part he did not see any reasonable ground for doubting that the action that had been taken, whether the law was a wise one or not, was in strict accordance with the law. The clause to which the noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell) had referred related to "a prisoner," and this person was beyond all doubt a prisoner in the natural sense of the word, because he was detained under the authority of the law in prison. He did not share the view of the noble and learned Lord as to the use of the words "criminal lunatic" in the Act. The words were strictly defined in the Act itself to mean, among others, any person detained in safe custody during Her Majesty's pleasure, after having been tried and acquitted, but as to whom a special verdict had been returned that he was insane; and also any person whom the Secretary of State had in pursuance of any Act of Parliament directed to be moved to an asylum or other place for the reception of insane persons, which was the very case in question. Bearing in mind that a prisoner was anyone detained in prison by lawful authority, the term "criminal lunatic" seemed to him applicable to any person dealt with by the Secretary of State under the Act. Nor was there anything so exceedingly unreasonable in detaining an untried prisoner as a criminal lunatic, when they considered that until a recent alteration of the law it was the constant practice to detain in criminal lunatic asylums persons who had been not convicted, but acquitted, on the ground of insanity. Nevertheless, considerations of reason, public policy, and good sense led to the conclusion that such a man was a lunatic of a class whom it was desirable to treat in a different manner from ordinary lunatics. The insanity contemplated by this Act was not insanity at the time of the alleged offence, but during the time that the lunatic was in prison. The question whether the law required amending he would not enter into, but would content himself with saying that it did not appear to him so unreasonable as the noble Earl seemed to think.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN remarked, that the noble Earl representing the Home Office (the Earl of Dalhousie) had stated that there were plenty of precedents for the course taken in this case. That was a very fine way of getting out of the matter, but he should be glad if the noble Earl would give him one. He still maintained that there was no precedent for a prisoner charged with murder, and against whom a true bill had been found for that offence, being withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Court before trial by such a process as had been adopted in this case. Up to the end of last Session persons under these circumstances would not necessarily be treated as criminal lunatics, but would simply be sent to hospitals for the insane. An untried prisoner was now liable to be treated as a criminal lunatic, and to be sent to a criminal lunatic asylum before trial. He could not help thinking that it was a very great slur on any man's character to be sent to Broadmoor without trial, and the stain would probably remain on him for the rest of his life. He did not deny that the Home Secretary had acted within his strict legal power; what he complained of was, that he had not exercised the discretion which was conferred on him by the Act, and that his interference was ill-advised and hardly Constitutional.

POST OFFICE—CONTINENTAL MAILS (YORKSHIRE).

Mr. BARRAN asked the Postmaster General, Whether he has succeeded in making arrangements to facilitate the transmission of mails between the Continent and Yorkshire, in accordance with the request of the important deputation which waited on him a short time since, representing all the manufacturing towns of the county?

Mr. SHAW LEFÈVRE: I fully recognize the great importance to the manufacturers of Yorkshire of being enabled to reply to their Continental letters the same day that they receive them. I am happy to inform the hon. Member that I have concluded an arrangement with the Great Northern Railway Company for the establishment of fast day mail trains in both directions between London and Yorkshire. By this arrangement, which will come into operation on the 1st of July next, the Continental letters which now reach Leeds at 1.49 p.m. will arrive at 11.46 a.m., and the return post will be despatched at 2.50 p.m. instead of 1.10 p.m., thus giving at Leeds an interval for replies of about three hours. At Bradford the interval will be about two hours. Corresponding facilities will be afforded at Nottingham, Doncaster, Wakefield, Dewsbury, Batley, Shipley, Keighley, and Halifax.

Mr. SEXTON asked the right hon. Gentleman if he could state the result of his interview with the Chairman of the Midland Railway Company, Ireland?

Mr. SHAW LEFÈVRE: I have seen the Chairman of the Company to-day, and have been negotiating with him. The demands made by the Company are such as I cannot accede to. I made an alternative offer, which I hope will be accepted.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—LETTERKENNY QUARTER SESSIONS.

Dr. KINNEAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If a Memorial from the Town Commissioners of Letterkenny was presented last August, praying that Quarter Sessions be held in Letterkenny four times a year; and, if a reply has been sent to the Memorial; if not, what is the cause of the delay?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: A Memorial from the Town Commissioners of Letterkenny to the effect stated was received on the 4th September last, and between that time and the following November several other Memorials were received from various localities in Donegal containing proposals for alterations in the Quarter Sessions of the county. These Memorials were all referred to the County Court Judge, who, on the 21st November, furnished his observations thereon; and the matter was then laid before a Committee of the Privy Council. In the meantime the Judge, in October last, had, in pursuance of the Statute, fixed and published his Sessions for the present year. There was nothing, therefore, to be gained by a hurried decision, as any changes which the Privy Council might resolve upon could not come into effect this year. I understand their decision will shortly be made known to the parties interested.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—THE WINTER ASSIZE AT MANCHESTER.

Mr. WEST asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Why, having regard to the Order in Council of the 26th of June, the Winter Assize at Manchester was held on 24th January; and, whether he will advise Her Majesty to amend or repeal that Order; or, if not, take measures to enforce it?

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT replied, that he could not say that the Assize of the 24th of January was inconsistent with the Order in Council, because the Judges had a discretion in the matter; and he did not, therefore, see any reason to interfere.

Mr. WEST said, that on taking the Vote for the expenses of the Judges on Circuit, he should call attention to the subject.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE INCOME TAX.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in view of the extraordinary expenditure which must be incurred in this and immediately succeeding years, he will, in framing his financial propositions, while maintaining the principle of a gradual reduction of debt, consider the expediency of mitigating the pressure on the taxpayer, and will therefore limit the sum to be raised by direct and indirect taxation to a moiety or less of the extraordinary supplies required, and provide the residue by relaxing the operations for redemption of the National Debt?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER MR. CHILDERS: My right hon. Friend will perhaps permit me to reply to his Question by another. Did he ever during his 26 years of Parliamentary experience know a Chancellor of the Exchequer to give to Parliament in answer to Questions a portion of the Budget a month before the delivery of the Financial Statement? I am afraid that I can give him no information in reply to this Question.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, the right hon. Gentleman entirely misunderstood his object, which was not to ask him what he was going to propose, but to insure the consideration of the matter beforehand.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER MR. CHILDERS said, he would always consider anything proposed by his right hon. Friend; but he thought the Question was something more than a suggestion.

FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—THE TARBERT PIER.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will obtain and lay upon the Table a Report from the county surveyor upon the present condition of the Tarbert piers, and the probable cost of putting them in good repair, together with a statement of the tolls received, the cost of collection, the salary, if any, paid to the harbour master, and the sums expended on the piers for each year of the last ten?

Mr. W...

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not aware that there is more than one pier at Tarbert, and it is vested in the Grand Jury of the county of Kerry, who are responsible for its maintenance. I do not gather that there would be any objection to the Return asked for by the hon. Member, if he will move for it in the usual way.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to include in the Return all the piers affected by the Shannon Navigation Bill?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is another and a larger Question, which I cannot answer now.

ARMY—ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT—THE MAXIM GUN.

MR. CARBUTT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the Maxim Company have offered to send six guns to Egypt capable of firing 500 shots per minute automatically by utilizing the recoil, so that the gunner has only to direct the gun, and not to work it, as machine guns have hitherto been?

MR. BRAND: I have not received the offer referred to. Moreover, I am informed that the first service gun on this system has not yet been made.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES, IRELAND.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state what is the nature and scope of the alterations which he mentioned to be in contemplation of the the Government with respect to the Queen's Colleges, Ireland?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I did not state that any definite alterations were in contemplation. A Commission has just reported on the Queen's Colleges, and the Government have not had time to come to a decision on the subject.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: How much longer will it take to have this Report printed?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is a matter entirely in the hands of the printer, and I have no power over it.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—GAMBLING CLUBS IN DUBLIN.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that clubs have been recently formed in Dublin by men who have been convicted of card-sharping and for keeping gambling houses; and, if he is aware that gambling and drinking is carried on all night at those clubs; and, if so, if he will take any steps to put a stop to those places, which are drawing numbers of young men into habits of drinking and gambling?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I understand that three clubs, duly registered under the Companies Act of 1862, have been recently established in Dublin. The police there have been very active in the suppression of private betting houses, and in the prevention of betting in the public thoroughfares and on licensed premises; and it seems probable that the establishment of the clubs I refer to is due to this fact. It is not intended to relax the vigilance of the police over this matter in consequence of the establishment of clubs, and any infringement of the law will at once be taken notice of; but so far nothing has come to the knowledge of the police that would justify a prosecution.

MR. O'SULLIVAN: Were none of those persons convicted card-sharpers?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I believe that some persons have been convicted under the Betting Act who are connected with these clubs.

MR. O'KELLY: Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to have the licences of the clubs revoked?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not think there is any ground on which to withdraw the licences until a case is proved.

MR. O'KELLY: Is it usual in Ireland to give licences to persons of this kind? "Order."

[No reply.]

PARLIAMENTARY REGISTRATION — VOTERS' LISTS, DUBLIN.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Will he inquire whether the preparation of the Voters' Lists under the new Franchise Act will be entrusted in Dublin to the Acting Collector General and the collectors of rates; and, whether that staff is thus constituted: Dr. Kennedy, Acting Collector General, a Freemason and a Protestant; Collectors: — F. Buckley, Freemason and Protestant; H. Hughes, Protestant; W. Westerup, Freemason and Protestant; E. G. Cotter, Protestant; J. F. Crofton, Freemason and Protestant; H. Wilkinson, Protestant; R. Hendry, Protestant; H. Dowman, Protestant; and H. McIntyre, Roman Catholic?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I understand that the duty of preparing these voters' lists—which will subsequently be revised by the Revising Barristers—will, in Dublin, devolve on the Collector General. The Government have full confidence that the work will be done impartially. I have no knowledge of the religious belief of the members of the staff of the Collector General's Department.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)

ACT, 1882—SEARCHES, &c.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that about two o'clock on the morning of 20th February, a body of police knocked up the inmates of Mr. Edward Hussey's house at Ballygrae, county Kerry, and without producing a warrant searched the premises; whether similar nocturnal searches were made in the houses of Maurice Quinlan, Farran; Michael Coffey, Dysart; Henry Williams, and John Harrington, Castleisland; whether anything was discovered to warrant these proceedings; whether midnight searches of the same character are frequently made in the houses of the same persons without result; and, whether instructions will be given to forbid this practice?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The houses of the parties mentioned in the Question, and several others, were visited by the police on the night in question. The police had reason to suppose that a serious outrage had been committed in the locality; and the object of their visits was to see that certain individuals were not absent from their homes, or, if they should be, to ascertain their whereabouts. No search was made of any of the premises, and, therefore, no warrant was necessary. Several similar visits are only made when any serious outrage is reported; and it is then the duty of the police, in the exercise of their discretion, to take all proper measures to detect the offenders.

MR. O'BRIEN: Is it a fact that the visits have been repeatedly made to the houses of the same persons?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The same persons are often suspected.

MR. O'BRIEN: Well, are the police to be allowed to invade men's houses and subject them to innuendos of this kind without showing one particle of legal justification?

MR. HEALY: Is the serious outrage referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the half-killing of two men by a policeman discharging his gun accidentally?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: There is a further Question on that subject on the Paper.

NAVY — ORDNANCE, &c. — EXPERIMENTS WITH SHELLS.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Admiralty have been furnished with a Report of the results of experiments recently carried out at Eastney Fort, Southsea, with a view to ascertaining the effect of shells exploding on armoured decks of ships; whether he would inform the House of the result of those experiments; and, whether he has any objection to lay the Report upon the Table of the House?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The latest trials took place in December, 1883. If these are the trials to which the hon. and gallant Member refers there will be no objection to make the results public.

ARMY — ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT — PURCHASE OF CARTRIDGES.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that a large contract for the supply of cartridges has been placed by Her Majesty's Government in America; and, if so, whether, before placing this important piece of national business at the disposal of foreign manufacturers, Her Majesty's Government submitted it to the competition of British traders, due regard being had to their prior claims, and to the pressing necessities of large groups of unemployed artisans, whose subsistence entirely depends upon orders reaching their employers?

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the statement in the newspapers is true, that Her Majesty's Government have given an order for the purchase of fifty million cartridges to an American manufacturing firm; and, if the statement is true, whether, inasmuch as there are manufactories at Birmingham capable of executing such an order efficiently, he will state why, at a time when there is so great want of employment to working men and women in and near Birmingham, the order above named was given by Her Majesty's Government to Foreign manufacturers?

MR. BRAND: If Questions are to be put with respect to every paragraph which appears in the newspapers about the Expedition to Suakin the time of the House will be largely occupied. There is no truth whatever in the statement.

GERMANY—TREATY WITH SAMOA.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any reply has yet been received to Lord Granville's Note to Count Münster, of the 16th February, on the subject of the German Treaty with Samoa?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir.

GERMAN COLONIAL POLICY—THE DESPATCH OF MAY 5.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether a copy of the Despatch of Prince Bismarck to Count Münster, of May 5th 1884, has been at any time communicated to the Foreign Office; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will endeavour to induce the Government of Germany to consent to its being published?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The despatch was never communicated to us; but a portion of it was confidentially read to Lord Granville about 10 days ago. He is not aware of any public object in taking any further steps in the matter.

AFRICA (EAST COAST)—GERMAN ANNEXATIONS NEAR ZANZIBAR.

MR. SLAGG asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What steps are being taken by Her Majesty's Government for the protection of British commercial interests in view of the recent annexation by Germany of territory in the interior of Africa immediately beyond the dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: British commercial interests within the territories of the Sultan of Zanzibar are protected by Treaty. Territories beyond the Sultan's Dominions fall within the provisions for freedom of commerce agreed to in the recent Conference at Berlin.

SOUTH AFRICA—BECHUANALAND.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that Sir Charles Warren desired the return of Mr. Mackenzie to Bechuanaland, that Sir Hercules Robinson has advised against such return, and that Lord Derby has upheld the views of Sir Hercules Robinson; and, whether he can state to the House the substance of Lord Derby's decision? He would also ask, whether it was true that the civil government of Bechuanaland had been placed under the direct authority of Sir Hercules Robinson?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The substratum of truth in these reports consists in the fact that certain questions have been raised in various quarters as to the wisdom and expediency of the continuance of Mr. Mackenzie with Sir Charles Warren. The Secretary of State, after communicating with Sir Hercules Robinson, telegraphed to Sir Charles Warren, saying that he has no desire to interfere with him, and leaves the matter entirely to his own discretion. As to the last Question of the hon. Baronet, I cannot undertake upon what the report is based. No doubt, technically, Sir Charles Warren is under the High Commissioner; but there has been no change in his position since he was sent out.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE BABBICOMBE MURDER—ATTEMPTED EXECUTION AT EXETER

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will lay upon the Table a Copy of all Correspondence between the Home Office and the Sheriff of Devonshire relating to the late attempted execution at Exeter?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had addressed a letter to the High Sheriff of Devonshire on this subject; but the Correspondence was not yet complete. When it was, he would show it to the right hon. Gentleman, and place it on the Table if he desired it.

ARMY—ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT—OLD ARMY STORES.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, If he will state how the sum of £115,000, estimated proceeds of the sales of old stores and materials, to be appropriated in aid of Vote 12, Army Estimates 1885-6, is made up?

MR. BRAND: The sum is made up as follows:—Ordinary Woolwich Sales, £35,000; sale of old guns, shot, and metal, £45,000; sale of miscellaneous stores, £10,000; barrack and other damages, £25,000—total, £115,000.

NAVY BUILDING, &c.—TORPEDO BOATS.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he will state how many first and second class torpedo boats have been ordered by the Admiralty since 1880; and, how many of them have been delivered by the contractors, and completed for service at sea?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Seven wood-built torpedo boats ordered in 1882 have been delivered. Two are fully completed for service. The other five are being prepared for issue to ships as required. Five first class and two second class boats were ordered last year, but have not yet been delivered. Tenders have recently been invited for 10 additional first class boats.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—ALLEGED WOUNDING OF DENIS MURPHY AT CASTLEISLAND, CO. KERRY.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What are the facts connected with the wounding of Denis Murphy at Castleisland, county Kerry?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: On the night of the 21st ultimo, two constables, named Bowd and Devlin, who had been sent on patrol near the house of a man named John Murphy, reported that a shot had been fired into the house through a window, and that Denis Murphy, a son of the occupant, had been wounded. This report of the occurrence was confirmed by the members of the Murphy family, and the police, who were turned out and scouring the country, arrested 11 men who were found to be out of their houses and in the neighbourhood of the occurrence. These men were brought up before the Resident Magistrate and remanded. Subsequently, suspicions were aroused as to the account given by the two policemen; and on being pressed it was admitted by them that the night being wet and stormy they had sought shelter in Murphy's house, and that the injury to Denis Murphy had been occasioned by the accidental discharge of Constable Devlin's rifle. The men who had been arrested were thereupon released, and the two constables were, by order of the Lord Lieutenant, summarily dismissed from the Force. I regret to say that Denis Murphy has since died of his injuries, and a Coroner's inquest is at present being held in the case. Constable Devlin has been arrested, and the Attorney General has advised that he should be prosecuted on a charge of manslaughter.

MR. SEXTON: I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the constables, finding that the rifle had been discharged, proceeded to smash the windows of the house; why the authorities allowed five days to elapse before the tale of the outrage was contradicted; and if they will lay upon the Table a copy of the entry made at the police station?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have given the House, as succinctly as I could, a full account of what occurred.

MR. HEALY: What compensation is to be given to the Murphy family?

MR. O'BRIEN: Have the Government any means of judging whether other so-called outrages in Ireland are not of the same character?

[No reply.]

MR. HEALY gave Notice that he would repeat his Question regarding the compensation to these people at a future day.

NAVY BUILDING, &c.—BELTED CRUISERS.

MR. CHARLES WILSON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, For how many belted cruisers they are inviting tenders, and to whom the invitations have been sent, and when the tenders are to be sent in?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Tenders have been invited for five belted cruisers from 14 firms. It is not considered advisable to give their names. The tenders are due on April 17. An earlier date was originally fixed, and the extension of time has been granted at the request of some of the contractors.

MR. CHARLES WILSON asked whether Earle's Shipbuilding Company had been included in the list of firms?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, it was not advisable to give the names of the contractors.

SCOTLAND—THE CROFTERS' COMMISSION—HIGHLAND FISHERIES.

MR. MUNRO-FERGUSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in view of the peculiar circumstances of the Highlands, as shown in the Report of the Crofters' Commission, the branch of this Report dealing with Highland fisheries will be duly considered in connection with that of the Piers and Harbours Commission; and, whether any action on the part of the Government in respect of these special recommendations may be expected during the present Session of Parliament?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the President of the Board of Trade had requested him to answer the Question. He thought he had partly answered it the other day, when he stated that the matter would be considered in connection with the Report of the Piers and Harbours Commission. The latter part of the Question, he was sorry to say, he could not answer.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—HIGHLAND SCHOOLS.

MR. MUNRO-FERGUSON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether the Report of Mr. Craik on Schools in the Highlands, dated 30th October 1884, has yet been under consideration; whether any of Mr. Craik's recommendations will be embodied in the Code of 1885; and, whether there is any prospect of relief being afforded to the present heavy burthen of the rates; and, if so, in what manner?

MR. MUNDELLA: The whole question of education in the Highlands is at present under consideration, and will be dealt with very shortly. We intend to accomplish as much as possible through the Code, and we hope that legislation will not be required.

GENERAL GORDON—VERIFICATION OF MANNER OF DEATH, &c.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Secretary of State for War, If any further attempts have been made by Lord Wolseley to verify the conflicting accounts of the manner of General Gordon's death, or to ascertain what became of his body; and, if it would not be possible to communicate with the Mahdi for the purpose of obtaining information?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that Lord Wolseley was fully aware of the great anxiety felt in this country to obtain particulars as to the fate of General Gordon; and he would, of course, use every possible means in his power to obtain such information. Under these circumstances, he did not think there would be any advantage in suggesting to Lord Wolseley any particular mode of operation for the purpose.

MR. MACFARLANE asked, whether the noble Marquess was aware that any other steps had been taken by Lord Wolseley than those published some time ago? Accounts were given by persons who had returned from Khartoum; but those accounts differed very much.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was impossible to verify the conflicting accounts given by Natives who had returned from Khartoum. He was not aware of what steps had been taken by Lord Wolseley since those accounts were received; but, as he had stated, Lord Wolseley knew perfectly well the anxiety felt in this country in the matter, and would do all that was possible to get information.

EGYPT EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN — KASSALA.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If Her Majesty's Government will take steps to let the garrison of Kassala know the determination of the Government to abandon them, in order that they may make such terms as are possible with their savage assailants, and thus save themselves and the inhabitants of the town from the indiscriminate slaughter that must necessarily ensue if the town be taken by storm?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: On the 4th of February last Sir Evelyn Baring and General Stephenson advised that the Governor of Kassala should be informed that no Expedition, English or Egyptian, could be sent to Kassala, and that he must judge for himself whether to try to make his way down to the coast or come to terms with the rebels. Colonel Chernaide, on February 7, proposed to inform the Governors of Kassala and Sanheit to arrange as they might deem best for their garrisons terms with the Abyssinians or the rebels. Colonel Chernaide also proposed to inform King John that any proposals emanating from Kassala had his concurrence. These proposals were approved on February 7.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Ministers intend to take steps to relieve the besieged garrison of Kassala and the 20,000 inhabitants of that town, now hard pressed by famine; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Ministers will permit the Sultan of Turkey, who is Sovereign of Egypt, to send Ottoman troops to save the garrison and people of Kassala from massacre and slavery?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: In a previous answer I have already replied to the first part of this Question. Her Majesty's Government have several times suggested that the Sultan should resume the direct administration of the Red Sea littoral, but without success. There is no reason to suppose that His Majesty has any wish to take measures for the relief of Kassala.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT wished to know whether it was not a fact that the Khedive, 15 months ago, asked Her Majesty's Ministers to allow him to appeal for help to his Sovereign the Sultan of Turkey to assist him in relieving the garrisons, and was refused permission; and at what period since that appeal was made had it been suggested that the Sultan should be asked to relieve the garrisons?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the answer was in the Papers which had already been laid before the House.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked, whether he was to understand that the Government were unwilling to take any steps for the relief of Kassala?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he had given a very full reply to the hon. Gentleman's Question.

Afterwards—

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, that in answer to a Question which he had put earlier in the evening as to relieving the besieged garrison of Kassala, he had received from the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs an answer which did not appear to him clear or satisfactory. He, therefore, begged to ask the Prime Minister, if he would be so good as to state whether Her Majesty's Government could not take some steps to relieve the garrison at Kassala?

MR. GLADSTONE: I believe the hon. Gentleman refers to some employment which he proposes of the Forces of General Graham; and as my noble Friend has already stated the object with which that Force is to be employed I could not undertake to make any addition to his statement.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked, whether he understood the right hon. Gentleman to mean that the Government were not going to make any effort whatever to relieve the garrison?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no addition to make to the reply of my noble Friend.

ARMY — MILITIA OFFICERS ON SERVICE IN AFRICA.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will issue a Return of the number of Militia Officers now on service in Africa, and with Line Battalions at home, and if he will state how many have just been accepted in response to the recent offer from the War Office; if he will give the number of Militia Officers on the 1st of January 1855; whether the present short number of Officers will not be further depleted, in the course of some two months, by absorption into the Line of those now serving; whether it is the case that some fifteen per cent. of Militia Officers now serving would, in case their regiments were embodied, have to retire in consequence of their professional and other engagements, and that thus they cannot be regarded as available or efficient; and, whether, in view of the inefficiency of the Militia, as at present constituted, he will give the matter his serious attention?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: A Return of Militia Officers on service in Africa and with Line battalions at home, and of those just accepted in response to the recent offer, can be given if the hon. Baronet will move for it. On the 20th of February there were 2,804 officers serving with the Militia. The successful candidates in the March examination will be transferred to the Line, and will, of course, cause vacancies in the Militia. There is no record of the professions or engagements of Militia Officers. I am not prepared to admit the inefficiency of the Militia, though the number of vacancies for officers is to be regretted. Since the answer I gave in this House on the 20th of February, the number of applications for Militia commissions has increased.

In reply to a further Question from Sir FREDERICK MILNER,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that two months ago a number of queries were addressed to commanding officers of regiments; and suggestions were invited from them as to the means they would recommend in order to increase the number of applications for Militia commissions. Some of the replies involved recommendations of increased allowances, but no very large proportion of them; and whether the hon. Member's suggestion was among them he did not know.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND) — THE RIOTS AT DERRY — ALLEGED ORANGE ATTACK ON SISTERS OF MERCY.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the inquiry held by two resident magistrates under the Crimes Act, at Londonderry, with reference to the attack by an Orange mob upon two Sisters of Mercy, proved abortive owing to the four defendants, who were in attendance, not having been brought properly before the Court; whether any prosecution of an agrarian character under the Crimes Act, in the South of Ireland, has failed owing to a similar mishap, or was left in charge of an inferior police officer; whether the Crown Solicitor was instructed to attend, as in the case of the late prosecutions at Drangan, county Tipperary; who is to blame for the miscarriage of justice; and, whether, in any fresh proceedings that may be taken, care will be taken to have the Crown represented by a compotent legal official? In putting this Question he would like further to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether the persons who witnessed the attack did not belong to the Orange faction; and whether any steps had been taken for the discovery of evidence by holding a secret inquiry under the 16th section of the Crimes Act?

Mr. LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the alleged attack by an Orange mob upon two Sisters of Mercy, really consisted of an attack, by word of mouth, of four little boys, three of whom were eleven years of age, and the other only fourteen; and, whether such a case is within the provisions of the Crimes Act 1882?

Mr. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How it happened that the cases reserved for hearing by a Crimes Act Court at Derry, on Thursday last, fell through; were the police concerned in the prosecution afforded professional advice; if not, why was it withheld from them; why the Crown was not professionally represented in Court, and why the prosecution was left to be conducted by a constable of police, whose intervention in the case was objected to by the solicitor for the defence; and, what further steps are being taken to have the cases duly dealt with?

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The defendants in this case, who are described in the depositions as young boys, were members of a disorderly crowd which used insulting language towards two nuns; and one of them, it appeared, raised a stick over the ladies' heads. They were summoned by the police for using language calculated to provoke a breach of the peace, and for obstructing the highway. On the case coming before the magistrates, the latter, under the mistaken belief that the case was one coming within the provisions of the Crimes Act, ordered that the defendants should be brought before a Crimes Court. The Government, however, were advised that the case was not one coming within the Crimes Act, or which could be prosecuted under its provisions, and in consequence of this the Sessional Crown Solicitor did not receive instructions to attend. There is no intention, however, to allow the offenders to escape; and the Sessional Crown Solicitor has been instructed to take immediate steps to make the defendants amenable to the ordinary law.

Mr. O'BRIEN: Might I ask again whether the account the right hon. Gentleman has given of the occurrence is not that of persons who belong to the Orange faction; and, whether any steps have been taken by the Government, under the 16th section of the Crimes Act, to discover evidence?

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The account I have given is an account I have received from the police and other parties.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)— TROOPS IN THE SOUDAN— SUN SPECTACLES.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether provision has been made for a supply of coloured glass spectacles for use of our troops in the Soudan?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sun spectacles have been provided for all troops sent either to Suakin or to the Nile; 27,000 pairs have been sent to Egypt from August, 1884, to February, 1885. Reserves of 3,000 pairs are now being sent out for Suakin and Egypt respectively.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)— SUPPLIES FOR OFFICERS—IMPOSITION OF CUSTOMS DUTY BY EGYPT.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that supplies for our Officers in the Soudan, are charged a Custom Duty by the Egyptian Government when landed at Suakin or other Egyptian or Soudanese Port?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: There is no information on the subject in the War Office; but inquiries have been made.

CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—MILTON ABBAS SCHOOL.

Mr. MONTAGUE QUEST asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether he has any reason to suppose that the Charity Commissioners have abandoned the scheme for the Milton Abbas Schools at Blandford, which has been objected to by the inhabitants of that town and districts, and which was stated in the agenda paper at the last Quarter Sessions of the county of Dorset to have been so given up?

MR. MUNDELLA: The Charity Commissioners inform me that they have not abandoned the scheme for the Milton Abbas School at Blandford, but hope to be able to submit it to the Education Department in the course of the present month.

SOUTH AFRICA—METHUEN'S HORSE.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether there is any intention to recall Colonel Methuen's Irregular Cavalry from South Africa for service in the Soudan; if so, how it is proposed to replace them?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer given a few days ago by the Secretary of State for War, in which he said that it would not be possible, until further information should have been received as to the progress of affairs in South Africa, to say whether any such offers could be accepted. And I can assure my hon. Friend that there can be no question of moving this force from South Africa until its services there are no longer required.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE MURDER OF FRANCIS HUGHES.

MR. DEASY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is intended that the three Orangemen charged with the murder of Francis Hughes, a Catholic, within a few perches of the Orange Hall at Keady, county Armagh, shall be tried at the assizes of Armagh, in which county the jury panel is very largely composed of members of the Orange Society; and, whether it is intended to change the venue so as to ensure an impartial trial?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND Mr. WALKER said, that, after careful consideration, the Attorney General had come to the conclusion that there was no necessity for a change of venue in trying the accused in this case.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (IRELAND)—DRUMHARIFFE BRIDGE, COUNTIES ROSCOMMON AND LEITRIM.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Mr. Montague Guest

Whether it is a fact the contractor for the Drumhariffe Bridge across the Shannon between Roscommon and Leitrim was entitled to receive monthly 90 per cent. of the money due, according as the work progressed; is he not now, under the terms of his contract, entitled to a sum of in or about £200 for work performed, in addition to other sums claimed for extra work; can he state on what grounds payments have not been made to such contractor of sums due to him; is not the bridge at present used for the purposes of transit; and, when will payment of the sums due be made?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This Question only appears on the Paper to-day, and I have not had time to make any inquiries; but, as at present advised, I do not think it is a matter in which the Government could interfere.

ARMY—PEAT-MOSS LITTER.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the peat-moss litter with which the experiments were lately made in Military stables was from Germany or from Ireland?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am informed that the peat-moss litter with which the experiments were made was from Germany.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Would the noble Lord make inquiry as to whether any satisfactory experiments have been made on the Curragh or elsewhere with Irish peat-moss litter?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I will inquire.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Would the noble Lord make inquiries as to the peat-moss litter from Yorkshire?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the noble Lord whether a committee of Artillery officers did not within the last two years report in favour of peat-moss litter?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I will make inquiries upon that subject also.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—MOUNTJOY PRISON.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it the fact that five warders of Mountjoy Prison were summarily dismissed by the Hon. Charles Bourke because they respectfully protested against being compelled to carry out an order of so indecent and degrading a character that it is impossible publicly to describe it; did Mr. Bourke, immediately after dismissing the five warders, cause the order to be cancelled; did the officers subsequently apply to be reinstated; and, was this refused?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Five warders were recently dismissed from Mountjoy Prison for refusing to obey an order which the General Prisons Board thought it necessary to issue for the maintenance of order in the prison. The Question of the hon. Member greatly exaggerates the character of the order, and it is not true that it has been cancelled by the Prisons Board, or that they have any intention of cancelling it. The dismissed warders did apply to be reinstated; but the Board report that, having regard to the gravity of the offence and the importance of maintaining discipline in a large establishment such as Mountjoy, they are unable to accede to the request.

MR. HEALY: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is intended to allow this order to remain in force; and whether it exists in other prisons?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I said the Board had no intention of cancelling it.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE CAMEROONS—ALLEGED INSULT BY GERMANY TO THE BRITISH FLAG.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to ask the Prime Minister a Question of which I have given him private Notice—Whether he can give the House any information with respect to the alleged insult to the British Flag at the Cameroons?

MR. GLADSTONE: I can really give no information upon the subject, because no confirmation of the rumour published in the newspapers has been received by Her Majesty's Government; and we have likewise ascertained that no confirmation has been received at the German Embassy. It would be idle to conjecture whether there is any truth in the statement; but if there is any foundation for it, it cannot be an incident likely to lead to any serious consequences.

ARMY (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)—MARTINI-HENRY CARTRIDGES.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM inquired, Whether the Secretary of State for War had seen an account of the failure of the Martini-Henry cartridges in a recent battle in the Soudan; and, whether Expedition No. 3 was to be provided with the same cartridges as Expedition No. 2?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that he was aware of the statement, and the matter was now under consideration.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked, Whether it was true that the Afghan Boundary Commission had retired to Zoorabud, on Persian territory?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir. The Commission, as I stated the other day, is at Gulran, on Afghan territory.

INDIA—THE BENGAL TENANCY BILL.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true, as stated in The Indian Statesman of February 3rd, that, whilst the average total incidence of rent including the Government revenue demand in Bengal is only two rupees per acre, the Government revenue demand alone in the North-Western Provinces amounts to three rupees per acre, in addition to a rental of three rupees more; and, whether it is true, as stated by the same paper, that Lord Dufferin has received "instructions from home" to pass the Bengal Tenancy Bill?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The average rate of Government revenue per acre in the North-Western Provinces is one rupee two annas three pies, as the hon. Member will see on reference to page 197 of the Indian Statistical Abstract No. 15. It is impossible to say what is the average rate per acre in Bengal. Neither the area cultivated nor the amount of rent realized from that area is known with accuracy; but detailed inquiries made in several districts in 1883 tend to show that the average rent rate considerably exceeds two rupees per acre. Her Majesty's Government would see with satisfaction the passing of a measure on the subject of Bengal Tenancy during the present Session of the Legislative Council at Calcutta; but no instructions from home have been given to Lord Dufferin to pass the Bill.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: I will ask the hon. Gentleman, whether he can confirm or contradict the statement contained in the following telegram from a Native Member of the Viceroy's Council:—

"Motion for re-publication of Bill in the vernacular, and delay for three weeks not carried. Opposed on the ground that Executive Council wished to go to Simla. If delay allowed Bill would have to be discussed;"

and, whether this Bill is being pressed forward with such urgency in consequence of the Viceroy and Council feeling it convenient to go to a cooler climate?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The hon. Member asks me a Question on a subject of which I am ignorant. If he will give me Notice of the Question, and allow me time in which to receive a reply from India, I shall be able to answer him.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: In consequence of the extreme urgency of this question—the Bill being within three days of being passed—I beg to give Notice that before proceeding with Public Business, I shall ask leave to discuss the matter on a Motion for the Adjournment of the House.

TREATY OF BERLIN—ALBANIA AND MACEDONIA.

MR. BRYCE asked, Whether the Foreign Office had any report as to disturbances in Albania and Macedonia?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No; not up to the time I left the Foreign Office.

EGYPT FINANCE, &c.

MR. PULESTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he could give the House any information about the financial arrangements with respect to Egypt?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER MR. CHILDEKS: I have no information on the subject since the statement I last made to the House. I stated then that I had been informed that the matter was nearly concluded. I was so informed on the authority of an Ambassador.

Mr. J. K. Cross

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

In answer to Dr. CAMERON,

MR. GLADSTONE said, that not having closed the Miscellaneous Estimates last night, the Government proposed to go on with them on Thursday, and to take the Naval Estimates on Monday next.

ADJOURNMENT—NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE (RULE 2—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE).

INDIA—THE BENGAL TENANCY BILL.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, Member for Wigtonshire, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely—the procedure of the Viceroy's Council at Calcutta in pressing forward the Bengal Tenancy Bill without giving time for due consideration or translation thereof into the vernacular.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Baronet (Sir Herbert Maxwell) proposes to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance—namely, the procedure of the Viceroy's Council at Calcutta in pressing forward the Bengal Tenancy Bill without giving due time for the consideration or translation thereof into the vernacular. Is it your pleasure that the Motion should be made? ["No, no!"]

The pleasure of the House not having been signified—

MR. SPEAKER called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places.

And not less than forty Members having accordingly risen in their places,

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, that, at first sight, it might appear somewhat presumptuous on the part of a private Member to interrupt the course of Public Business for the purpose of discussing a matter of such grave importance as the policy of the Viceroy and his Council in India; but it seemed to him that no one except a private Member would feel himself at liberty to do so. If a right hon. Gentleman on either of the Front Benches were to do so, he would feel that he was taking upon himself the responsibility of running the risk of interfering with the policy which commended itself to Her Majesty's Viceroy in India; but he (Sir Herbert Maxwell) felt that, in approaching this subject, he was relieved in a great sense from such responsibility from the fact of his never having held any official position in that House. He had already read to the House part of a telegram which he had received from the Maharajah of Durbhunga, one of the Native Members of the Council, a name which would commend itself to the House. That message concluded with these words—

"We, however, hold that a Liberal Government like the present ought first to consult the convenience of the nation instead of their own. They wish to rush the Bill through next week. Kindly bring the matter before Parliament."

When that request was put to him by a person of such importance as the Maharajah, he felt compelled to accede to it, in the only manner in which it was possible for a private Member to do. When he said the matter was urgent, he wished to point out that the Bill was introduced into the Council only a fortnight ago. There had been Tenancy Bills under the consideration of the Council for some time past; but this was a radically different Bill in many details from those which had been already introduced and withdrawn, and the complaint made by the Zemindars of Bengal was, that it had not been long enough before the country to let its provisions be known. He (Sir Herbert Maxwell) had often had to object, in the strongest possible way, to the home legislation of the present Government; but he never had to make the complaint that their legislation was hurried through in an indecent manner. Due time was always allowed for deliberating upon and discussing measures; and if such time were ever refused by the Government the nation would insist upon it being given. But what power had the Zemindars of Bengal to insist upon delay? None at all. The only power they could exercise was through their Representatives in the Council; and when those Representatives were overridden, on every point they brought forward, by the compact Government majority, no course was open to them except to appeal to public opinion at home, in the hope that some modification might be had of the system. As far as the Council of the Viceroy was concerned, the case of the Zemindars was perfectly hopeless. In The Times of Monday a despatch had appeared, containing an account of the manner in which the Opposition in the Council were being met. It said that most of the Amendments to the Bill were either withdrawn, or defeated by the compact official majority voting to order. This matter was urgent, because if things were allowed to take their course the Bill would be passed in three days' time. It was also important, because it dealt with vast interests in an important Province of India—with the entire question of landowning and land tenancy. He was not prepared to say that the Bill was uncalled for. He did not know enough about the subject. He was not familiar enough with the provisions of land tenancy in Bengal to say whether they were entirely satisfactory or not. In fact, he believed, in many respects, the permanent settlement effected by Lord Cornwallis was unsatisfactory; but the fact that it was called a permanent settlement was a reason why an alteration of it should not be approached without due deliberation. Again, the matter was urgent in this respect. Was this a time when the Government of India was so secure in the affections of every class of the people—when the Frontiers were so secure from foreign molestation—that it could afford to alienate from us the affections and interests of the entire class of the landowners in Bengal? That, undoubtedly, would be the case if the Bill were pressed with undue haste. This class resembled, in many respects, the loyal garrison in Ireland; but there was this difference—that the Zemindars, unable to draw Party distinctions, would associate this legislation with the Imperial Government. Recent legislation had done much to alienate the loyal classes in Ireland from the Liberal Party, and it was possible that the Zemindars of Bengal might similarly be alienated from the Imperial Government. Being unwilling to delay further the progress of the Redistribution Bill, he would conclude by asking the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India for some assurance that the measure before the Viceroy's Council would not be passed with undue haste. He trusted that the reason why sufficient time in which to translate the measure into the Native language had not as yet been given was not that the Viceroy and his Council were in a hurry to get to Simla. He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn,"—
(Sir Herbert Maxwell.)

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL and Mr. MACFARLANE rose together. Mr. Speaker called upon the former hon. Gentleman.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he objected strongly to the course taken by the hon. Member opposite (Sir Herbert Maxwell). He thought nothing could be more inappropriate than the Motion of the hon. Member; for the reason that he was quite sure that the House knew nothing at all about the matter. He did not believe that the 40 hon. Members who had risen with him (Sir Herbert Maxwell) understood the question; and he was quite sure that the hon. Baronet who moved the adjournment knew least of all. It was an enormously difficult question, and he was free to confess that he himself did not understand it. He did not know the details of the Bill; but this, however, he did know—that the subject had not been hurried over. On the contrary, what Bengal had reason to complain of was the immenso delay that had taken place, although the question had been made the subject of mischievous agitation for years. He asserted it was a matter of enormous public importance that this question should be settled, and not made the subject of a continued agitation and a war of classes. It was true there was some analogy between this question and the Irish Question; but there was this difference—namely, that the landowners of Ireland had a legal status to be considered absolute proprietors of the land; whereas, since 1793, the rights of the Zemindars had been limited by law, and this Bill was wanted to define and ascertain the exact limits of those rights as respects the ryots. The Zemindars of Bengal were mostly good and loyal subjects of the British Crown; and it was, he trusted, unnecessary to be unjust to any other class in order to secure their affection. The hon. Member was wrong in contending that the Bill ought to be delayed for some considerable time. He agreed, however, with the hon. Member in condemning the growing tendency of the Members of the Indian Council to hurry over business in order that they might leave Calcutta, and get away to Simla. He remembered the time when the Members of the Government and the Council were obliged to remain in Calcutta all the year round, and yet managed to thrive pretty well. He objected to the unsettlement of the Government, which resulted in a constant tendency on the part of the Members of the Government to hurry away. The British Government were not so weak in India as to refuse to do an act of justice, and it should be done, though an important measure of this kind should not be indecently hurried through. He hoped the Bill would be well settled, and if there were any difficulty in settling it in the time he thought the Members of Council ought to remain a few days in Calcutta for the purpose.

MR. MACFARLANE said, that those who knew something should say something to those who knew nothing. With respect to the subject before the House, some of the statements of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Herbert Maxwell), if left uncontradicted, were calculated to mislead the public. The hon. Baronet had said that the Bill was brought before the Council only a fortnight ago; whereas the fact was that the Bill, or one very like it, had been before the Council for years and years, and was the result of a Commission upon this very subject. Then the hon. Baronet said the Bill was to be passed in a foreign language; but unless Bills for India were passed in a great number of languages they must be foreign to some of the people they affected. After all, this Bill was merely an extension of an Act passed in 1859, against which the Zemindars made exactly the same outcry. The hon. Baronet also said that the Zemindars of Bengal were a formidable body, and that they ought to be conciliated; but the hon. Baronet evidently did not understand the object of the Bill, which was not to conciliate the Zemindars, but to conciliate 70,000,000 of their tenants. Which of the two classes, he (Mr. Macfarlane) should like to know, was best worth conciliating? He did not pledge himself to the details of the Bill; but as to the principles, in his opinion they were nothing more than justice.

Mr. J. K. CROSS said, he did not intend to enter into the merits or demerits of the Bill; but he thought he should explain to the House the mode in which the matter was brought before him by the hon. Baronet. That night, when he came down to the House, he received a Notice from the hon. Baronet saying that unless the answer to Mr. J. K. Cross' gave to the Question of the hon. Baronet was perfectly satisfactory the latter would move the adjournment of the House in order to bring the matter before the House. He told the hon. Baronet, practically, the answer he was going to give, and the hon. Baronet said he would consider whether it was sufficient. What was the Question the hon. Baronet asked? He asked whether he Mr. J. K. Cross was aware that this Bill, which had only been before the Council a fortnight, had not been translated into the vernacular, and told him, at the same time, that an eminent Native gentleman, a Member of the Legislative Council in Bengal, had sent a telegram, stating that the Bill had not been translated, and wished for the intervention of Parliament. That was an astonishing statement to him. If the hon. Baronet would give him time he would telegraph to India and get the facts of the case, and place them in his hands. He did not see that he could do anything more. He could only say that if, instead of sending him a note at half-past 5 o'clock that evening, the hon. Baronet had called upon him any time during the day, and asked his attention to a question of this importance, he would have been glad to place himself in communication with India at once on the subject. He hoped the hon. Baronet would accept this explanation, and withdraw his Motion for Adjournment.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, that nothing could be fairer than the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India, Mr. J. K. Cross; but, at the same time, he was not quite sure whether he understood the hon. Gentleman to promise that the Bill should not be hurried through until it had been printed and circulated in the vernacular.

Mr. MACFARLANE: Which vernacular? He knew of no case more than the present in which it was reasonable and desirable that a private Member should avail himself of the Rule relating to Motions for Adjournment, and bring them into requisition than on this occasion. He would remind hon. Gentlemen opposite, including some Members of the Government who were conspicuous for their disorderly interruptions during the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Wigton (Sir Herbert Maxwell), that the House of Commons discharged the functions of a Senate as well as those of a vestry; and if the House was to vindicate its claims to be the great Council of the nation, and to attend to the affairs of the whole British Empire, it must be occasionally content, at the risk of spending a few moments, to withdraw itself from merely domestic and Party political affairs in order to give attention to the vital and important interests of our Indian Empire. This Bill seemed to him to be simply an adaptation to Hindostan of the principles which had had such an unenviable notoriety in connection with land legislation in Ireland. That property guaranteed by previous legislation should be summarily taken away at a few days' notice without those primarily affected by it having a legitimate opportunity of making themselves acquainted with the contents of the Bill was, in his humble judgment, a monstrous and outrageous act of despotism, which the House should be slow to sanction. He hoped the Government would allow the House clearly to understand, not that three or four days after the Bill was passed his hon. Friend the Member for Wigton would be privileged with an interview at the India Office, and he told that the Government had ascertained that the Bill had passed, and that they could not pursue the subject further, but that the assurance of the Under Secretary of State for India was a bona fide one—namely, that Her Majesty's Government would communicate by telegraph with the Government in India, and would insure that due deliberation was observed, in order that the persons interested in the Bill might be made acquainted with the contents of the Bill, and have a legitimate time to consider so important a measure before it became law.

Mr. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. Lowther), with his usual moderation of language, relies upon the stock of knowledge that he possesses for the statement he makes, that there is now being perpetrated in India a monstrous and outrageous act of despotism. The violent language which the right hon. Gentleman uses both here and elsewhere does not tend to carry conviction to the minds of candid and unprejudiced gentlemen in the country, or in that House. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Herbert Maxwell), by his Motion, appears to me to ask for time. The right hon. Gentleman has supported the Motion: but he wants no time, because he says this Bill is an act of plunder; and what is the use of demanding time for an act of plunder? He has full knowledge of it already, and if he has had time to acquire that knowledge which he declares he possesses, and which we can judge of from the epithets he used, surely those who are in India, and who have been discussing it and hearing of it for two or three years, must have an adequate knowledge of it also. The right hon. Gentleman says that this is a very fortunate and happy use of the 10 Members' Rule. I am bound to express an entirely opposite opinion. The hon. Baronet, I think, is under a mistake in bringing this matter forward as one of urgent public importance without having previously done his best to obtain information as to the actual state of the case. No opportunity has been given to us of obtaining a knowledge of the actual state of the case by telegraphic communication. What is the state of knowledge with which the House is now called upon to discuss this matter? We have heard a telegram once read by the hon. Baronet which he said was sent to him by a Native Member of the Council—we have not got that telegram before us, and it is difficult to recollect its exact terms—and upon the mere strength of that telegram Her Majesty's Government are desired to interfere with the proceedings of the Council of India. In one thing I sympathize very much with the hon. Baronet—namely, in the weight he is evidently disposed to attach to the opinion of Native Members of Council. I believe the telegram states that the Bill has been passed by an official majority. Do I understand him to say that none but official Members voted for the Bill?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he had only the information contained in that telegram, which he would again read for the information of hon. Members.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not find that there is any statement in the telegram that the Bill was carried by an official majority.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: That was in the telegram in The Times of yesterday.

MR. GLADSTONE: Well, I want to know whether the hon. Baronet has any knowledge as to what is exactly meant by carrying the Bill by an official majority? Was there any statement in The Times on that subject? These words are often very loosely used. I should like to know what course was taken by the other Native Members of the Council? It has been stated by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India that this Bill is in substance the same as has been before the Council in former years; and it is within my own knowledge that Lord Ripon considered that he was handing over to Lord Dufferin substantially the same Bill. ["Oh, oh!"] We have no evidence of its being a Bill of a different character. I must confess it appears to me that the position is a very singular one. Are we to say that, upon the view of a single Member of Council sending a telegram, giving his impression of the Bill, this House is to be called upon, by means of the 10 Members' Rule, and in derogation of the ordinary course of Business, distinctly to interfere with the regular action of the Legislative Council of India? It appears to me that that is a very questionable and inconvenient mode of proceeding. I know there have been cases of scandalous rapidity—I need not quote them—in passing Bills through the Legislative Council of India; but I have not heard of any such under the management of Lord Dufferin or Lord Ripon. Whenever such a case occurs it will be a very proper matter for the investigation of this House; but as the right hon. Gentleman thinks this is a most appropriate manner of using the 10 Members' Rule—I must say that a statement conveyed upon such grounds as have been recited, with such a total want of particularity—without any application to the official organ of the Indian Department to improve our knowledge of the case, does not warrant a demand that this House should use its influence with the Executive Government for the purpose of interfering with the course of business in the Legislative Council. We must have some confidence in the Governor General and Executive Council until some grounds have been laid before us for presuming that they have acted wrongly; and I submit that no grounds have been shown which ought to overbear that general confidence, and induce us to do that which has a tendency to weaken the authority of the Legislative Council. The right hon. Gentleman has asked whether the assurance of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India was bond fide? [Mr. J. LOWTHER: I assumed that it was.] Having assumed that it was bond fide, the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to give a construction of his own, metamorphosing that assurance into something totally different, and reserving to himself, with his usual discernment and moderation, if my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State did not conform to the right hon. Gentleman's definition of the bond fide assurance, the right of coming down and accusing my hon. Friend of bad faith in not having acted up to his assurance. I do not think there is any doubt as to the bond fide of the offer of my hon. Friend; and, unquestionably, I think the House will do well to allow my hon. Friend—who, I believe, is at present so occupied—to endeavour to ascertain the real facts of the case.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am always very reluctant to bring Indian questions under the consideration of this House by resorting to a Motion for Adjournment, except under very pressing and exceptional circumstances which render such a step necessary; and if the step taken by my hon. Friend (Sir Herbert Maxwell) was for the purpose of discussing the merits of this Bill, I should feel considerable hesitation in approving of, or taking any action respecting, it. But the question raised by my hon. Friend does not relate so much to the character of the Bill as to the course of proceeding on the part of the Legislative Council. He is in this position. He has been appealed to as a Member of Parliament by a Native of great distinction, who holds a most important position in that Council, to do what? Not to oppose any of the provisions of the Bill, but to bring the matter before Parliament, and to ask that time may be given for its consideration. It appears from what has been said by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. J. K. Cross) that, under such circumstances, it is not an unreasonable thing that an inquiry should be made as to the correctness of the statement of the Native gentleman to whom reference has been made. Then the Prime Minister gets up and begins to find fault with my hon. Friend for making use of this particular opportunity of moving the adjournment of the House in order to bring the case before Parliament; and the right hon. Gentleman says that it is highly inconvenient and unfair that the course of Public Business should be thus interrupted. We are told that we should not now have raised this question at all, though it is one of great urgency, because it infringes on the time to be devoted to a matter of great internal importance, but which does not press in the same way from day to day. There is, I take it, a considerable amount of parallel between what is going on here and at the other side of the world; for while that is the answer we are given here, on the other side of the world we see in India, in reply to a request for time, an answer, not on the merits of the Bill, but that it is necessary for the Governor General and his Council to go to Simla without delay. There is a great deal of similarity between these two pleas; but neither of them touches the root of the matter—namely, that time ought to be given for the consideration of this Bill. The subtle distinctions raised by the Prime Minister are really, I think, not quite worthy of the occasion. My hon. Friend says that he has been informed by a Member of the Governor General's Council that such and such feelings are entertained on this subject; and the right hon. Gentleman meets this by asking—"Do you know what the other Members think?" I do not see that it was necessary or possible for my hon. Friend to know that. Then the right hon. Gentleman asks as to the opinions of the official Members on this subject. It is easy for the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India to obtain that information in a very short time. In an hour or two he will probably obtain information which will set all these matters at rest. He has shown no disinclination to give that information, and I shall be perfectly satisfied with his answer and the promise he has given. Had it not been for the rebuke which the Prime Minister has given to my hon. Friend, and which, I think, under the circumstances, was hardly called for, I might not have thought it necessary to rise.

MR. BIGGAR said, he held that it was the duty of the Legislative Council of the Viceroy to allow no delay to take place in passing this meritorious and beneficial measure into law.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the leave of the House to withdraw his Motion. ["No, no!"]

Question put, and negatived.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) (re-committed BILL.—[BILL 49.]

(Mr. Gladstone, The Marquess of Hartington, Sir Charles W. Dilke, M. Attorney General, The Lord Advocate, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 6th March.]

[SECOND NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

In the Committee.

PART I.

REDISTRIBUTION.

Boroughs.

Clause 2 Boroughs named in First Schedule to become parts of counties or boroughs.

Amendment again proposed, in page 1, line 12, after the word "boroughs," to insert the words "and Universities."—(Mr. Bryce.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to submit to the Chairman a point of Order in reference to an Amendment of which he had given Notice. It was an Amendment on the first page of the Notice Paper to Clause 2, line 13, to insert after "Act," "and the University of Dublin." The point of Order to which he now wished more fully to draw the attention of the Chairman came up on the last evening that the Committee was engaged on this Bill; and it was then asked of the Chairman whether, in the event of the House negating the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), which had just been proposed from the Chair, the case of Trinity College per se could be raised by a subsequent Amendment? Considerable confusion prevailed at the time in the Committee, owing to the presence of a very large number of Members; but the Chairman then appeared to be of opinion that it would not be possible to raise the question of Trinity College by itself as a subsequent Amendment. Being very desirous of disentangling the question of Trinity College from the general question of University representation, he (Mr. Parnell) had, in the meantime, drafted the Amendment to which he had just directed the attention of the Chairman, and had placed it on the Notice Paper. He would now respectfully submit that it would not be out of Order to move that Amendment in the event of the House negating the present Amendment, and his reason was this. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets now under discussion had reference to, and must be interpreted with, one of the Schedules annexed to the Act; but his (Mr. Parnell's) Amendment stood entirely separate from the Schedules. It had no reference to any Schedule now in the Bill, or proposed to be inserted in it; and if it were adopted it would read as part of the Bill, and subsequently of the Act. Therefore, he would respectfully submit to the consideration of the Chairman whether the Amendment of which he had given Notice, drafted as it was, did not raise a separate and distinct question from that which was now under the consideration of the Committee? If the hon. Gentleman should so rule, he (Mr. Parnell) would be most glad to defer the discussion of the question of the separate representation of Trinity College until that Amendment was reached, in which case he presumed the Committee would at once go into the question proposed by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets.

THE CHAIRMAN: I had considered this question when I gave my decision the other night on the general question. Since then I have had a further opportunity of considering the suggestion which the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) has made in regard to the Schedules of the Bill. I am clearly of opinion that if the Amendment now before the Committee should be negatived, it would not be competent for the hon. Member to raise the question again in regard to the University of Dublin at any other portion of the Committee stage of the Bill. It must be clear, I think, to the hon. Member that if it is competent for him to do so he or other hon. Members could raise the same question with regard to the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, the Scotch Universities or the University of London; and the consequence would be that the opinion of the Committee, after having been delivered, would be stultified. Therefore, if the hon. Member wishes to raise the question of the University of Dublin he cannot do it now, but must wait another stage of the Bill—namely, the Report.

Mr. PARNELL said, he was much obliged to the hon. Gentleman for the careful decision he had given, and for the attention he had paid to the matter. But, under the circumstances, he felt bound to take the opportunity, although he should have desired to disentangle the question of the separate representation of Trinity College from the general question of University representation, of inviting the attention of the Committee to the separate representation of the University of Dublin. He did not propose, in doing so, to refer to the general question of University representation, as he considered that that matter had been already very fully discussed, and nothing he could venture to add to that part of the discussion could throw any new light upon the matter, or assist the Committee in arriving at a decision. But the question of the superabundant representation of two Members which this Bill proposed to leave to Trinity College, Dublin, stood upon an entirely different footing. Even if the Committee were to decide, as it probably would, that the English and Scotch Universities should maintain their representation, the case of Trinity College, and the absurdity of giving Trinity College a representation at all, would still remain as it was. He might argue the question on the basis of numbers. He might point out that whereas it was proposed by the Bill to give to the great English and Scotch Universities 7 Members with a constituency of 25,000, or about 1 Member to 3,600, it was proposed to give to the University of Dublin 2 Members for a constituency of 4,104, or 1 Member for about 2,000.

Mr. GIBSON said, that the hon. Member had added the constituencies for the English and Scotch Universities together, and had consequently given a misleading figure.

Mr. PARNELL said, he did not think that his calculation was unfair. He had added the constituencies for the English and Scotch Universities together; and, as far as he was able to make out, it came to one Member for every 3,600 electors, showing a very much greater and more overwhelming disparity than the disparity which hon. Members supposed to exist in the Members proposed by the Bill to be given to the electors of Ireland and of Great Britain respectively. It was not, however, upon that argument that he intended to proceed. He admitted that if the Committee decided that it was desirable to maintain University representation at all, and if it were taken for granted that Trinity College and the University of Dublin answered the same purposes and fulfilled the same functions as the great English and Scotch Universities, then the Irish Members would not have a sufficient claim upon that basis for anything more than a reduction in the number of Representatives proposed to be given to Trinity College. But his argument was that Trinity, as a College and University, was not entitled to any separate representation at all, on the ground that it did not fulfil the functions which a University ought to fulfil, and that it was a College and University which had been from its birth the College and University of a very small section and minority of the people in Ireland, and that it remained to this day, in spite of the attempt at legislation made in 1873 by Professor Fawcett to open it, the same close body which it had always been. Trinity College was founded by Queen Elizabeth in 1591, and it had its origin, he might say, in confiscation. Its foundation-stone was laid upon confiscated land. Trinity College buildings were erected upon the site of an ancient Catholic monastery, which was confiscated, in addition to all the other possessions of the religious Order to which it belonged, in the Reign of Henry VIII. He might, perhaps, be told that that Order gave up its lands, and that they were not confiscated; but they had been practically confiscated, as the alternative put before the heads of the Order was that of being attainted for high treason, the penalty for which, in those days, was being hanged, drawn, and quartered. It was either that or the surrender of the title to the lands. The lands and the site of the monastery, having been confiscated, fell into the possession of the Corporation of Dublin, which was, in those days, an "ascendancy institution"—a character that, he was happy to say, no longer attached to it—and the site of Trinity College, strange to say, was granted in the Reign of Elizabeth by the Corporation of Dublin for the purpose of building a new University. That University absolutely remained, in deed as well as in name, the new University which was to be the mother of the Universities of Ireland, but which had failed to propagate from herself any similar institutions throughout the length and breadth of the country. The new University remained, until 1873, in deed as well as in name, absolutely and exclusively the University of a very small minority—namely, the Episcopalian Protestants of Ireland, numbering about one-eighth of the whole population of the country. In 1873 the late Professor Fawcett, with, no doubt, the best intentions, induced the Legislature to pass an Act for the purpose of opening Trinity College; but, like many other pieces of legislation conceived, designed, and carried out by Englishmen, it failed in its objects, owing to the want of knowledge which Englishmen must always labour under in regard to the special requirements of Ireland in educational and all other matters. Previous to 1873 the Provostship, the Fellowships, and the Scholarships could only be held by members of the English Church in Ireland; and as the Scholarships were very valuable and very much sought after, some Catholics in Ireland, who found themselves qualified to compete with their Protestant fellow-countrymen for the possession of those valuable educational prizes and rewards, adopted the system which subsequently became known as "turning for Scholarships"—that was to say, during the three years' residence required within which Scholarships could be held they consented, although Catholics, to partake of the Sacraments of the Episcopalian Church in Ireland. Up to 1873 that state of affairs continued, and the valuable prizes and rewards for proficiency in educational attainments offered by Trinity College could only practically be held by the members of a particular Church in Ireland—namely, the Protestant Episcopalian Church, afterwards the Church of Ireland. In 1873, as he had said, the late Professor Fawcett introduced a Bill for the purpose of remedying this state of things, and opening the University, so far as those matters went, to the members of all religious denominations; but the result had since then been much the same. The proportion of Catholic students and Catholic undergraduates to those of other denominations in the University of Dublin had not been altered. The number of students or of undergraduates of any other denomination but the Episcopalian was still almost infinitesimal. The Governing Bodies of the University and the College were still almost absolutely and entirely in the hands of persons professing the Episcopal creed. He believed that out of 29 members of the Senate there were only four or five Catholics; that out of the members of the Council, numbering 40, there were only two Catholics; of the officers of the University and the College, numbering about 100, there were almost as few Catholics. How many Fellows out of the 30 senior and junior Fellows were Catholics he had no absolute information to give the Committee; but he believed there were not more than two at the outside, if there were so many. In fact, Trinity College remained, notwithstanding the good intentions of Professor Fawcett, the University and the College of that very small minority of the people which he had described as one-eighth of the population. It possessed endowments of very great value. Treating it as a College, it was commonly known as being the most richly-endowed College in Europe. As a University, it compared well with the large endowments of Oxford and Cambridge. The income and revenue of Trinity College, from all sources, amounted to £86,000 per annum, £31,000 a-year of which was derived from land every acre of which had been confiscated. The endowments of the great University of Oxford only amounted to £174,000; so that Trinity College, with its narrow range and restricted limits of education, had nearly one-half of the endowments of Oxford University, and more than one-half of the endowments of Cambridge University, which amounted to £150,000. Now, what he had to put to the Committee was this—did they really intend, by sanctioning the Parliamentary representation of Trinity College, to set their seal, in this year of the 19th century, upon the maintenance of Trinity College and Dublin University as the higher educational establishment of the Irish people? Of course, they knew that the Bill had been drafted as the result of a compromise between the two Front Benches; but the Members of the Committee generally were not bound to regard any such compromise. He supposed what was called the "Loyal minority" in Ireland saw, in the maintenance of two Members for Trinity College, an opportunity of strengthening their Party, and that their spokesman, Lord Salisbury, insisted on the maintenance of the Representatives of the University of Dublin. Be that as it might, he thought the present case was singularly a case in which the independent Members of the Committee might forsake their allegiance and act and vote honestly, according to their convictions. He had nothing to say against Trinity College as a seat of learning. It had turned out many distinguished men—in fact, thousands of distinguished men. It had succeeded as the University of a small section, where others had conspicuously failed. He had no fault to find with the character of the teaching which was obtained within its ancient walls. He believed it was a fact that it could compete, in many branches, with Oxford and Cambridge, and the most distinguished Universities in England and Scotland; but he took his stand on the principle that, while they were going to give a University a permanent representation for the future, they should only give it such a representation if it could be shown that it was simply the University of a minority in a country where they had also provided University representation for the majority. In the case of Ireland it was impossible for them to do so, because there was no University education for the majority, just as there was no University available for the majority. Trinity College, with its rich endowments, sufficient for the higher educational requirements of the whole of Ireland, was the College and the University of the minority, for it would be absurd to pause over the abortive attempt at legislation by the late Government, with the view of establishing a Royal University. There was no other University to which Catholics could send their sons. The Queen's Colleges had failed, and it came to this—that they were going to give to a University that was admittedly the University of a minority a separate representation which would be abundantly sufficient for the University representation of the whole of Ireland if there were Colleges and Universities available for the majority. There was another remarkable fact which ought to be made known to the Committee. By the Act of Union one Member only was given to the University of Dublin; it was not until the Reform Act of 1833 that the number was raised to two. It therefore followed that, from every point of view, the Committee was about to do an absurd thing; and if the Bill remained as it did—if they declined, in obedience to the orders of the two Front Benches, to alter the Bill in that respect—he ventured to predict that not many years would pass before an alteration in the system of University education would take place in Ireland of such a nature and extent that not only the revenues of Trinity College, but the other endowments given by Parliament to the Queen's Colleges and the Royal University, would be shared fairly between the different religious denominations in that country; and, in the end, they would be compelled to retrace their steps, and to undo the excessive representation they had given to Dublin University, and to pass a fresh Redistribution Bill in regard to a matter which he ventured to think had been abundantly proved—namely, the glaring anomaly of the present proposal.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Parnell) seemed to him to be a speech appropriate to the subject of establishing a Catholic University for the Catholic majority of Ireland. It was certainly not a speech directed to the representation of learning by the Dublin University. He thought that hon. Members who remembered the debates of 1873 would, perhaps, now regret that an opportunity was not taken then to do justice to the Roman Catholics of Ireland by giving them, at least, a College in the University of Dublin. There was no objection, at that time, to have established a Roman Catholic College and a common University, with a common examination, excluding merely two subjects—modern history and moral philosophy—upon which irreconcilable views were taken by Protestants and Roman Catholics. Those two subjects might well have been dealt with by the Colleges themselves, without the interference of the University; and if, at that time, or subsequently, broader views had prevailed, and if, instead of the mischievous and abortive Bill of the late Postmaster General (Professor Fawcett), they had given the Roman Catholics that to which they were eminently entitled, he thought the painful scene of that evening would have been avoided. He called it a painful scene, because they must notice the distinct degradation in the tone of the demand of the Irish people, through their Representatives, as to the representation of learning in the House of Commons. He had often heard Roman Catholics occupying a distinguished position allude to Trinity College as one of the greatest glories of Ireland; and while they lamented that the doors of Trinity College were not open to them, on account of their religious scruples, they never failed to do homage to the galaxy of Irishmen who had been educated at Trinity, and had shed a lustre on learning, besides conferring inestimable benefits upon their country. What was the tone now? He would tell the Committee what the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) alluded to, and how it had all arisen. During the autumn of last year the Roman Catholic hierarchy “threw up the sponge” in the cause of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and placed in his hands the question of University education in Ireland. From that moment there had been a lowering of the tone, and the question now was one simply between Protestant and Catholic. He knew of no Protestants, except one or two eccentric individuals, who followed the lead of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. His followers were all Roman Catholics, and undoubtedly of very different views from those which formerly obtained in that House. They were those who would deprive the Protestant minority of every semblance of representation if they could possibly do so. [“No, no!”] They raised, in every possible way, the odious question of religious belief. Hardly an afternoon passed in that House in which a question was not asked as to the religious belief of particular individuals. That was a thing which a few years ago had almost disappeared; and his own recollection of Ireland during the last 25 years was that religious questions and religious differences of opinion had become softened in the hearts and minds of the people, and especially in those of the ecclesiastics. But now these religious questions had been revived, and every subject of the kind that was raised was simply made a question between Catholics and Protestants. [Mr. BIGGAR: No, no!] He had long determined to make this statement to the House, and the present appeared to him to be a good opportunity for doing so. He claimed for the Irish people, who were not represented, their ancient love and respect for learning. He claimed that they should not be supposed, in consequence of what had been said by hon. Members opposite—and they had been told more than once from the other side that education and learning ought not to be regarded at all—he claimed for them that they must not be supposed really to have degraded themselves, and to have forgotten that love of learning and love of religion which formerly distinguished them. The hon. Member for the City of Cork made a statement of a most astounding character. He had mentioned in the House the practice of “turning” for Scholarships; he told them that up to 1873 there were Roman Catholics so degraded as to receive the most solemn Sacraments of a religion not their own, for the purpose of obtaining miserable money Scholarships. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) denied that statement altogether. Would hon. Members opposite, who were themselves Roman Catholics, affirm it? [Mr. SULLIVAN: Hear, hear!] He hoped, then, there would be some evidence produced of such a practice. If it was true of any considerable body of men, he, for his own part, considered that it explained a great deal of the silence, which they had witnessed with regret, on the part of the religious teachers in Ireland, respecting outrages. But he refused to believe it. If it was possible that men professing the Roman Catholic faith could so degrade themselves systematically for so small an object, it was not a matter of surprise to him that they had not heard more hearty denunciations of the outrages which had occurred in Ireland. The hon. Member had spoken also of the Corporation of Dublin, and had said that the Corporation was no longer an ascendency Corporation. There was one ascendency, however, in the Corporation of Dublin which had never been witnessed before—the ascendency of liquor. The number of Representatives who had crept into the Corporation of Dublin, and who kept little public-houses and shebeens, was very large.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I rise to Order, Sir. I beg to ask you if the hon. Gentleman Mr. Mitchell Henry is in Order in going into the composition of the Corporation of Dublin, and in making the House acquainted with this interesting information?

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand the hon. Member to be replying to the observations of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell).

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the hon. Member for Wexford was evidently ashamed of the composition of the Corporation of Dublin. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) was very glad that it should be so. It was part of the degradation of Irish politics which was the misfortune of the Irish people, and which would eventually recoil upon them. He, for his own part, would give his vote against the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce). He would always vote for the representation of culture and learning as a thing desirable of itself. It was desirable even in this country, and especially was it desirable in Ireland. He would, on this as on former occasions, give his best help to the Roman Catholic population of Ireland to obtain that justice and those educational endowments which had been hitherto denied to them by prejudices which he entreated the House of Commons to rise above, but which had hitherto restrained its action. He entreated the Government—whatever Government might be in power—to retrace the halting footstaps of the past, and to give to the Roman Catholics that to which they were entitled—a resident College or a resident University for themselves equal in status, equal in emoluments, and equal in learning to Trinity College itself.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the Committee Mr. Mitchell Henry, and the peculiar processes of whose mind were still a mystery to those who frequently listened to him, had, in a speech dealing with the representation of Trinity College, referred to the question of the liquor interest in the Dublin Corporation. He (Mr. Sexton) could only tell the hon. Member that the attack which he had made upon a particular trade, if the ascendency of that trade were in any danger in Dublin, had secured for it a long lease of popularity in Ireland after that evening. The hon. Gentleman had cast some doubt upon the position of the Members on those Benches as Representatives of the Irish people. They had been born and bred among the Irish people, and had brought their mandate from Ireland; but it was a peculiar condition of the discussion of Irish questions in that House that when Irishmen, whose lives and interests were in common with the great body of the Irish people, rose in that House to speak of the views and hopes of Ireland, some Englishman was always sure to rise and represent himself as the true exponent of the hopes and opinions of that country. He did not think he had ever listened to a more extraordinary statement than that made by the hon. Member in reference to the observations of his hon. Friend Mr. Parnell) as to "turning" for Scholarships in Trinity. His hon. Friend did not say that any considerable number of students in Trinity had belied their faith and disgraced their manhood by conforming to the ritual of the Anglican Sacraments for the purpose of gaining the dignities and emoluments of the University. His hon. Friend did convey that such instances had occurred; and if the hon. Member, as an Englishman, was not so ignorant as he was of the history of Ireland and the records of Trinity College, he would know that at least a colourable sale and barter of the faith of Catholic students were amongst the most disgraceful landmarks of that institution. What was there strange or new in that? Why, the whole policy of English rule in Ireland had been a policy directed against the creed of the nation more directly, he would say, until a recent period than against the nation or the race. The flower of the race were exiled after the violation of the Treaty of Limerick; the forces of the nation were broken down by the success of William of Orange; but the intense devotion of the people to their creed remained. The whole object of the Penal Laws was to induce the people to give up the practice of their own faith, and conform to the Protestant religion; and after 120 years of Penal Laws, during which many a Catholic son conformed to the Anglican creed for the purpose of turning his own father out of his estate and his home, during which any man, who turned Protestant, could take a horse from a Catholic, if the horse were over the value of £5; after all the practices resorted to for the purpose of corrupting Catholics, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mitchell Henry), an Englishman, had the audacity to make an attack upon the real Representatives of Ireland.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Perhaps I may be allowed to correct the hon. Gentleman. I have not a single English blood relation in the world.

MR. SEXTON said, he had resumed his seat in the hope that when the hon. Member rose the Committee would have heard from him an autobiography of himself, which, if not brief, would at least have been definite; but the hon. Member simply informed the Committee that he had not an English blood relation in the world. But a man could be an Englishman without having an English blood relation in the world; and he (Mr. Sexton) would submit to the common sense of the Committee that his statement with regard to the hon. Gentleman had not yet been replied to, and the hon. Member's account of himself was not complete. It was absurd to contend that recreancy to faith and to principle by individual Catholics in Ireland was anything new, or anything to be astonished at; because the whole basis of English law and policy in Ireland for the last 200 years had been to draw away the adhesion of individual Catholics of ability from their own faith in order to strengthen English ascendancy in that country. A more extraordinary connection of subjects—separated as they were from each other by an impassable gulf—had been touched upon by the hon. Member—namely, between the “turning” for Scholarships in Trinity College, and the assumed silence of ministers of religion with respect to outrages—had never before been witnessed in any speech delivered in that House. The hon. Gentleman had reproached his (Mr. Sexton's) hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) with not having spoken to the subject. He did not believe the Committee had ever heard a speech more close to the subject than that of his hon. Friend. He believed that if the Prime Minister were to address the Committee he would admit that that was the case, because he noticed that the right hon. Gentleman had listened to it with close attention and unbroken interest. His hon. Friend proved that Trinity College, in proportion to the Universities of Great Britain, had a representation double that which it ought to have. A British University Member represented nearly 4,000 electors, and each Member for Trinity College would only represent 2,000. His hon. Friend had shown that the endowments of the University were inflated and excessive, and that it was to-day, as in the days of Elizabeth and William of Orange, a place where the sons of a small section of the nation, of one faith, planted there as a colony, received their education out of the fruit of endowments which were equitably the property of the people. His hon. Friend had further shown that these endowments and emoluments and the power of the University were in the hands of persons of one creed, and so Trinity College did not fulfil the functions of a University towards the people of Ireland. What argument could possibly be more complete or more relevant to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) than to show that the representation about to be continued to Trinity College was double that of the English Universities, and that Trinity College, as a teaching Body, was entitled to no representation at all, because it was only the University of a segment and a fraction of the Irish nation? His hon. Friend might have added, if he had chosen to do so, that the Members for Trinity College in that House, distinguished as they were, and occupying, as they prided themselves on occupying, seats upon the Front Opposition Bench, were politicians, and politicians merely, and had never, by any speech or proceeding in that House, shown themselves to be specially qualified or distinguished as expounders or Representatives of the cause, or as the Representatives of the interests of learning in any way. They were so thoroughly politicians of a certain class, that whenever any proposal had been made in that House to restrict the liberties of the Irish people—to place the fortunes, liberties, and lives of the Irish people in the hands of any Crown official, the voices of the right hon. and learned Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench had been the first raised in favour of the proposal. When any proposal had been made to extend the facilities of Trinity College to the general body of the Irish people, and to place its endowments at the service of the country, the cry of terror and apprehension of these right hon. and learned Gentlemen had been the first shrill cry raised. When any proposal had been made to extend the liberties of the people of Ireland, to render them happier subjects of the Crown and worthier citizens of the Realm, the voices of the two right hon. and learned Members for Dublin University, conscious of the falseness, the hollowness, and the untenability of their own public position, had been the first raised in behalf of the miserable plea of keeping the Irish people in subjection in their own country. Upon every ground—upon the ground of its gates being closed against the faith and conscience of the general body of the people, upon the ground of its excessive representation, upon the ground of its dignities and emoluments being kept in the hands of persons of one creed, upon the ground of its gross, systematic, and obstinate misuse of its political power and privilege in that House—Trinity College ought to be wiped out of the political map of Ireland. He had shown, therefore, that the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork was relative to the subject; but what about the speech of his hon. Friend's accuser? Because his hon. Friend had referred to the fact that individual Catholics in Trinity College had been false to their own faith, for the purpose of seeking the dignities and emoluments of that institution, the hon. Member opposite had referred to the fact as an explanation of the silence of ministers of religion in Ireland with respect to outrages. The ministers of religion in Ireland, in the darkest and most evil times, had been the very men who had given up their popularity—sometimes, possibly, even risked their lives—for the sake of keeping the people within those bounds of legality and good order beyond which the English, by their harsh and cruel laws, systematically did their best to drive them. He asked any Protestant Gentleman in that House—and nine out of 10 of those who were listening to him belonged to that creed—whether it was generous, whether it was fair, whether it was tolerable for a Protestant Gentleman to rise in that House and cast that unworthy sneer and that foul and baseless imputation against the ministers of the national creed of Ireland, as self-sacrificing and devoted to the cause of morals and order as any religious ministers in the world? They had been told that they had revived the religious cry. They were a Party of Catholic men who followed a Protestant Leader. They were a Party of men who belonged to that people who had shown an unexampled chivalry in politics in giving the mandate of Catholic constituencies to Members of the Protestant faith. They were a Party of Catholic men who stood by their Protestant Leader, who defended his character and justified his aims when some of the most eminent persons belonging to the Catholic Church attacked him; and he (Mr. Sexton) would here repeat the saying of Daniel O'Connell—"That, Catholics as they were, they took their theology from Rome, but they took their politics from Ireland," and that there was no power on earth—call it by what name they pleased—to sever the allegiance they owed, gave, and meant to continue to give, to the cause of their country and that Protestant Leader, who, in the cause of that country, had proved himself fearless and faithful. The religious cry, when it was revived, was revived by the class to which the hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Galway belonged; it was revived by the landlords of Ulster; it was revived by that dishonest and desperate class of men who, when they found that their hold upon the homes and the fruits of the labour of their tenants was gone, and when the legislation of the right hon. Gentleman opposite had taken at least a first step towards a just and equitable and complete redress of the evils under which the people suffered—when they found the power of their exactions gone, again fell back upon the old evil device of bigotry, and lit upon the plains of Ulster the flames of religious hatred. The Irish Party were not open to the charge of religious bigotry. They regarded the claims of no creed. They thought only of the rights of their own country. They desired the union of all classes, and of all creeds of Irishmen; and whatever might be said in that House by some Gentlemen who, like the hon. Member opposite, by trading upon an Irish political cry, had gained an entrance into that House, and had used that entrance and that arena for the purpose of defaming and discrediting those who sent them to it—whatever such hon. Members might say, the Irish Party would be found, through good and evil report, in the days of their effort, and in those days which he believed were near approaching—the days of their deliverance from English Parliamentary control, and the days of the success of their national claims—they would be found to be a Party who, when power and the responsibility which power brought with it were placed in their hands, would have not merely a just, but even a chivalrous regard for the interests, feelings, and even the prejudices of their Protestant fellow-countrymen.

MR. GIBSON said, he should have been content to remain silent that evening and take no part in this debate as to University representation, because he had been quite satisfied with the remarks of those who had presented their views in opposition to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) on the last occasion when the Committee sat; but when the debate had been adjourned, and after the speech which they had just heard, he could hardly remain silent. He was not at all sure that the speeches which had been made were consistent with one another, nor with themselves. No case had been presented to Parliament which was calculated to command its sympathy. He could understand the general question of University representation being fully discussed and thoroughly debated. They had a fair debate upon that question on the last occasion when the Committee sat. Views were presented, of course, upon both sides; and he could understand hon. Members arriving at different conclusions on that important question. For his own part, he did not think it would be fair for him to ask the Committee to extend its attention to him for any lengthened re-opening of the general question; but he could not forbear from saying that he thought, in the new Parliament perhaps more than in the present Parliament, it would be desirable to keep up the representation of the Universities. In a Parliament of 670 Members, surely it was not too much to ask that its dead level of representation should be broken by the interposition of nine University Members—men whose business it was, in addition to representing what they conceived to be the wants of the whole country, to exercise the special function of considering the claims of education, and the needs and requirements of the Professions of the Law, the Church, and Medicine. The great value of such representation had not been seriously questioned in the course of the debate. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, as an able and highly-qualified Gentleman, was entitled to be heard on such a question as a high authority; but he (Mr. Gibson) thought the hon. and learned Member had somewhat magnified a Professoriate, and minimized the quality of a University. Surely in the University there was something wider than the Professoriate. But the hon. and learned Member had suggested that the whole University of Oxford, with which the hon. Member himself was honourably connected, was to be lowered down to the dimensions of a Professoriate. His grievance appeared to be that men as qualified as himself were never returned to represent the Universities. He (Mr. Gibson) was himself disposed to think that the Universities might not be better represented if the views of the hon. and learned Member were adopted. He admitted the high attainments of the hon. and learned Member, and his great qualifications; but he was not sure whether it was not more wise for a University to look outside the Professoriate, and to elect Representatives from among men who would approach the consideration of questions educationally, professionally, and generally from something of a broader standpoint.

MR. BRYCE said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to have misunderstood what he had said. He did not say that the constituency ought to be brought down to consist only of residents. He had stated that the residents were too few, and he had spoken of the resident teachers as a whole and the Fellows of the Colleges, and not of the Professors alone, who were in Oxford and Cambridge a much smaller body. Nor had he suggested that Members should be chosen from the teachers.

MR. GIBSON said, that explanation did not affect the argument much. The hon. and learned Gentleman had fixed a unit. He had said that the Teaching Body was composed of 200 men, and that, in his view, they were entitled to representation. [Mr. Bryce: No.] Whether they were called teachers or Professors or not did not affect his point. He felt the same objection if a contrast was to be drawn between lay Members and Professorial Members. Indeed, he saw a distinct preference for lay Members, because the Professors would have their business to attend to in the University, and it might be a little difficult for them to attend to their Parliamentary duties in the House of Commons with that close attention which was needed on the part of all who had representative duties to perform, because it might so happen that if Professors were always returned to represent the Universities they would be obliged to fix a time for their lectures more convenient to themselves than to their classes. It was admitted—in fact, the argument could not be addressed, he ventured to think, with anything like dignity to the House of Commons—it was admitted that this was a question that was not to be considered on political grounds—in other words, that it would be unbecoming and unworthy—nay, that it would be mean to deprive the Universities of their representation because a majority of the Representatives had views not in accordance with those which were held by the Party now in power. Everyone admitted that, and there could be no question about it. The hon. and learned Member himself, who presented the Amendment to the House, readily admitted that line, and had based the discussion on the higher platform he Mr. Gibson had indicated. But it was not easy to see what was exactly the platform of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) in his concise speech. Was it educational? Did the hon. Member agree with the hon. and learned Member who introduced the Amendment to the House—that there should be a Professorial representation? Did he take the ground that politics and religion were to be considered? If he did not take the last ground, he (Mr. Gibson) was at a loss to understand the meaning of the whole speech. The hon. Member would hardly like to put it in plain and naked English, and say that he asked for Dublin University to be deprived of its Representatives because those Representatives differed from him in politics, and because they did not hold the creed of the majority of those who followed him. Yet, if that was not his argument, it was difficult to find out the precise ground on which the hon. Member sought for the judgment of the Committee at the present moment. He knew very well the power of the hon. Member in Ireland; but he would venture to say that upon this question, and upon the way in which the hon. Member had presented it, he was not representing either the traditions or the feelings of the Irish people. The Irish people had an intense love for learning. They had an intense respect for institutions that had won fame by their great teaching and intellectual power; and the hon. Member for the City of Cork, speaking of Dublin University, and saying all he could against it, endeavoured to suggest to its disadvantage everything in his power in favour of the Universities of Oxford, and Cambridge, and Scotland. The hon. Member admitted—indeed, he could not deny it—that the University of Dublin had won great fame for its teaching, and for the eminent men it had sent forth. It was known and respected everywhere where education and learning were recognized. He (Mr. Gibson) ventured to think that the contrast the hon. Member had endeavoured to make to the prejudice of Dublin University by a side wind was neither accurate nor fair. He endeavoured to show that the constituency of Dublin University, which was over 4,000, was much less in proportion to those of the English and Scotch Universities. But in contrasting the constituencies of the Universities the hon. Member coupled those of England and Scotland together in order to give those of England, which had a smaller number, the benefit of the Scotch constituencies, which were very much larger. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] The Prime Minister indicated some dissent. The right hon. Gentleman knew Oxford as well as any man; and he (Mr. Gibson) would take that University, and contrast it with the University of Dublin. Surely that was not an unreasonable way of taking up the case of the hon. Member for the City of Cork? Dublin University was only behind the great University of Oxford by something like 1,200 electors; for his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Plunket) and himself represented a constituency of over 4,000—that was more than 2,000 each; while each Member for Oxford University only represented about 2,600. Take the University of London, which had a constituency of about 2,200, and returned one Member. Where was the wide discrepancy between the two cases?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: The constituency of the University of London is 2,390.

MR. GIBSON said, he had taken the numbers from a Return presented to the House. Surely the difference between 2,000 and 2,390 did not afford that violent contrast on which the strong judgment of the House was asked. The hon. Member for the City of Cork, it was quite true, did not press that matter very much; but the fact that he had mentioned it was an indication of the prejudice with which he had introduced the University of Dublin to the notice of the House. The hon. Member went further, and endeavoured to make it out that Dublin University was possessed of extreme wealth as compared with the great Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; but the hon. Member was altogether wrong. He forgot what was the actual figure at which the hon. Member placed the income of the University of Dublin.

MR. PARNELL: £85,000 per annum is what I stated.

MR. GIBSON said, he did not know whether the hon. Member would be surprised to hear that he was wholly wrong in that matter.

MR. PARNELL: No.

MR. GIBSON: Then the hon. Member was not surprised. As a matter of fact, the income of the University of Dublin, from every source, independent of its fees, which it had honestly earned, and which were not taken into account in calculating the income of Oxford and Cambridge, amounted to £49,000 a-year, all told; and it had to support for that a University and a College, there being no separate income for the College. Everything else that Trinity College enjoyed was obtained from the fees of the students, men who went there to be taught by the Professors and teachers. The figure, therefore, was £49,000 per annum instead of £85,000. The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge were worth, as private property, independently of fees, much more than £360,000 a-year. This was a tremendous contrast, and a very different one from that suggested by the hon. Member. It was three times as high as the statement of the hon. Member. He should not have thought it necessary to mention these facts if the hon. Member had not referred to them. He admitted that they were altogether irrelevant to the discussion in reference to the propriety of keeping up the representation of the Universities; but as they had been mentioned with a view to prejudicing the University of Dublin he was bound to offer a reply. The hon. Member also spoke of what he described as wholesale confiscation, and implied that the whole of the income of the University was the result of confiscation. That was not the case; but a substantial part of the income of Dublin University—£10,000 a-year—arose from private endowments.

MR. PARNELL: I said the landed property amounted to £31,000 a-year.

MR. GIBSON said, he would beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon; he thought the hon. Member had made a wider statement. He should like to ask, looking at the question from its fair and logical standpoint, what were the grounds upon which the House was asked to say that Dublin University should be deprived of its representation? Had any ground been urged, except that its Members were not of the same politics as the hon. Member for the City of

Mr. Gibson

Cork, and his followers? Had any ground been urged except a personal and sectarian one? There was a fallacy running through the arguments of the hon. Members for the City of Cork, Mr. Parnell and Sligo (Mr. Sexton). They had over and over again used the expression:—"You are giving Dublin University representation." That was not the position at all, nor was it any part of the object of the Bill. Dublin University had had representation since the time of James I., and the question was whether it was now to be deprived of representation. They were asked, notwithstanding the tremendous anxiety of the position now before Ireland, to deprive the University of Dublin of those Members who were able to express views that were most useful to be presented in future debates. The hon. Member for the City of Cork said that the University of Dublin was a close institution, and that its doors were not open to the bulk of the people. Was ever such an argument used before by anyone acquainted with the history of that great seat of learning? Since before the Union Roman Catholics had been in the habit of going there without any attempt whatever being made to interfere with their faith. It was the proud boast of Dublin University that before any other University in the United Kingdom she freely opened her doors and allowed Roman Catholics to enter, and the institution could be used by Roman Catholics and Dissenters as much as by any member of the Church to which he himself belonged. Since the passing of what was honourably known as "Fawcett's Act" all who came there were welcomed, no matter what their creed or politics were. All were at liberty to win the Scholarships and present themselves for the Fellowship of the University. Every single prize was open. All were freely welcomed, and it would not be worthy of the name of University if the welcome were halting or grudging. Some of the highest and most valued prizes had been carried off by Roman Catholics, and some by Dissenters. Let them look at the history of the country since the foundation of the University of Dublin. The University had given a splendid education to some of the greatest men who had illustrated the history of Ireland. Burke was a scholar of the University; Goldsmith had a statue erected to his memory before the institution in which he was educated; the late Isaac Butt was a Professor of the University. On every occasion when great and distinguished men went there everything else was forgotten, except the desire to give them a worthy and honourable welcome. When the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, not a very long time ago, paid a visit to Dublin University, every Fellow, scholar, and student joined together with pride and gratification to give welcome to a man who they felt was as eminent in public life as he was distinguished in his University career. The real objection to continuing representation to the University of Dublin was that the Representatives of the University were not numbered among the supporters of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. Was that the ground upon which it was sought to disfranchise and leave unrepresented a large and influential class, whose interests were bound up in such an institution as Dublin University? The hon. Member for Sligo was more open and less wary than the hon. Member for the City of Cork; and he, more than once, in the earlier part of his speech, used arguments that were addressed pointedly to sectarian bigotry. As political ground had been introduced into this matter, he should like to say a word or two upon it, although he admitted that it was not a ground which should be allowed to enter into the consideration and discussion of the question. The Loyalist minority in Ireland, if they were in such a condition that they would be able to secure adequate representation, would be entitled to very nearly one-third of the representation of the country. Under the new conditions, and under the Bill now passing through Committee, the Loyalist minority was not likely to obtain one-fifth of the representation. In three Provinces of Ireland a stupendous change would have to be considered. Except in Dublin University, and possibly in Dublin City and County, the Loyalist minority would have no representation; and it was under those circumstances, and under that stupendous state of facts, that the hon. Member for the City of Cork thought it statesman-like, thought it reasonable, thought it something that would show that he understood the responsibility of the great

position and power which he now claimed to possess, to deprive these three Provinces of the chance of having their views represented by such utterances as were likely to be made by the Members for the University of Dublin. At all events, the Loyalists in Ireland would have in future an anxious and arduous time. Was it not reasonable, he asked, on the grounds of fair play, of sentiment, and of common justice, that a minority—if they liked, a hopeless minority—should have some voice, however feeble, if not in fighting their battle, at all events to state their case, and represent their grievances? The hon. Member for the City of Cork knew that as well as anyone in the House of Commons; and yet, knowing how needful it was in their own interests that those who would otherwise be constitutionally silenced should have some kind of outlet, at any rate, for presenting their Petitions to Parliament, and obtaining the public opinion of the Empire, he sought to prevent that, and yet asked the Committee to believe that he was desirous of having a fair representation of the public opinion of Ireland. He repeated again that the House of Commons had nothing to do with the consideration whether the Universities should have Representatives who supported one particular line of politics, and the question ought to be placed upon a more worthy basis. He would not stop to consider it from a personal standpoint; but he contended that whatever might be the wishes, or desires, or efforts of the hon. Member for the City of Cork and his Friends, it would be unworthy of Parliament if they did not leave the Loyalist minority some voice, however weak, by which they would be able to present their side of the question. He could not, of course, discuss personal matters. The hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Sexton), in the course of his able speech, made some personal observations as to the way in which the Dublin University was now represented. He must pass that matter by. Members for the University must be satisfied to leave their public actions to the public judgment of those before whom they appeared. But he must say this of the University of Dublin—that it had in a long and honourable career not forgotten its great duties, or the claims of education entrusted to its charge, and that it had ever since it had representation in Parliament endeavoured to show itself not unworthy of the high trust which had been reposed in it. Before the Union it returned men who, in the Parliament of Ireland, held no unworthy place. The hon. Member for the City of Cork recently in Ireland said that his idea of a Parliament was the Grattan Parliament. The Grattan Parliament had among its most distinguished Members the Representatives of the University of Dublin; and now they knew that the hon. Member's idea of a Parliament was the Grattan Parliament, shorn of one of the greatest ornaments of that period. Since the Union the Committee knew what the representation of the University had been. It was not for him to speak of it. Of course, he himself belonged to a Party. It was very hard, indeed, for any man in Ireland not to belong to a Party; but he claimed this for himself—that although he was true to his principles, and trusted that he should never be false to his Party, he had ever striven, and should ever strive, to take a fair, honourable, and reasonable view of the needs and requirements of his native country. There was something far above Party; and that was a conviction of what was best for one's country. In his humble way—sometimes, perhaps, mistakenly, sometimes even in a way to give offence, but never intentionally so—he had striven to act up to what he believed to be his conscientious duty. He had ever sought, and should ever strive, to find in the circumstances of Ireland occasion and opportunities for neutral platforms, upon which Irishmen might meet to consider the common needs of their common country. He wished there were more such opportunities afforded in Ireland. They had had enough of bitterness, enough of Party animosity, enough of sharp criticism of one another; and he trusted the time would never come when Irishmen would not strive to rise above what were the mere suggestions of Party and remember the needs of their country. He was aware that that Party to which he belonged were a minority in Ireland. In the future they might be in a great minority; but he thought he was entitled to ask anyone who fairly considered this question, who desired to consider what was fair and just to all parties in Ireland, to say this—that it would not be reasonable, that it would not be fair, that it would not be just—nay, that it would be in the highest degree unreasonable, to the highest degree unfair, and in the highest degree unjust, at this, of all times, to deprive the University of Dublin of its representation.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, there were men in that House who remembered the late Morgan John O'Connell, formerly M.P. for Kerry, who had taken the first gold medal in his year at Dublin University. He might run through a long list of men who, like the late Lord Justice Deasy, Mr. Dillon, the late Member for Tipperary, Mr. Cogan, lately a Member of that House, the present Chief Justice Morris, the hon. Member for Limerick, Mr. Synan, and others, all receiving the highest distinction at that University. He, in common with those men, recollected that, at a time when they had no educational refuge in Ireland, an opportunity of finding one was accorded to them within the hospitable walls of the University; and he cared not whether its original constitution was founded on confiscation or in rapine. In his time it afforded Irish Catholics an education not open to them elsewhere; and he knew that, in those times, the position of things in that University was such as he had stated. It was their own fault if they had not taken advantage of that education. The men he had alluded to had done honour to themselves and to the University; and it was because the position of that University was at present under discussion that he ventured to offer those few remarks to the Committee. He had heard the speech of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and that of his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), who took up the hon. Member for the City of Cork rather sharply, but not, he should say, more sharply than he deserved, were it not that he knew that the hon. Member for the City of Cork received his education in an English University, and therefore could not be supposed to know, except from hearsay, those circumstances to which he alluded in his speech. For his own part, he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) could say that for some 45 years past he had known that University personally; and within that period he had never known a man so far forgetful of what he owed to his family, not to say his God and his religion, as to sacrifice, for the miserable pittance of an Irish Scholarship, the faith that was in him. He had heard that persons had so far forgotten themselves as to behave in the manner alluded to by the hon. Member for the City of Cork. He could assure the Committee that he had communicated with as many Members of Dublin University as most hon. Gentlemen in that House; and he was informed that the occasions on which that had occurred could be counted on the fingers of one hand. Many of the observations of the hon. Member for the City of Cork he fully concurred with; but then, with all deference to him, he did not think that the question as to what ought to be the University education of the Irish people in the future was one which they had now to consider. Many of them held houses and land; houses and land were good things; but they were not everything. Although they might confer the franchise, there were other things which would be much required when the new Franchise Act came into operation—namely, knowledge and discretion. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite the Member for the University of Dublin, Mr. Gibbon, said he was a Party man and a politician. Well, he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) did not know any man who could lead a public life in Ireland and say he was not a politician. He had heard that a man's politics was his anxiety to serve his country, his policy his anxiety to serve himself. He left policy to other men to deal with, imputing to no one what certainly did not concern either the right hon. and learned Gentleman or himself. One word with regard to the Representatives of the University of Dublin. It had been said in the course of the discussion that the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen the Members for the University were uneasy about their seats. He believed that the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen, of whom he had had a long personal knowledge, possessed the main requisites of Members of Parliament—that was to say, high personal character and great intellectual capacity. He cared not to what constituency those right hon. and learned Gentlemen presented themselves; they would be accepted.

because those who listened to them would feel that they would abide by the profession of opinion which they made. It was to men of that kind that they looked to as the Representatives of the great interests of learning who would defend them at the next General Election. He regretted, in common with the hon. Member for the City of Cork, that there did not exist in Ireland now an University which the Catholic people of that country could conscientiously enter. The heads of their Church had struggled for it for a long time; and he would not join in any jealousy against hon. Gentlemen opposite for having received charge of that subject when others had failed to bring it to the front. In 1873 some settlement might have been made, perhaps, in reference to the University Question more in accordance with public and, might he add, with the ecclesiastical opinion of the present day than it had since been the case. He had been sent to Parliament directly pledged on that question; and, perhaps, he was so strictly pledged from the knowledge that he had received his education in Dublin University. That pledge had made him set aside his own private opinions upon the measure under consideration, and he had voted in accordance with the opinions of those who sent him against the Bill then proposed; but now many a year had elapsed, and he was there fearlessly to say in the House of Commons that it was a bad day for the Catholics of Ireland when they did not accept that Bill which he had, with others, assisted in throwing out in 1873, because since then the subject had been left the plaything of every Party and section that looked for political advancement at a time when there ought to have been a junction of men of all classes of religion in Ireland, irrespective of ideas of a political character, to join in carrying forward the great question. There were no Irish Gentlemen on his side of the House, he believed, who would be unprepared to give to the hon. Member for the City of Cork, when he brought forward his measure, all the assistance that it was competent for them to give. Even in the days before Mr. Fawcett's arrangement was carried, there was one thing which Dublin University did for the poorer class in Ireland; to the humblest even of the peasant class who could find means to go to Dublin and present themselves within the walls of the College, it gave sizarships, free lectures, free commons, and free residence; and as a patriotic man in that House he should be forgetful of his duty on behalf of his poorer fellow-countrymen did he not bear his testimony to the conduct of the University in that regard. No doubt they had had confiscation in Ireland; but had there been no confiscation in England? Who founded Christ Church at Oxford? Would any hon. Gentleman tell the Committee that the rents and endowments of that College had been administered in accordance with the wishes of its founder. The University was founded in the days of Queen Elizabeth, in the days when there was no toleration, in the days of Penal Laws, in the days of tyranny, practised in his country, and on the Irish race. But the times were changed in Ireland from the days when, as he had once heard, the hon. Member for the City of Cork say his ancestor crossed the Boyne with William; a time when the Irish people suffered and had not Representatives in that House. Had they not the right to say that, owing to whatever circumstances, things were changed in Ireland, and that Irish Representatives could stand in that House on an equality with all men, even those of other Universities, and speak upon the question at present under consideration? For his own part, he would never consider that the spirit of toleration had been altogether absent from the University of Dublin, for it had given them a Bishop in Berkeley, a poet in Goldsmith, and one of the most brilliant statesmen in the world in Edmund Burke.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the hon. Baronet who had just sat down (Sir Patrick O'Brien) had denied the statement of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), which had been reiterated by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), that Scholarships were only given at Trinity College to Catholics on their consenting to forego their faith. He Mr. T. P. O'Connor met that argument by saying—and the hon. Baronet might take the observation in what sense he pleased—that in Ireland, unfortunately, they were only too well acquainted with both political and religious apostates. His hon. Friend found fault with some of the figures of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. The unfortunate thing about the revenues of Trinity College was that no one had been able to make out what they really were, and that would be a most serious case, and a full and detailed account was published. He had been told with great attention to the facts by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, the Member for the University of Dublin.

Mr. Gibson said he had always observed that when the right hon. and learned Gentleman had a very bad case to speak in a very bad tone of voice, and the speech which he had delivered a short time ago was, he thought, a proof of the correctness of that observation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was so laid up for arguments that he said because Trinity College had given a friendly reception to the Prime Minister and its two Members. There never was an argument more proper. Then he said that there should be in the House of Commons some Representatives of Education. He, Mr. Gibson, ventured to say that the right hon. and learned opposite, Sir Lyon Playfair, who spoke for one of the Scotch Universities, was the sole Representative of Education in the House. They all admired the oratorical abilities of the two Members for Dublin University, but when one came to their claim to the position of Educational Representatives, why the right hon. and learned Gentleman themselves would, he was satisfied, be the first to dissent from any such claim being made in their behalf. He found that the most eminent Educationalists in that House were entirely divorced from the representation of Universities. The hon. and learned Gentleman who proposed this Amendment, Mr. Bryce himself was a University Professor, as was also the Successor of the late Mr. Lawson. Both were very eminent Representatives of Education, and yet neither of these Gentlemen would by any claim claim the representation of an English University. In fact the four hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who represented English Universities were less Representatives of Education than any Members of that House. Therefore, he said that this argument would not bear one moment's investigation. It had been said also that the right hon. and learned Gentlemen the Members for the University of Dublin represented the "Loyal minority" in Ireland, but he was surprised that no reply had been made to that argument from the Treasury Bench. He would advise some hon. Gentleman who had been speaking on behalf of the "Loyal minority" in Ireland to read the speech of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War. On a former occasion the noble Marquess, in reply to the very same argument when it was raised in connection with the Franchise Bill, said that the Representatives of the Loyal minority in Ireland must place reliance upon the Representatives of the same class in England and Scotland. Who doubted that if any attempt were made to interfere with the religious or political rights of the Loyal minority in Ireland, so-called, although he did not admit the term, would meet with the resistance of the large majority in that House, and that English and Scotch Members would assist in rejecting any such proposal? Therefore, he said that this argument was also absurd. Did the occupants of the Treasury Bench think that those two seats should be maintained for the purpose of the representation of the "Loyal minority" in Ireland? Because, if that was not the opinion of the Government, they would not have to answer the question as to what provision they had made for the representation of the Irish minority in England and Scotland, who numbered 2,000,000. To the 1,000,000 of the "Loyal minority" they had given seats varying, as estimated, from 17 to 27; and he would like to know how many seats had the Irish minority in England and Scotland received under the Redistribution of Seats Bill? For those 2,000,000, the majority of whom were Catholic, they had given one Catholic Representative. He could scarcely congratulate them on that, for this one Representative was of such a milk-and-water kind that he could hardly regard him as a Representative at all. He would like some answer from the Treasury Bench as to this argument. He thought it simply scandalous that this matter should be allowed to remain in its present position. The reason of that was that this Bill which was said to be a compromise was a sham compromise after all, in which all the concessions were given to the minority at the expense of the majority. Not only was that the case in respect of

Dublin University, but the Government had managed to give the so-called Loyal minority in Ireland a far greater amount of representation than they were entitled to. He said, with regard to the action of the Government in that respect, that it was only part of their generally mistaken policy in Ireland; and he believed that as long as they continued to concede to the "Loyal minority" in Ireland what they denied to the rest of the population, they would in that country always be in a minority themselves, instead of in a majority; as long as that course was pursued the majority would be disloyal, and the minority only "loyal." He impressed on the Government that they should bear this in mind, and he looked forward anxiously to the time when the question of the English constituencies should be raised, to see whether the right hon. Gentleman would be willing to treat the Irish minority in England and Scotland in the same lavish and generous way as he had treated the so-called Loyal minority in Ireland.

Mr. MACARTNEY said, the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had treated the Committee to a repetition of an assertion frequently made in that House, which might impose on English Members who were not conversant with the actual facts with regard to Ireland. The hon. Gentleman had stated that the Loyal minority in Ireland numbered about 1,000,000. If that were the case, the population of Ireland being about 5,000,000, the proportion of it represented by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on that side would be more than as four to one. Now, the proportion arithmetically was as five to one, as near as it could be—that was to say, the Protestant, which he considered to be the Loyal population, was two-sevenths of the whole population. If they took the number of Members which Ireland had originally, there would be 105 Members, two-sevenths of which number was 30; one-seventh was 15; and he was extremely sorry to say that the Bill before the Committee, instead of giving to the Irish Loyalists two-sevenths of the representation which they were entitled to, were only to have one-seventh. And yet hon. Members below the Gangway, who talked of liberality, and described the Bill as a sham compromise, which gave the advantage to the minority in Ireland at the expense of the majority, actually grudged that minority those 15 Members, which, when they came to another stage of the Bill, he (Mr. Macartney) should be in a position to prove was the extent of the representation they would have. He was not now in a position to prove it at that moment; but he should do so on the occasion referred to, and on the hustings at the next General Election. He asserted that the very closest possible calculation, made with the greatest anxiety to ascertain what would be the representation they would have for the defence of their lives and liberties, gave the number of Members as 15. That number included the two Members below him—two right hon. and learned Gentlemen who, with such credit to themselves and to the country, and with such honour to that House, represented the University of Dublin. He certainly did not think it too much that the considerable Protestant population of Dublin, and of the Provinces of Ulster, Munster, and Connaught, should be represented by 15 Members; but if the two seats for the Dublin University were to be taken away, they would be left with 13 Members only out of 103 for the whole of Ireland. The Government would hear a great deal more on this subject before the discussion was finished. It had been asserted by the hon. and learned Member yesterday on the opposite Benches (Mr. Bryce) that the representation of Universities was mischievous to the interest of the Universities themselves, because it produced bitter political feeling. He (Mr. Macartney) had not the honour of having been educated at the University of Dublin—he was educated at a German University that had no Parliamentary representation; and he did not believe that in any country in the world was stronger political feeling shown than in that University. It was the same with all foreign countries. At Bonn the students were divided into circles; each district had its own band of students, who wore a distinct badge and cap, and when these met they always fought. Therefore, he said that non-representation in the case of Universities did nothing whatever towards preventing strong political feelings amongst the students. It was the case all over the Continent, as he had stated, and he did not believe there was any country in the world in which political and religious feeling ran higher than in Ireland.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND said, that subject had been brought forward by some hon. Members that evening in the discussion which, in his opinion, ought not to have been introduced into it. The hon. Member for Galway Mr. Mitchell Henry had tried to make out that hon. Gentlemen on those Benches were opposing the representation of Dublin University, because of the bigoted motives they might have against the representation of Protestants at all. He said, in the course of his speech, that Questions were being asked every day in the House with reference to the religion of officials and other persons in Ireland, and that it was a fact that went to prove that the Irish Members were anxious to open up again questions of religious sentiment. The hon. Member must know very well that the object hon. Gentlemen on the Irish Benches had in alluding to the religion of persons in Ireland was not that they had any bigoted objection to Protestants holding positions at all, but that they were desirous that Catholics, who were in the great majority, should have a fair amount of representation and a fair amount of the positions of authority in that country. He did not think it was fair for the hon. Member for the County of Galway to impute to the Irish Members that they were actuated by bigotry because they had put Questions from time to time in this House about the religion of certain Irish officials. They did not object to Protestants having a fair amount of all that was good going on in Ireland, but they certainly did object to what was undoubtedly very frequently the case in many parts of Ireland, namely, that where the population was Catholic the majority of the positions of influence and authority were held by Protestants. Another point to which he wished to call the attention of the Committee was this. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University Mr. Gibson had said, in his very florid speech, in answer to the hon. Member for the City of Cork Mr. Parnell, that the figures which the hon. Member had given with reference to Dublin University were not at all correct. Well, he Mr. William Redmond had in his hand a statistical history of the University of Dublin, by Mr. Dennis Corfield Heron, B.A., of Trinity College, Dublin. In that book it was stated that the total income of the University was £50,000. Mr. Dennis Corfield Heron might very well be taken as an authority on this matter, and though no one would be disposed to dispute the fact that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University was also an authority on University matters, still he thought that Mr. Heron's statement that the income of the University was £50,000 might very well be placed against the contradictory statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. It was the greatest mistake for hon. Members to endeavour to make it appear that in opposing the representation of the Dublin University, the Irish Members were opposing the representation of the Protestants of Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin had spoken as if he thought that if the two seats were taken from Dublin University the Loyal minority in Ireland would be without any representation in the House at all. Of course, it was easy enough to believe that the Loyal minority in Ireland valued very highly representation by two such right hon. and learned Gentlemen as the present Members for the University of Dublin. Yet, it would be difficult to prove that if Parliament were ridded of the services of those two right hon. and learned Gentlemen, the Loyal minority would be altogether without representation. Outside the representation of Dublin University, the North of Ireland would send to this House a very ample number of hon. Gentlemen to represent the interests of the Protestants. Therefore, it was not because the majority of the electors of the University were Protestants that the Irish Members objected to the representation of the University. They objected to this representation upon many other grounds. They objected to it on the ground that had been stated by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), because the University was practically closed to the great majority of the Irish people. It was all very well for hon. Members like the hon. Member for the County of Galway Mr. Mitchell Henry to say that the University was open to Catholics; but he Mr. William Redmond) challenged a denial of this statement—namely, that the great majority of Irish parents who were in a position to send their children to a University would be found to object altogether to sending their children to Dublin University.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the hon. Member (Mr. William Redmond) had quite mis-stated what he had said. He had never said one word about the University of Dublin being open to Catholics. On the contrary, his argument was that Catholics were deprived of the best facilities for higher education, through not having a proper means of education of their own.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he was very sorry to have misinterpreted the words of the hon. Member; but he had understood him to say that there were obstacles in the way of Catholics obtaining prizes at Trinity College. The hon. Member for the County of Galway denied it; but, anyhow, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) certainly had made a very great point of that. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had declared that Dublin University was practically open to Catholics; but that was not the fact. Dublin University was practically shut to Catholics; and he would draw attention to the fact, that every one of the great and eminent Irishmen cited as having received education in the University of Dublin were, as a matter of fact, Protestant Irishmen. Goldsmith, for instance, was a Protestant Irishman, as also was Burke—two men who had been conspicuously mentioned in the course of this debate. No doubt, it was a fact that some eminent Catholics had received education at Trinity College; but the fact remained that the vast majority of the people of Ireland, being Catholics, did not receive from Dublin University that consideration and those advantages which they should receive, as the majority of the people of England received from the English Universities. Upon the ground that Dublin University was opposed to the natural aspirations of the majority of the people of Ireland, and that it was opposed to the religious aspirations of the majority, and upon the ground that it did not sympathize in any degree with the feelings of the people, and that it did not enjoy the confidence of the Catholic population or of the Catholic clergy, the Irish Members objected to the monstrous absurdity of allowing it to be represented in Parliament by two Members. The hon. Member for the County of Galway had, he believed, referred to a statement of his (Mr. William Redmond's) the other night in the House, when he had been endeavouring to make a few observations on this subject. The hon. Member attributed to him the assertion that neither learning nor wealth should have any weight whatever for a Parliamentary qualification. He (Mr. William Redmond) was sorry to see that this was reported in several of the London newspapers as his statement on that occasion. Such was not at all a correct representation of what he had intended to say. What he had desired to convey was, that he did not think that the fact of great wealth or vast learning should have any special advantages in the franchise at all. He was of opinion—and he believed that the great majority of the Irish people and their Representatives were also of opinion—that a man who was a peasant in Ireland had as good a right to vote for the Rulers of his country, and had as good an idea as to those who would best rule his country, and what would be best for his country, as any gentleman in Dublin University who might be steeped up to the teeth in a knowledge of the classics and University education. The Irish Members did not want to exclude wealth; they did not want to exclude learning; but what they said was—"Do not give these qualifications special advantages." He, of course, hoped that the day might very soon come when there would be a broad scheme introduced into the House to give to every male citizen, not only in Ireland but in this country, a right to vote; but until that time came he should say—"Do not give to a few thousand men within the walls of Dublin University, simply because they are very learned, the power of sending Representatives to speak in this House." If they were going to give persons representation because of their learning, why did they not give representation to the professional classes? Why should they not give doctors and lawyers, and men of the learned Professions, representation? They should give these gentlemen special representation if they gave such representation to the gentlemen who had a special knowledge of the classics. He objected altogether to the idea of University education. As he had been unable to complete his speech the other night, he would take this opportunity of entering a strong protest against the idea of having two Members to represent this utterly foreign institution in Dublin. There was no disposition on the part of the Irish Members to deny the fact that Dublin University had returned many Irishmen who had been a credit to their country. He gave the University that credit. The hon. Member for the City of Cork, Mr. Parnell, had pointed out that he believed in many respects Dublin University was the first University in the world. It was distinguished, and the Irish Members did not deny it; but what they also asserted was that it was foreign, and not in accordance with the ideas of the Irish people. If the Irish people could have a University given to them in accordance with their ideas, however much less famous than the present University it might be, it would meet with their approval. He could not close his remarks upon this subject without referring, very briefly, to the language in which the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury had interrupted him the other night when he was endeavouring to perform his legitimate duty towards the people he represented, in speaking upon this question. The right hon. Gentleman had practically asserted that he, Mr. William Redmond, was speaking too often in this House. In answer to that, he might say that the right hon. Gentleman himself spoke so very seldom that he could quite understand how easily he could become intoxicated with the exuberance of somebody else's verbosity. But he (Mr. William Redmond) must beg leave to assure the right hon. Gentleman that, much as he would like to curtail his utterances, still he was bound to remember that he was sent to the House not to please the right hon. Gentleman or anyone else, but to give expression to the views of the people he represented, and, certainly, to give expression to those views he should continue to do so long as he had the honour to sit in the House.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr.

Parnell) had been obliged to bring this question forward in a manner which was not very convenient to the Committee—that was to say, on the general question of University representation. He (Colonel Colthurst) could not support the view that the Dublin University, distinguished as it was and represented as it was by distinguished men, was a sufficient representation or a true representation of University life in Ireland. But there was another way in which this inequality might be redressed. There was another University in Ireland with regard to which he had been sorry to hear the hon. Member for the City of Cork—he thought upon very imperfect information—speak in very disparaging terms. The Royal University was not the solution of the educational difficulty asked for by the Catholic people in Ireland, or those who were their guides in such matters; but, nevertheless, it was accepted by the Catholic hierarchy of Ireland as, at any rate, an honest attempt to give equality; and it contained within itself—and he believed that was the opinion entertained by those who were responsible for this question in Ireland—if properly developed, the elements of a fair and equitable settlement. “No, no!” Well, at any rate, the question was an open one. Upon the Senate of that University were three Catholic Prelates—at least, there were three before the death of the late Cardinal McCabe, the two remaining Prelates upon it being the Bishops of Ardagh and Clonfert, with at least two other distinguished ecclesiastics. The vast majority of students were Catholics, and he, for one, as an Irish Catholic, was proud to testify that that University had given a good education to a large number of Catholics who were desirous of a University education, and who, when they had the means of partaking of it without violating their religious convictions, had shown that, coming as they did almost entirely from unendowed institutions, they could hold their own in the educational race with others who had greater facilities for culture. He did not accuse the hon. Member for the City of Cork with having intentionally disparaged this University. The hon. Member, he thought, must have forgotten the facts at the time, or must have been speaking upon imperfect information. He was sure the hon. Member did not want to do an injustice to the Royal University; but his observations, if they had been left unanswered, would have unjustly disparaged the University in this House. There were many reforms necessary in the University; and, above all, money was greatly required, the institution being imperfectly endowed. He should like, if there was any chance of making an alteration in the Bill—which he very much doubted—to see an attempt made, not to level down in this instance, but to level up. He should like to see Parliament either give two Members to the Royal University, or transfer one to it from the Dublin University. He supposed, however, that after all this was only an academic discussion, and that the matter would in the end rest where it now stood. He had not been intrusted with the care of this question by anyone; but he believed he spoke the sentiments of a large number of Catholics on the subject, when he said that the present Royal University in itself, when properly developed and when properly endowed, as it would be, he hoped, before long, would be a fair and impartial settlement of the University difficulty in Ireland.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, his hon. and gallant Friend who had just spoken (Colonel Colthurst), and who had said something in defence or in panegyric of the Royal University in Ireland, would, he thought, find it very hard to make out more than one substantial fact in favour of that University. The existence and working of the University had undoubtedly shown, as the hon. and gallant Member had said, a strong desire for education on the part of the immense majority of the Irish people. They had shown that in a most convincing manner; but they had also shown that, under that system, the Irish majority were not able to get it on fair terms. However, they were not at present discussing the claims or the merits of the Royal University of Ireland. The question that the Committee had to consider was not whether the University of Dublin in particular, but whether the Universities of the United Kingdom in general, were entitled to representation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had complained to-night of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), because, as he said, the hon. Member had narrowed and brought down the scope of the whole discussion. Well, he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself might be justly accused of having not only lowered and narrowed, but positively degraded, the character of this great controversy, because, as he had put it before the Committee, his one main argument for the representation of the University of Dublin was that thereby a voice was found for a certain small section of what were called the Irish Loyalists in this House. Now, he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) should hardly have believed that any right hon. and learned Gentleman representing a great and learned Body, would have thought, even for the sake of argument and controversy, of bringing the question of the representation of the University down to that narrow and miserable issue. It would seem, according to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that the one only claim to be made by the Dublin University was, that if they took from the University its representation they would leave certain Ulster Loyalists with no one to speak for them in the House. He (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) did not believe that this would be the consequence of depriving the University of its Representatives. He believed that the Ulster people, or those of them who were of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's way of thinking, would have in this House, under any circumstances, a representation quite in proportion to their numbers. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman remarked that no one had gone to-night into the general question, or had touched the main issue, whether the Universities ought or ought not to have representation. He (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) proposed, in a few words, to touch upon that question. He was ready to maintain that the Universities were not entitled to representation in the House of Commons. He was very much surprised to hear representation in this House talked of as a sort of reward—as a sort of Montyon Prize given to deserving Universities. He wished to ask what connection there was in the least between representation in this House and the discharge of great and important educational functions like those of the Universities of this country?

Colonel Colthurst

By requiring Universities to return Members to Parliament, they were putting upon them a task for which they were not fitted, for which they were not qualified, which interfered with the discharge of their other functions, which very often degraded them and brought them under the influence of wire pullers, factions, ward meetings, caucuses, and other institutions which, however useful and indispensable they might be in the matter of Parliamentary elections, had nothing to do with the calmer atmosphere of education and high culture. He thought that, instead of looking to the Parliamentary representation as a prize, the Universities might rather claim, as a reward for the educational services they performed, to be exempted from these disturbing political duties, which in no wise assisted their functions as teachers. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the County of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had talked to-night of the lack of respect for culture shown by the Committee in its reluctance to concede representation to all Universities in the House of Commons. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think that culture was only of one kind, and that that was the academic form of culture given in the Colleges. But, if the principle that culture was to have special representation in the House of Commons was admitted, he (Mr. Justin McCarthy) wished to know why should not the members of the Royal Academy be represented? Why should not also the members of the Royal Academy of Music have someone to speak for them in Parliament? Why should the British Museum be wholly unrepresented? Why should not, as the hon. Member for Wexford Mr. William Redmond had asked, the learned Professions have special representation? They were told that our system of representation was so monotonous that we needed something specially exceptional to vary it. But let them test that by an examination of the facts. What variety had the English Universities brought into the representation of that House? There was not at the present moment a single hon. Member sitting for an English University who had not been in the House for years before that University sought his services. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Haikes) who sat near him had resigned a very important constituency in order that he might represent the University of Cambridge. This right hon. Gentleman had not, therefore, imported any variety into the representation of the House; and if they went over all the Members who represented English Universities in this House, they would find that not one of them owed his seat to the University he now represented; not one of them had had his merits discovered by the University. He quite admitted that there were University Members in the House who were first brought into political life by being chosen to represent their Universities. There was, for example, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Universities of Edinburgh and Aberdeen (Sir Lyon Playfair). He had come into the House first, if he (Mr. Justin McCarthy) were not mistaken, to represent these two Universities. But would anyone, knowing the right hon. Gentleman's accomplishments and talents, say that he could possibly have long waited for an opportunity of entering upon a Parliamentary career, even if there had been no Parliamentary representation for the Universities of Edinburgh and Aberdeen? Then take the hon. Baronet who represented the University of London (Sir John Lubbock). Everyone knew that he was one of the best qualified men to speak on behalf of Universities and for University education; but, then, he was in the House for years and years before the University of London had a chance of finding out his merits. He (Mr. Justin McCarthy) admitted that in the case of both of the right hon. and learned Gentlemen who represented the University of Dublin, they had come into Parliamentary and public life for the first time on the introduction of that University; but he thought that no one who had seen as much of them as hon. Members had in the House, could have the slightest doubt that some constituency in their own country sharing their opinions would have found a place for them in Parliament. He must say that he, for one, should be very sorry if, owing to any changes, the House were to be deprived of the services of these right hon. and learned Gentlemen. He did not often agree with either of them; hardly ever did it happen that he could agree with either of them in any public expression of opinion; but he was quite free to say, and glad to say, that he thought the average of Parliament, intellectually and rhetorically, would be considerably lowered if they had not these right hon. and learned Gentlemen amongst them. At the same time, he must say that if the function of representing a University were to perform some mystic duties on behalf of science and culture, he did not think the qualifications of these right hon. and learned Gentlemen especially fitted them for the task. If there were in the House two born political partizans, it was these two; and he did not remember one occasion upon which the voice of either had been raised on a question of mere culture. He had no doubt that if Dublin University were disfranchised, these right hon. and learned Gentlemen would both find constituencies in Ireland ready and willing to return them. Then as regarded this special representation of the Dublin University, he maintained that it was an exceptional case. The man who was most jealous—if there were anyone jealous—of the claims and position of the English Universities, must admit that, at any rate, these institutions did represent most faithfully the best intellectual life of the English people. They sprang from the heart's core of the English people; their history was interwoven with the history of the country; they were as directly English and national as the genius of man could make such institutions. Of the Scotch Universities, also, he could bear hearty witness to the most admirable, useful, and truly national work which they performed. They represented, to the highest degree, the intellectual life of Scotland. They made their influence felt even more than the English Universities—down, in fact, to the humblest class of Scotchmen. If, then, there was an exceptional case to be made out, he maintained that the English and Scotch Universities were justly entitled to have their claim recognized. But look at the position of the Dublin University. As the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) told them, it had nothing to do with the national life of the country. It was an exotic altogether, doing most admirable work, no doubt, for those it brought up and taught. He had not a word to say against the work the Dublin University was doing, or against those who were connected with its teaching; but the great majority of the Irish people could not accept its teaching. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) to-night had complained of the Irish Catholics saying that they could not take advantage of the teaching of that University. But surely no one could know better than the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the religious principles of the majority of the Irish people prevented them from accepting the teaching of the Dublin University. How, then, could the University be called a national institution, when in its essential principles it was opposed to the views of the majority of the people? Look at the position taken by some of the great Universities of Germany. Look at the way in which they kept alive, even in the most difficult and trying times, the courage and the national feeling of the people. Look at the work done by the Universities of Spain, and, more lately, Greece—of Athens especially. These were all national institutions. Sharing, as they did, in every movement of the life of the nation, they might be said to be entitled to special representation if their countries had special representation to bestow upon them. But he denied that a seat in this House was an honour which any University did well to claim, or from which it derived any benefit. Whether the question were taken on that ground alone, or on the ground of the special circumstances of the Irish University, he should say that Trinity College had no claim. It was an institution having no national title to the admiration of the people, more than the admiration they might give to culture of every kind; and he was of opinion that the House of Commons was not at liberty to go out of its way to endow it any longer with special Parliamentary privilege.

SIR EARLEY WILMOT said, he should like, before this discussion closed, to say a few words upon the subject now before the Committee. He confessed that he was pleased the other night at hearing the very able speech of the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Albert Grey), who had put forward as his plea for opposing the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr.

Mr. Justin M. Carthy

Bryce, that the representation of our Universities was, as it were, the redeeming point in the dead level of representation which they were now called upon to adopt. He must say, looking at the part which the hon. Member's illustrious ancestor—the great Reformer, Lord Grey—took in connection with the Reform Bill of 1832—he must say, without compliment to the hon. Gentleman, that he worthily represented the great name he bore. Now, with regard to the matter before the Committee, he could not help feeling, looking through the whole of their representative history, that the present proposal was a departure entirely from that which had always adorned and distinguished our representative system. He need not go back so far as that early history of our country, when we found, by the Parliamentary Records of Prynne, that as early as the time of King Edward I. writs were directed to Oxford and Cambridge to send men discreet and learned in the law to represent the Republic of Letters in this House of Commons. But, later than that, they found that in the time of King James I. not only did the King by Charter call on the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge to send their Members, but then, for the first time, he called upon the Parliament of Ireland to choose two worthy Members of Trinity College in that city to represent them. Therefore, from the earliest periods of our history we found that University representation had been a remarkable incident in our representative system. But, coming lower down, what did we find at the time of the Union of Great Britain with Ireland? What was done at that time? Why, as was well known, 100 Members were chosen from the Irish Parliament to represent them in the British House of Commons. At that time the learned Members for the University of Dublin, which had been two in the Irish Parliament, were reduced to one, and accordingly, at the time of the Union, only one was returned for the University of Dublin? Well, what took place afterwards? Why, Lord Grey and Lord John Russell in 1832, in that memorable Reform Bill which he regretted very much had not been made the model of the present Redistribution Bill, gave back the second seat to the University of Dublin, out of the five additional Members to Ireland provided by the Bill, four of them being given to Irish boroughs, as hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway were well aware. Therefore, they found that in a memorable era not only was the University representation system advocated and defended by the efforts and the zeal of these great Reformers, but they actually gave an additional Member to the University of Dublin. He now came to the year 1854. In that year Lord John Russell, when Prime Minister, proposed to add to University representation. He proposed to give one Member to the University of Dublin, but failed in his attempt. The Bill was thrown out, and Lord John Russell went out with it. That brought them down to 1867, and what took place then? Why, Mr Disraeli not only gave representation to the City of London, but actually added two more University Representatives to the list by giving a joint representation to the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews, and to the Universities of Aberdeen and Glasgow. Therefore, they found that not only for a long period in our representative history were Representatives for Universities not diminished, and no attempts made to take away the representation of Literature and the Republic of Letters altogether, but in every Reform Bill which had been introduced since 1832 they found that additions had been made to University representation. Therefore, he must say that he was exceedingly surprised—perhaps not so much when he saw the character of this Redistribution Bill—but he certainly was surprised to find that on the Treasury Bench, a distinguished right hon. Gentleman had said that, though he was committed, as it were, to this Redistribution Bill, yet in his own humble opinion he believed the University representation scheme to be anomalous, and did not feel very warm in supporting it. Not only that, but what was even more surprising was that the distinguished right hon. Gentleman who sat at the head of the Treasury Bench, that right hon. Gentleman who was such an ornament to his own University, and whom he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) recollected in the University, having been a contemporary of his, had, in the course of his speech on this question, given it as his opinion that though he should not be favourable

now to the removal of the University representation from our Parliamentary system, yet that the time might come when the matter might be discussed with a view to its being no longer continued. He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) quite agreed with the hon. Member for South Northumberland that the redeeming feature of the Redistribution Bill was the continuance of University representation. It was, to his mind, an oasis in the dark and dreary and barren wilderness of this Redistribution Bill. Hon. Members might not have heard what he said last week; but he had spoken out pretty plainly, and he was quite ready to do so again. He did not think anyone could arrive at a conclusion upon the question without having gone into all matters connected with it. He had gone into all these matters, and he did think that if they were to have a representative system in which gentlemen, as had been already pointed out, who felt unwilling to undergo the fatigue, trouble, and anxiety of a personal canvass, could find in these academic groves the opportunity of being returned to this House, they would do well to keep sacred the University representation. There was the additional advantage that voters residing at a distance from their University could exercise the franchise by means of voting papers, which were rendered legal by Mr. Disraeli in 1867 or 1868. He believed also that hon. Members could be returned in their absence. He would put it to right hon. Gentlemen who represented the Universities whether it was not possible for them to be returned not only without personal labour, but even without the necessity of their being present to receive the honour bestowed upon them, and without expense or canvass? There was an admirable Debating Society at Oxford, in which gentleman received some training in the art of debate; and, no doubt, many of these gentlemen, while seeking oratorical distinction in that Society, looked forward to the distinguished honour which they might some time or other enjoy of a seat in this House. Amongst the members of this Society had been the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government himself; and it was unnecessary to call to the recollection of hon. Members such distinguished names as those of Sydney Herbert,

Sir Eardley Wilmot

Lord Lincoln, Mr. Twisleton, and Mr. Claughton, now Bishop of St. Albans. Gentlemen in this Society, whilst preparing themselves in the curriculum of politics, no doubt looked forward to at some future period attaining to what he might call the blue ribbon of our representative system—namely, the representation of a University. Therefore, he did protest as strongly as he could against the destruction of the University representation—against depriving the country of one of its brightest gems and greatest honours. It was said that the Republic of Letters now needed no support; but he could only say that our representative system required all the support that everyone could give it. He saw the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) in his place, and he would recall to his mind a passage taken from the very able work that he had written—namely, the life of his distinguished relative, Lord Macaulay, where that great statesman pointed out the advantage that literary men might possess who, removed from the stormy regions of politics, still could find themselves able not only to represent their fellows in connection with the University, but also to devote themselves to an elucidation and explanation of those great questions which were discussed in this great Assembly. Therefore, in these few words he was glad to have the opportunity of saying how strongly he protested against this proposed alteration. He had no idea and no expectation that such a proposal would be carried, but considered that the sense and good feeling and the sentiments of men whom he saw all around him would revolt against this attempt to rob our representative system of one of its most distinguished ornaments.

Mr. CROPPER said, that although, no doubt, many of them had regretted to see the debate adjourned the other evening, yet the adjournment had had a good effect, inasmuch as a great deal had been done by the speeches of the Irish Members to win opinion on the Ministerial side of the House against their views, and to make it evident to many hon. Gentlemen who had been doubtful on the subject, that this was not the time to remove from this Assembly two of its most distinguished ornaments. He had listened with some interest to the speeches of the Irish Members, and had thought there was something characteristic in the brutality of the expressed wish that now that hon. Members had the Universities down they should "cut their throats." He did not believe there were many, even on the Benches below the Gangway opposite, who would sanction that opinion; still, it had been expressed, and it led one to think that there was plenty of reason for the desire that light and learning and culture and education should have a little more place in this abode than they had at present. He had listened to the various remarks which had been made on the Ministerial side in the previous debate, and it appeared to him that the objections to the system of University representation resolved themselves into three—he was, of course, only speaking of those raised on the Ministerial side of the House, and not of those raised on the other side below the Gangway. These three objections were—in the first place, that it did not represent local population, but represented something other than the mere counting of heads towards which our coming system of representation tended; in the second place, it was urged that the system was an injury to the Universities themselves, as it imparted into them some of that animosity, jobbery, and unpleasant contrast of opinions and feelings which, no doubt, arose to an undue height where political organization and excitement developed; and, in the third place, the objection was raised that the hon. Gentlemen returned to Parliament by the Universities did not rightly represent them so far as learning and culture were concerned. With regard to the suffrage, it did not appear to him that, at a time when they were still retaining in this country any quantity of different suffrages, when a man could go into a county and buy a 40s. freehold, and when men all round spoke of having six or seven votes—and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade Mr. Chamberlain himself declared that he possessed so many—it certainly seemed rather an excess of purity to desire to purge away this representation that represented something besides property, and to take away that small amount of representation which was given to culture, and the degrees that represented it. Then, as to the injury that was done to the Universities, no doubt something of the kind occurred, but if anyone representing a borough would look into the circumstances of his constituency, he would not doubt that a good deal of injury was done there by political appointments, jobbery, and so forth. He would find that every public appointment, from that of a coroner down to that of letter-carrier, was too apt to be guided by political considerations. Then, if that was the case, could they afford to throw stones at the Universities, and charge against them that politics had too much to do with the appointment of men in the seats of learning? He had an opportunity during the past few days of discussing this question with men who seemed to represent the feeling of the Universities, and they did not admit that the jobbery and other iniquities about which so much had been said of late were really attendant upon the system of University representation. They altogether denied that Convocation made its appointments from political motives. He had not the honour of a seat upon that Body; therefore, he could only take this from hearsay. At the worst, if all that was alleged were true, from what he knew of boroughs he was inclined to believe that what took place in the Universities was no more than what took place in the different constituencies of the country. Then, lastly, as to the Members, it was said they did not fairly represent the Universities, and that they were not fair exponents of the system of education adopted in England. It would be difficult to say what every man especially represented, and yet, for himself, he believed that the three countries of England, Scotland, and Ireland were admirably represented in the House by the University Members. He thought they might say that the first scientist in the House was the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock); that the most eloquent man in the House—and in so saying he would not wish to bar other men of equal power—was the junior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibbon); and that the most persuasive man was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair). He spoke of these three right hon. and hon. Gentlemen because they were all absent. He might say that in these three men they had, at any rate, Representatives of the highest culture of three different kinds—Gentlemen who took the greatest interest in education and in the success of the Universities they represented. Well, it was, perhaps, too late to talk upon the main question before the Committee. He, for one, had no doubts whatever in his mind upon the question, and he desired to support the system as it at present existed. Both sides of the House were pledged to support it, and Whips had been sent out by the two Parties in order that the division might be won by a large majority. Yet it might be desirable that those who would vote for the measure should just say at once that, so far as they were concerned, it was their opinion that the representation of the Universities should still continue, and that, at any rate, they should see how they liked a completed development of that which was said to be a more perfect democratic system before they gave up altogether that which now existed, and which retained, amongst many other franchises, the franchise which was said to represent culture, and, whether it did so or not, at any rate represented a large number of educated men.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kendal (Mr. Cropper) had said the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) had six votes. He (Mr. R. N. Fowler) surpassed the right hon. Gentleman, because, when he first entered Parliament, he used to go into the Lobby with 16 Gentlemen for whom he had votes, and for whom he should have voted had they been opposed. He was glad to have the opportunity of saying a few words as a graduate of the University of London. He knew it would be said of that University that, though the late Member and the present Member were very distinguished men, and great ornaments to the House of Commons, neither of them were graduates of the University. It might be accepted as a reproach to the University that they had never yet found one of their own graduates to represent them in Parliament; but let him remind the Committee that there were graduates who were in every respect fit to represent the University.

Mr. Cropper

For instance, there was the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General (Sir Farrer Herschell). He was a graduate of the University of London; he was now a great ornament to the House; he held political opinions similar to those of the majority of the graduates; and no one, no matter to what Party he belonged, would deny that the hon. and learned Gentleman would very efficiently represent the constituency. There was another very eminent Member of the House who was also a graduate of the University of London—namely, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld). He, too, would do honour to his University, as, indeed, he would do honour to any constituency who reposed confidence in him. There were other graduates of the University to whom he could refer; but, certainly, he was justified in referring to the two Gentlemen he had mentioned, to show that the University of London had produced men who were fitted in all respects to represent the constituency in Parliament. It had been said by those who supported the Amendment now under consideration, that the University of London had exercised its privileges better than some of the other Universities. He would not go so far as that, because the Representatives of the other Universities were very distinguished men; they were all ornaments to the House, and they were all men who did honour to the constituencies that had returned them. But still he might single out the argument of hon. Gentlemen, as a proof that the University of London had done its duty in sending to the House of Commons men who eminently contributed to the collective wisdom of the nation. It was only by the Act of 1867 that the University of London was granted the privilege of being represented in the House of Commons. That Act added three University Members to the House—namely, one for the University of London and two for the Universities of Scotland. He asked the Committee if it was prepared to disturb so recent a redistribution of power? Were they prepared to upset the decision which was come to only 17 years ago to increase the representation of Universities? It seemed to him that the then Parliament was a very Liberal Parliament, perhaps not so Liberal as the present, but still it was one in which the Party opposite had a large majority. When so recent a Parliament increased the representation of Universities, it did seem to him that it would be a most unwise step for the present Parliament not only to go back on the decision come to, but to go a great deal further, and expel from the House those who were the Representatives of learning and culture. On these grounds, he strongly opposed the Amendment now before the Committee. He regretted that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets Mr. Bryce was not in his place. That hon. and learned Member, in the speech he made on the second reading of the Bill, gave a very interesting account of what was likely to be the constitution of the new Parliament. The speech made a great impression upon a Friend of his Mr. Fowler's, who sat on the opposite Benches, and that hon. Gentleman wrote some lines upon it. The lines were published anonymously, but he thought the Committee would have little difficulty in detecting the distinguished author; they were—

"The prospect before us can give little ease,
It is enough to make anyone drunk,
Only think of 500 partial M.P.'s,
And Bryce says they all will be drunk."

MR. P. J. POWER said, he understood that, in consequence of the compromise arrived at between the two Front Benches, Her Majesty's Government intended to support the present University system of representation. It would be curious and interesting to see by what line of reasoning Her Majesty's Government arrived at their conclusion. It appeared to him that the decision was at variance with the spirit which was supposed to animate the Government in proposing the Franchise Act, and more in accord with the spirit which animated those hon. Members below the opposite Gangway who were favourable to the proportional system of representation. If minorities were to be represented, there were many institutions, such, for instance, as Chambers of Commerce in large centres of population, which had a prior claim to Universities. One of the arguments used by those who approved the present system of University representation was that, if they deprived the Universities of their Members, they would deprive the House of some of its most intelligent

Members, and some of its greatest ornaments. He maintained, however, that if the Members for the Universities were all that they were said to be, and if they held the views of the majority of their fellow-countrymen, many constituencies would be glad to avail themselves of their services; but if, on the other hand, they did not hold views in accordance with the views of the vast majority of their countrymen, he failed to see why they should be in the House of Commons, as it was said that that was essentially a Representative Assembly. Then, again, he failed to see that it necessarily followed that a great classical scholar or a mathematician must be a good politician; in fact, it was usually found that those who were great book-worms, or who had devoted their lives to study of any particular kind, did not make successful politicians. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster Mr. Trevelyan, whom he saw in his place on the Treasury Bench, afforded a good illustration of what he said. Everyone acknowledged that the right hon. Gentleman was a literary man of the very first rank; but no one, not even the greatest admirers of the right hon. Gentleman, would maintain he had succeeded as an Administrator. He Mr. P. J. Power was not in a position to say whether the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who were returned to the House by the Universities of England and Scotland, were men who represented the views of a considerable number of their fellow-countrymen, neither was he in a position to say from experience that they were the great scholars they were imagined to be. But this he could say, with confidence, that the right hon. and learned Gentlemen Mr. Gibson and Mr. Plunket who represented the University of Dublin held views diametrically opposed to the views entertained by an overwhelming majority of the Irish people; and should Dublin University be disfranchised, he imagined those right hon. and learned Gentlemen would have some difficulty in obtaining seats elsewhere. The Members in the quarter of the House in which he sat were accused of importing into this question, and into many other questions, a spirit of sectarian animosity. He thought the charge was quite without foundation; indeed, he and his hon. Friends could assert, with truth, that the tendency in that direction was to be observed in the hon. Gentlemen who differed from them. Looking to their history in the past, it would be found that the spirit of Irish Nationality had been essentially wide and open, and essentially unsectarian. Whether that could be said of the spirit which animated the hon. Members who differed from them, he doubted very much. Judging the members of the Dublin University by their Representatives, it certainly could not be said they held views in accord with the views of the majority of the Irish people. The Records of the House would prove that measures for the coercion and oppression of the Irish people invariably received the support of the Members for the University of Dublin. It might be maintained that the right hon. and learned Gentlemen were merely doing their duty, and giving votes in accordance with the wishes and feelings of those who sent them to Parliament. He was fully prepared to believe that, and it was because he believed it that he was desirous of seeing University representation abolished. Furthermore, there was no doubt that the display of sectarian animosity which he and his hon. Friends regretted so much, had been prompted, and was now prompted, by the University of Dublin. He maintained that one of the objects of education, both intermediate and University, was to produce, or help to produce, useful citizens. In that duty, however, the University of Dublin had failed in a remarkable degree. The men the University had turned out might be very useful men to England; but they had invariably neglected their duties to their own country, and had identified themselves with the Party which the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had termed the "English Party." He (Mr. P. J. Power) went further than that, and said that they had thrown in their lot with what were generally known in Ireland as "the garriou."

MR. GREGORY said, he was prepared to leave the case as it concerned the English Universities to the able defence the Representatives of those Universities had made. What he wished was to address himself to the question of the University of Dublin, upon which the latter part of the debate had turned.

Mr. P. J. Power

He accepted the movement of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, to abolish the representation of Dublin University, as an indication of their admission that, under this Bill, the representation of Ireland was too large. In that view, he fully concurred, Ireland would be over-represented—a defect in the Bill which might be remedied when the opportunity presented itself. Take it upon what ground they liked, contribution to Revenue, or the number of the electorate, or take it on the principle of proportion of population, Ireland was over-represented in the Bill. He was happy to perceive among Irish Members an admission of this; but there would be a further opportunity of discussing that point. He regretted that the principle of proportion of population was the sole principle and foundation of the Bill; other considerations should have been entertained, contribution to Revenue, and the character of the electorate; but take it even upon the principle of population, Ireland was not entitled to so large a number as 103 Members. Now, hon. Members sought to reduce that number by abolishing the seats for Dublin University; but surely they were beginning at the wrong end—at the head instead of the tail—the reduction should be made among some of the small boroughs and in some of the Irish counties. In the proper manner, and at the proper time, he hoped such a reduction would be made. The attack on the University of Dublin had been to a considerable extent answered by the right hon. and learned Gentlemen (Mr. Gibson and Mr. Plunket) who represented that constituency; but he (Mr. Gregory) wished to advert to one or two points raised by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). The hon. Gentleman began his speech by alleging, though he did not lay much stress upon the allegation, that the University was supported upon the proceeds of the confiscation of Roman Catholic property. Well, if they allowed such bygone histories to be revived, he (Mr. Gregory) was afraid that many Colleges, certainly many schools, hospitals, and other institutions, might be abolished on the same grounds. Many an institution had risen on the confiscation of monastic property. However, the hon. Member did not lay much stress on the point, and he (Mr. Gregory) would not pursue it; but the hon. Member then went on to advert to the change in the constitution of the University of Dublin effected by the Act of 1873, and he said that Act had failed in its operation. But whose fault was it, if failure there had been? He Mr Gregory did not admit the Act had failed; but whose fault was it if it had. He remembered something of the Bill promoted by the late Postmaster General Mr Fawcett—a man whose loss the House deplored, whose memory they fondly cherished—and no more liberal measure was ever prepared than that that Bill, and no more liberal spirit in support of it was ever exhibited than that manifested by the Members of Dublin University. It was a Bill of the most comprehensive character, framed for the express purpose of bringing all classes of society, all religious denominations, within the scope of the University. If any portion of the Act had failed, it was due to the opposition of hon. Members who represented a certain section of the Irish people. The Bill itself was of a most liberal character, and every member of every religious denomination in Ireland had now the opportunity, if he chose, to avail himself of it, of taking advantage of the education afforded within the walls of Dublin University. If they did not avail themselves of the opportunity, if they did not claim their right to compete for the prizes—the Scholarships, the Fellowships offered—it was entirely their own fault. But he believed that, to a considerable extent, the people of Ireland did avail themselves of the advantage, and in an increasing degree the University was becoming more and more popular, and 1,000 graduates now elected two Members. As had been pointed out by the right hon. and learned Member Mr Gibson—and the point was lost sight of in speeches of hon. Members below the Gangway—this was no question of granting the franchise, but of disfranchisement; the question was whether the House should take away a representation that already existed, and not a question of a body of electors seeking to establish a claim to representation. Here were 4,000 of the most enlightened men in the country, composed of all classes, all religions, and there was no ground shown for their disfranchisement. The hon. Member for the City of Cork referred to the Episcopalian character of the Governing Body of the University; but the Governing Body was open to Roman Catholic members, and, indeed, they formed some portion of the Governing Body, and he hoped they would be increased, for those Roman Catholic members had the interests of the University as much at heart and were as anxious to elevate the character of the institution as any of their colleagues. Members had brought the Act of Union into this discussion; but they should remember that contributions to the Exchequer, as well as proportion of population, was a principle of that Act. Would they like these principles together? What would then be the result? If they fell back upon the Act of Union, they must take that Act with all its consequences and in all its aspects. Even on the basis of population, they had no case. They were not well advised in bringing the Act of Union into their argument; they might think it hostile to the representation they wished to abolish; but if they followed out the argument to its logical sequence, he did not think it would be much in favour of the present representation of Ireland.

Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN said, it seemed to him that the arguments he had heard in the course of the debate in favour of disfranchising the Universities were perfectly conclusive. He heard with some surprise the argument that learning—nay, he believed the word used was intelligence—was entitled to a certain share of representation in Parliament. That was not paying a very high compliment to the great body of the Members of the House of Commons, for it appeared that only eight or nine Members of the Assembly were to be regarded as the representatives of intelligence. He should like to know what did all the other Members represent? Learning, forsooth, must be specially represented in the House. Well, if learning was to be specially represented, why not virtue and morality, why not honesty, why not piety? These were all very valuable qualities, and he did not see why they should not be specially represented, just as much as learning. He contended that there was no real ground for the claim of the Universities for representation in the House of Commons. The arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Bryce, who introduced the Amendment now under consideration, seemed to him (Mr. Sullivan) to be un-

answerable; and one of his arguments was especially so, and that was, that it was very undesirable to introduce into these seats of learning the contentions and bitterness of contested elections and political controversies. He had heard no reply to that argument; it was a very conclusive one, and ought to have weight with the House of Commons. Let those gentlemen, young and old, some of whom were teachers, some of whom were students, pursue their studies in the quietude of their Colleges and Universities, undisturbed by the heat and turmoil of political controversies. After all, was it learning that the Members for the Universities represented? Was it because of any special title to be considered learned men, that the two eloquent Members for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson and Mr. Plunket) were elected to sit in the House of Commons? No. The question of the learning of those right hon. and learned Gentlemen was never raised at the time of their election, and such a question never would be raised at any election for the University of Dublin. The right hon. and learned Gentlemen sat here as the Representatives, not of learning or of culture—though they were learned and cultured men—but as the representatives of the high-flavoured Toryism and Orangeism of Trinity College. Their functions in the House of Commons, their actions in the House, had no relation whatsoever to the interests of education or of culture, but they had all the connection in the world with the interests of the Tory Party and the Orange ascendancy in Ireland. If it be undesirable, as he believed it was, to give any special representation to Universities, he held it was particularly undesirable to give special representation to Trinity College, Dublin. In the first place, as had been already fully stated, the constituency was a small one, and one certainly over-represented with two Members. Now that we were about to revise the whole electoral machinery of the country, there was no reason why this state of things should continue. It had also been stated that the University of Dublin was an institution altogether out of harmony with the feelings of the Irish people. Nothing could be more true. Trinity College was founded as one of the parts of the machinery for the subjugation of the Irish nation. It was not founded to teach the Irish people; it was not founded to spread learning through the masses; it was founded as a branch of England's arrangements and institutions for the conquest of Ireland, and of the utter subjugation of the Irish race. Trinity College was simply an English fortress; it was as much a fortress of English power as any military fort within the four corners of the country. It was one wing of the Army and Navy of England, so far as they related to Irish affairs. Now, the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), who spoke that night, said that the doors of the University were open, and that the motto of the institution was, and had long been, "All are welcome." The words reminded him (Mr. Sullivan) of the line he very frequently saw at the bottom of the placards posted about Dublin, which emanated from the Irish proselytizing societies. Those societies declared that, to their lectures at which the Catholic faith was assailed, at which the Catholic doctrines were ridiculed, at which the whole basis of Catholic belief was warred against, "All are welcome." He only wondered that the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) did not add to this well-known phrase, another that was very frequently seen upon the proselytizing placards posted in Dublin—namely, "Catholics are affectionately invited." No doubt, the doors of Trinity College were open to the men who would betray their faith. Human nature was weak, and even the bonds of the Catholic faith were unable and insufficient, owing to human frailties, to keep every Catholic in the way he should go. Trinity College was a proselytizing and perverting institution, and some of the names of which Trinity College were most proud to-day, were the names of Irish Catholics who were perverted within the walls of that institution, the names of men who were induced, partly by the allurements of the place, and partly by the largess open to them, to betray their religious principles. It was pleaded for Trinity College that it would help to make up the lack of representation of the "Loyal minority" in Ireland. He wished to impress it upon the Government, upon the Members of the House of Commons, and upon the English people, that for whatever disloyalty existed in Ireland to-day, those people who called themselves the "Loyal minority" were largely responsible. The laws of England were bad enough, the laws of England were hard enough upon the Irish people, but those in Ireland who called themselves the friends and supporters of those laws, made them ten times more hateful than they otherwise would have been. In the name of loyalty, the Irish people were insulted; in the name of loyalty, they were buffeted and scourged; in the name of loyalty, they were oppressed; in the name of loyalty, Irish Catholics in the North of Ireland were threatened; in the name of loyalty, Orange Lodges perpetrated their atrocities. Was it to be wondered at, therefore, that the name of England was hateful to the Irish people? The plain fact of the case was, that until the people who called themselves the "Loyal minority" in Ireland were brought to their proper level, until their ascendancy and domination was broken, it was vain for English Ministers and Statesmen to hope they would have a loyal majority in that country. He granted there was very little chance of the Amendment being adopted. A bargain had been made between the two Front Benches, and he presumed it would be carried out—as the tree had fallen, so it would lie. But he and his hon. Friends had a fixed objection to the representation of the University of Dublin, for, while they were willing to see fair play all round, they did protest against and would resist, as far as was in their power, every remnant and relic of the ascendancy of a faction, and of anti-Irish opinion which remained in Ireland. The Government were helping to perpetuate the troublesome, disagreeable, and contentious state of things in Ireland by propping up remnants and relics of Orange ascendancy in that country. The representation of Trinity College was one of them, it was simply a Tory and Orange representation—learning had not an atom to do with it. What part had the two eloquent and able Gentlemen the present Representatives of the University of Dublin taken in the House in the interest of learning, or in the interest of liberty? None whatever. They were Party men, and as such they were elected. Learning, indeed! Find the most learned man in England, or Scotland, or Ireland, and send him to Trinity College at the time of a General Election, and he Mr. Sullivan had not the slightest hesitation in saying that if that man had a trace of liberality in his composition, he had no chance of election. His learning would count for nothing. But let him hoist the Orange lily, and it would count; let him abuse the Irish people, and it would count; let him denounce the chosen Representatives of the people, and it would count. The time had gone by for this humbug and pretence. The representation of Trinity College had nothing whatever to do with literature, Art, or Science, but it had everything to do with Orangeism and Toryism. Whether their wishes prevailed or not, he and his hon. Friends were bound to resist this sham representation, and put the true state of the case before the Government and the people of England.

Mr. KENNY said, it should be borne in mind that the Amendment before the Committee had been moved by a distinguished Member of a University in this country. The Amendment was one of which he Mr. Kenny approved in every respect; but in the few words he desired to address to the Committee, he did not propose to single out for special attack the University of Dublin because it happened to have two Parliamentary Representatives. It would be observed that the Representatives of the Government and of the Opposition, the parties to the compact which had enabled the present Bill to be discussed at the present time, had evaded the real merits of the question, and had devoted themselves to pointing out to their adherents and followers, that they must not take into consideration the merits of the question, but must be guided by the fact that the Bill was a compromise, and, as such, must be supported. As one, however, who did not happen to be attached to either English Party, he was free to act as he liked. He was disposed to criticize the compact which the rival Parties had arrived at, and, certainly, to attack as vigorously as he could that portion of it which retained the representation of the Universities. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board Sir Charles W. Dilke, was attacked very fiercely from the Conservative Benches because he chose to speak in one way, and declare his intention of voting the other. (He Mr. Kenny)

did not know that the President of the Local Government Board had laid himself open to any special charge on that head. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman had simply displayed a candour, which, unfortunately, was lacking in a great many politicians at the present time, for he had told the Committee that his duty compelled him to vote "No," while his feelings prompted him to vote "Aye." The Prime Minister ventured to give no opinion on the general question, but preferred to hold himself free for a future occasion when it might be brought before the House in a definite shape. The right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote), in speaking on the question, used the phrase, "Irrespective of the merits of the case," thereby showing distinctly that he was not disposed to take any particular view of the subject, so that he (Mr. Kenny) was at liberty to assume that the mind of the right hon. Gentleman was so far open on the question of University representation, and that that was the extent to which he and his Party were bound at the present time to the Bill before the Committee. It was a point worthy of observation that the only persons who had attacked the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) were those who were directly affected by it—namely, those who were Representatives of Universities themselves. Those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen had unanimously expressed their disapproval of the terms of that Amendment, and some of them had made able speeches in opposition to it. But the question of the representation of the Universities as it had been dealt with by the University Representatives, was certainly not entitled to anything like the favourable consideration of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews (Sir Lyon Playfair), in the course of a very able speech, had explained that the Universities did not enjoy representation in any other country in the world except the United Kingdom, and the right hon. Gentleman went on at considerable length to show that, notwithstanding the fact that they did not enjoy distinct representation, the education of those countries in which they are established, more especially

Germany and France, has made enormous progress during the past 150 years. The only conclusion which he (Mr. Kenny) had been able to draw from what the right hon. Gentleman had advanced on this point was that, as a matter of fact, the direct representation of Universities had not been of the slightest advantage either to themselves or the countries to which they belonged. That, he thought, was more specially observable when he contrasted the progress made by the Universities on the Continent with the much slower rate at which those of this country had progressed. Indeed, until within the last 10 years or so, when education became State supported in this Kingdom, the people of England might be said to have been the most ignorant people in Europe. With regard to the question of the representation of the University of Dublin, to which he desired especially to refer, hon. Members in that part of the House had been accused of having attacked that University, because the Representatives it had been in the habit of sending to that House happened to differ from them in political thought and feeling. For his own part, and on that of his hon. Friends, he entirely repudiated any such intention. He had no desire to attack the representation of the University of Dublin simply because those whom it had sent to Parliament held political opinions that were contrary to his own. The representation of the University of Dublin was open to attack on much stronger and more serious grounds. For example, if they were to regard the matter as a question of proportional representation, the University of Dublin was greatly over-represented; and if they looked at it from a historical point of view, they must bear in mind that, under the Act of Union, the University of Dublin was only accorded the privilege of returning one Member, and that it was not until the passing of the Reform Act of 1832 that a second Member was added to its representation. Therefore, he contended that the claims of the University of Dublin to the representation it possessed were decidedly weaker than those of either of the English or Scotch Universities. The number of electors in the University of Dublin was another point in favour of his contention. There were only 4,048 electors comprised in the constituency of that University which returned two

Mr. Kenny

Members, and there was no University in the Kingdom in which it was easier to become an elector than in the University of Dublin. It was certainly far easier to attain that status in the University of Dublin than in any of the English Universities. In the University of Dublin anyone who obtained the degree of Master of Arts was put on the electoral roll without payment of fees; but in Oxford and Cambridge he understood the electors who kept their names on the books had to pay the fees. If they contrasted the case of the University of Dublin, which returned two Members as the Representatives of 4,048 electors, with that of the Scotch University of Edinburgh and St. Andrew's, which had 6,325 electors, and only returned one Member, they would perceive that if a just proportion were observed as between the two, the University of Edinburgh and St. Andrew's would return three Representatives instead of one. In his opinion, while the House was endeavouring to remove the anomalies which existed in other portions of the electoral system, due regard ought to be paid to the anomalies that were to be found in the system of University representation. Glancing from this part of the subject to another, to which he thought some reference should be made, he would say that on the last occasion when this question was before the Committee he had listened with due attention to the eloquent tributes that were paid to the high ability and distinguished learning of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh and St. Andrew's. He had always listened with the greatest possible pleasure to the speeches made in that House by the right hon. Gentleman, but while the right hon. Gentleman was deservedly appreciated in that House it was unfortunately the case that the appreciation he met with in his own University was not quite so great. It so happened that, at the last General Election, on a poll of about 5,000 out of upwards of 6,000 electors, the right hon. Gentleman was only returned by a majority of 74. Such a result did not speak very well for the intelligent appreciation of those gentlemen who formed the constituency of the Edinburgh and St. Andrew's University, and who ought to be proud of one of the most distinguished, not only of the Scotch Representatives, but of their fellow-countrymen. Another point that had been raised with regard to the question of the representation of the University of Dublin was that throughout the whole period during which it had had the privilege of returning Members to that House it had been represented by men of one distinctive shade of political opinion. For the last 85 years the University of Dublin had returned only men holding the most extreme Tory views, with but one exception; and it was only fair and just that that exception should be referred to in the course of the present debate. He alluded to the case of the most distinguished of all the Representatives of the University of Dublin—the late Lord Plunket. All Irishmen, no matter what their political opinions, from the most extreme Orangeman to the most pronounced Nationalist, joined with the most complete accord in their appreciation and admiration of the extraordinary ability, the marvellous eloquence, the wonderful attainments, and the vast resources of that brilliant statesman. Although Lord Plunket was returned as the Representative of the University of Dublin for a great many years, he had sufficient independence of mind and liberality of heart to mark him as the most able and gifted of the advocates of Catholic Emancipation. But while he (Mr. Kenny) was disposed to look on Lord Plunket as a pride and credit to his country, he could not but bear in mind that almost every one of that great man's successors who had sat as Representatives of the University of Dublin had displayed an exactly opposite character. One of these Gentlemen—the late John Wilson Croker—was an individual whom he (Mr. Kenny) would not describe in his own words, but would prefer to characterize in the language used by the author of The Life of Lord Macaulay, in a passage wherein the right hon. Gentleman Mr. Trevelyan did ample justice to the subject of his remarks. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“ He attributed to the Right Hon. John Wilson Croker, Secretary to the Admiralty during the 30 years preceding 1830, qualities which excited his disapprobation beyond control, and possibly beyond measure. In a singularly powerful letter, written as late as 1863, he recites in detail certain unenviable portions of that Gentleman's private life, which are not only part of the stock-in-trade of every bow-window in St. James's Street, but which had been brought into the light of day in the course either of Parliamentary or judicial investigations. After illustrating these transactions with evidence which proved that he did not take up an antipathy on hearsay, Macaulay comments on them in such terms as clearly indicate that his animosity to Croker arose from incompatibility of moral sentiment, and not of political opinions. He then proceeds to remark on 'the scandals of Croker's literary life,' 'his ferocious insults to women, to Lady Morgan, Mrs. Austin, and others,' his twitting Harriet Martineau with deafness, his twitting Madame D'Arblay with concealing her age. 'I might add,' he says, 'one hundred other charges. These, observe, are things done by a Privy Councillor, by a man who has a pension from the country of £10,000 a-year, by a man who affects to be a champion of order and religion. Macaulay's judgment has been confirmed by the public voice, which, rightly or wrongly, identifies Croker with the character of Rigby in Mr. Disraeli's Coningsby.'

This estimate offered by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) of John Wilson Croker's character—an estimate from the pen of one who could not be supposed to be biased—would seem to show that the present electors of Trinity College and University had no reason to be proud of one, at least, of their past Representatives. With regard to the action taken by the Representatives of the Dublin University in reference to the spread of education, it was not too much to say that on every occasion on which the question of Irish education had been raised, prior to the last Administration, the Members for that University had appeared as the most violent opponents of the educational movement. On the proposed grant to Maynooth College, in the year 1845, one of the Leaders of the opposition to that proposal, which was fair and just, and was eventually sanctioned by that House, was the then Representative of Trinity College, a man of no great eminence until he succeeded in becoming a Judge. The same remark might be made in regard to every one of the Representatives of Dublin University down to the present time, with the exception of the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen who were now returned by that constituency. It had been frequently stated that the University Representatives were returned for the purpose of guarding the Republic of Letters; but, from all the evidence yet afforded on the subject, the Republic of Letters existing within the walls of Trinity College consisted of a very narrow oligarchy. They knew that the electors of Dublin University had obstinately refused to receive, with anything like favour, some of their most distinguished Members, because they happened to entertain enlightened and liberal views. Why was it that men like Professor Mahaffy and Professor M'Kay were not listened to in Trinity College? How was it that Professor Webb, a distinguished Professor of Law in Trinity College, only received about 20 votes when proposed as a candidate for Dublin University? How did it happen, in connection with Trinity College, that it was only aspiring lawyers—men who had passed from the College to the Treasury Bench as Attorney General or Solicitor General—were received as the Representatives of the electors of Dublin University? The University of Dublin in no way represented Irish education, and it had always been narrow and exclusive. It had been stated that Catholics were admitted to the University. Of course they were; but until recently their admission was subject to an oath. That oath had, however, been abolished, and Catholics might now be received; but still, with all this, the University remained the University of the minority of the Irish people. Virtually the Catholics of Ireland had nothing in the shape of a University, and the higher education of that country was unsatisfactory. With regard to the Royal University, that institution had no share in the University representation of Ireland. It had been incorporated with the Queen's University, which had, he believed, over 2,000 graduates, who, he assumed, were entitled to at least one Representative in Parliament on the same principle as had been recognized in the case of the London University, which had something like 2,100 electors. Nevertheless, it was neither proposed to give a separate representation to Queen's University, nor to amalgamate it with Trinity College. Furthermore, if one Member were taken from Trinity College, the proportion of representation would be made the same as in the cases of the Universities of London and of Edinburgh and St. Andrew's. Therefore, when he suggested that a step should be taken in the direction he had just indicated, he proposed nothing that was more extreme, or could work any greater electoral injustice, than was perpetrated in the cases of the London and Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities. He had observed in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University Mr. Beresford Hope, who had expressed his views in favour of the retention of University representation, that one of the reasons advanced by that right hon. Gentleman was that "the Universities were concentrated centres of learning and teaching, and, as some had said, of high thinking and low living." He was surprised to hear from such an authority that the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge were places of low living, although he should have supposed they were places of plain living. When, therefore, he was told that those Universities were places of low living, he begged to protest against any such doctrine. Again, it should be said that while the Universities had been represented in that House, and it was claimed on behalf of their Members that they were the Representatives of learning, it was a singular fact that it had never yet fallen to the lot of a University Member to hold the Office of Minister of Education in this country; while the administration of education had invariably, since 1873, fallen into the hands of those who had never been connected with the Universities. Furthermore, it was to be noted that the most distinguished University men had, as a rule, not been chosen as the Representatives of their Universities, but had generally been obliged to go to other constituencies in order to obtain seats in that House. Quite recently, in the case of the University of Cambridge, one of the most distinguished men in that University had been rejected by an overwhelming majority, and a Gentleman who was a perfect stranger had been elected. He (Mr. Kenny) regarded that as a disgrace to University representation, and as a distinct argument against the retention of the system. Similar things had occurred in many other cases, which, however, it was not necessary to recite. He might, perhaps, refer to the case in which the University of Oxford had refused to re-elect the right hon. Gentleman who was now at the head of the Government—a circumstance that had been remarked upon more than once in the course of that debate. It was an evidence of what he must regard as the evil effect the system of University representation had upon Representatives that when the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister went elsewhere as Leader of the new crusade of Liberalism it was remarked that he was then "unmuzzled," which meant that he was released from the strictness of the University tests, and at liberty to become the Representative of Democracy. A distinguished Member of the Dublin University—the late Sir Jonas Barrington—once put forward as a serious argument that the people of Ireland ought not to be allowed to learn to read and write lest they might follow the programme given in a book of Moore's called Captain Rock; nevertheless, they succeeded in mastering the doctrines contained in Moore's famous work; but he (Mr. Kenny) felt confident that, even at the present time, there could be found in the University of Dublin men who argue in the same manner as Sir Jonas Barrington argued 70 years ago—men who talked about the pernicious doctrines of United Ireland becoming incorporated in the national teaching. He held that the more they examined the system of University representation, the more was it seen to be a system which ought not to be continued. The hon. Gentleman who last sought the representation of Cambridge University would probably have remained for a long time outside that House had it not been for the fact that a Liberal constituency in London chose to elect him. The hon. Member's Predecessor in that borough—the late Professor Fawcett—was a man who never represented a University, although he was a man of most distinguished University attainments; and innumerable instances might be cited in which Universities had rejected their most distinguished men and selected Gentlemen of a totally different stamp, merely because their political views were such as harmonized with those of the majority of the electors. He contended that the system of University representation had an evil effect on the inner life of the Universities themselves, because it was an unquestionable fact that politics were introduced where questions of learning alone should prevail; and it was well known that the selections made for the most important Chairs in the various Universities were dictated, not by a regard for the actual fitness of the candidates, but rather by the harmony existing in point of political feeling between them and the Members for the Universities. On these grounds, therefore, he should give his support to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce); and, in conclusion, he would only add that, in his opinion, the system of University representation was an anachronism in itself, and, as it seemed to him, a fraud on the people.

MR. O'BRIEN said, it was an unparalleled circumstance that a discussion of so much importance as that which had that evening been initiated by his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) should have been allowed to proceed so far without a single voice from the Treasury Bench being raised. He regarded it as in the nature of a misfortune that the case of Trinity College should have been combined with the general question of University education. The discussion had proceeded under the depressing knowledge that the Government had bound themselves hand and foot to the wrong thing in reference to University education, the Irish Members believing that the case of Trinity College rested on a much different and a stronger foundation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the senior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) had expressed himself as being at a loss to know on what grounds the Irish Members specially attacked the representation of Trinity College. Their reply was, that if, as he believed was conceded by the Government, the case against University representation in general was a good one, it was infinitely stronger and better against a single University in Ireland which monopolized the whole of the University representation of the country, to the exclusion of another and—although he had no great admiration for the Royal University, he would say—a wider and more representative University. Was it not complained that the Members for the English Universities did not adequately express or represent the opinions of those Universities? What the Irish Members complained of was, that the two University Members sent from Ireland did not even represent a narrow portion of the University life of that country; but, on the contrary, they were merely the Representatives of an institution that was a standing offence to the great body of those persons who were entitled to and who sought University education there. That House had placed on the Statute Book, when it passed the Royal University Act, a confession of the unsatisfactory representative character of Trinity College. The present Prime Minister had gone out of Office in the year 1874 in an effort to find a substitute for it. The Royal University Act need never have been passed if Trinity College had been a really National University; and in dealing with the matter that House, as usual, only went half-way. It confessed that Trinity College was a failure; it confessed that the great majority of the University students would have to be provided for outside Trinity College; and still it preserved that institution, with all its huge revenues, amounting, according to his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork, to £85,000 of Irish money a-year, preserving also its monopoly of University representation in Ireland; and now, of course, the easy defence of that monopoly was, that not only did Trinity College possess the lion's share of the money, but it also returned Representatives, as the House was so often informed, of the intelligence and culture of the country. The Irish Members had heard a good deal that evening—and he thought they had heard a little too much—of the culture and intelligence which was supposed to reside exclusively among their opponents in Ireland. They denied that Trinity College, to any extent, possessed a monopoly of the intelligence or culture of Ireland. They heard and knew enough of the very liberal estimate their opponents in Ireland formed of their own intelligence; but this matter was susceptible of rather better proof than their own confident assurances on the subject, and he was confident that the Irish people—however it might be with the House—were not very much impressed or overawed with the manifestations of superior intelligence which, from time to time, reached them from the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), or from the galaxy of Gentlemen above the Gangway who represented the landlord section in Ireland. He did not speak of the Irish University Members, as to whose abilities he certainly did not wish to subtract one word from the eulogium of the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin McCarthy); but he spoke of hon. Gentlemen who generally sat behind them, and who, he believed, reflected much more faithfully the Tory political and general idiosyncracies of Ireland. These Gentlemen were not over-wise in taunting the Irish people with their barrenness of that culture of which they themselves were the finished product. It set the Irish people thinking of the causes of their position, and recalled to their minds a state of facts that, he fancied, English statesmanship had much more cause to blush for than had his countrymen, and that Orange statesmanship had much more cause to blush for—if they could conceive such a thing as Orange statesmanship or as Orangemen blushing at anything. What were the facts? Why, during the past five years, under the intermediate education system and under the Royal University Act, the conditions of competition in intelligence in Ireland had been to some extent equalized, and he did not think it was the people they—the Irish Members below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House—who had come off worst. Of course, Trinity College was saved from any vulgar test of that kind. Trinity College had plenty of money, nobody to compete with, and nobody to account to. It entered into no sort of competition by which it could be judged. They knew this—that the President of the Queen's College in Cork always claimed in his Reports that his standard of education was higher than the standard of Trinity College; and it was perfectly notorious that the pupils in Trinity College who were educated up to its highest standard were simply nowhere in contests with students of the Royal University, who were sent up from the Endowed Colleges in Ireland. The talk they constantly heard and the airs of intellectual superiority they constantly saw assumed on the part of Trinity College might impose on the Committee; but in Ireland these things simply excited the amusement of practical educationalists. Who were these paragons, these graduate electors of Trinity College, who were preserved as though they were the oxygen of the Irish political atmosphere? Why, the sons of land agents and small gentry in Ireland—a class whom one of the most distinguished Professors in Trinity College had described as the most ignorant, the most unlettered, and worthless gentry in Europe. Then there were the gentlemen of the Protestant Divinity School in Trinity College, nearly every smart young fellow from which body came over here to England the moment he could get any situation in the Church of England, and never had anything more to do with the Irish Church than, perhaps, the recording of a vote for the right hon. and learned Gentlemen the Members for Dublin University. Then there were the doctors and the lawyers. He utterly repudiated the claim either of Trinity College or its Members to represent the intelligence of Ireland even in these professional bodies. He maintained that they only represented a faction, and a yearly-decreasing faction, even within that large Party. The great bulk of the Irish doctors belonged not to Trinity College, but to the Catholic University School of Medicine, and were Nationalists heart and soul. As to the lawyers, it was another of the extraordinarily monstrous monopolies that Trinity College had managed to get hold of, that it had the right to compel every law student in Ireland to pass through it. Under influences of that sort, and under the influence of the £100,000 a-year which the Government spent in the corruption of the people of Ireland, up to a short time ago Irish barristers were as anti-National as right hon. Gentlemen could wish. They took their politics with just as easy virtue as they took their fees—according to the amount that was marked on their briefs. But it was perfectly notorious that, even at the Irish Bar, there had been a very remarkable revulsion of feeling of late. Perhaps it was partly due to the attitude of the Government. They had been cutting down the Judgeships and other sources of corruption now that political lawyers in Ireland of the stamp of Judge Keogh were no longer worth their salt. He believed the revulsion of feeling at the Bar, however, to be largely due to higher motives—to the working up into higher social strata and to higher levels of the National and Democratic movement in Ireland. But whether that was so or not, though it might be a bold thing to say, he believed that if there were a select ballot taken at this moment in the Hall of the Four Courts in Dublin in favour of the two Dublin University Members, who were extremely popular in their Profession, and the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), he did not think those right hon. and learned Gentlemen would be as secure of their majority as they were to-night; and he was sure that, so far as the law students were concerned—the lawyers of the future—the right hon. and learned Gentlemen would do well to endeavour to provide themselves with a more tractable constituency. There was no more extraordinary delusion in the English mind than the notion that had been put into it that the National movement in Ireland thrived on ignorance, and that the seats the right hon. and learned Gentlemen the Members for the University of Dublin occupied were the last refuges and entrenchments of the distressed intelligence of the country. He maintained that exactly the reverse of that was the truth. If they took up a map of Ireland, showing the organization of the National League, he ventured to say that in the wretched illiterate communities along the Western seaboard, which, in England, were habitually supposed to be the headquarters of Irish disaffection, they would find very few branches, and they would find that popular demonstration was extremely feeble. In those counties where education was most widespread, and where the standard of intelligence amongst the people was the highest, it would be found that the National movement had reached its greatest intensity. Even in the North of Ireland, where, amongst the Orange farmers, it was so difficult to get them to read anything on the side of the Nationalists, or even on their own side, it was found that the higher the ratio of education in a district the stronger was the League, and the more confirmed was the antipathy to the present system of government. He could point to a hundred proofs of what he said. He knew himself that the greatest hot-bed of Nationality in Ireland at that moment were the very schools and Colleges in which the future University graduates were being trained. When the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork visited his constituency, one of the most ardent addresses of welcome he was always sure to receive was an address from the students in the Queen's College in Cork. The senior Member for the University of Dublin was, he believed, President of the Historical Society in Trinity College; and he ventured to think the right hon. and learned Gentleman would admit that he had received a great many indications, in addresses and otherwise, from members of that Society within the walls of his own College, that National and Democratic principles were beginning to infect even his own constituents. In the same way with the great body of intelligence outside the University in Ireland. The last time his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) was in Cork a deputation of Conservative gentlemen of wealth, standing, and intelligence—men like Sir George Colthurst and Sir John Arnot—waited upon him just as they would formerly have waited upon a Lord Lieutenant, and invited his assistance, and placed the practical regulation of the business of the county in his hands. Where were evidences of this kind that the Members for the University of Dublin could show for their own faction in Ireland? Where were the converts they were making? There were none. On the contrary, it was notorious that this element in the country was forsaking its politics, except, of course, the residuum of old-fashioned fanatics and the landlords, who lived on the oppression and the misfortunes of the poor. He must do the right hon. and learned Gentlemen themselves the justice to say that they did not even represent faithfully or fully the intolerance and illiberality of their own constituents. On the contrary, it was well known that they were very often reproached in the organs of the Orange faction in Ireland with not appearing as frequently in the van of Orange riots and counter-demonstrations as some of their more advanced Colleagues were in the habit of doing. They were taunted with aiming more at being English politicians than Irish Tory politicians. He did not at all find fault with them for making that their aim; and he should think that these right hon. and learned Gentlemen would be rather obliged to the House than otherwise if it allowed them to transfer their undoubted abilities to some snug and tranquil English Tory seats, and relieved them of the disagreeable necessity of living down to the practice of the prejudices and caprices of their Orange constituencies. The youth and intelligence of Ireland, he maintained, were on his side, and were not likely to be silent with regard to unreal and fancy representation of this kind. Parliament must either suppress the voice of Ireland altogether, or else be prepared to hear it spoken out very emphatically and uncompromisingly, even if they did not like it. Any real representation of the people of Ireland they would not like—that was very certain. It was no defence of a close borough like Trinity College to say that the Gentlemen who represented it in that House were men that the House liked, and that, possibly, the Representatives who would be elected by any real National University would be men whom the House would dislike. That would be a good argument against bestowing anything like equal franchises upon Ireland. He would not say whether or not the House was wise in bestowing equal franchises; but if they did bestow them they should do it frankly and ungrudgingly, and take the consequences, instead of continuing to live in a fool's paradise as to the opinion of the people of Ireland. They ought not to keep up this representation of the close borough of Trinity College merely for the purpose—for that was what it came to—of relieving the insignificant Tory Party in Ireland when it was submitted to the common test of the Ballot.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 79; Noes 260; Majority 181—Div. List, No. 47.

Mr ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he rose to move an Amendment in page 1, line 12, after "boroughs," insert—

"In England and Wales which had a less population than 20,000, according to the Census of 1881, and the Parliamentary boroughs in Scotland and Ireland which had a less population than 15,000, according to the Census of 1881, and which are"

He submitted the Amendment with special reference to the increase of the numbers of the House from 658 to 670. Hon Members were aware that, if the Bill were accepted in its present form, with no further measure of disfranchisement, the number of the House would be enlarged to 670 Members. The first part of the 1st Schedule now contained the names of all boroughs under 15,000 population which it was proposed should no longer have separate representation and in the scheme of the Boundary Commissioners it had been arranged that the boroughs should be merged in their respective counties. He proposed, by his Amendment, that there should be added to this Schedule the names of all boroughs in England and Wales which had a smaller population than 20,000 according to the Census of 1881. The chief object of the Amendment was to affirm that it was better to proceed by disfranchising boroughs of under 20,000 population rather than to make an addition to the numbers of the House. The increase proposed in Scotland was 12. On that day week he had complained of his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), because he stated, by anticipation, an objection on the part of Her Majesty's Government to this Amendment; but he was now disposed to thank the right hon. Baronet for having given him an opportunity of replying so early in his observations to the objection raised. The right hon. Baronet had said that Her Majesty's Government would object to the Amendment because it did not draw an even line between the three parts of the United Kingdom. Well, he should be glad to meet the right hon. Baronet's view; and so very strong was his repugnance to the increase in the numbers of the House that, if the right hon. Baronet would accept the proposal, he should be willing to take out the number of 15,000 from his statement as applied to Scotland and Ireland, and to insert 20,000. He thought, however, he should be able to show the Committee that his Amendment would be better as it stood. The increase proposed for Scotland was 12. Now, in 1832 and in 1868, Scotland obtained an increase of her representation in this House, but not by enlargement of the numbers of the House. Scotland then obtained an increase in the way in which he proposed that she should now obtain a further increase. The Bill fixed the limit of disfranchisement of boroughs at 15,000; and he was quite sure that there was a general impression in the House and in the country that—at least in the most populous of the Three Kingdoms—20,000 would be a better limit. Now, if the Committee were to adopt the Amendment what would be the consequences? There were in England, according to the

Census of 1881 which governed the Bill, 16 boroughs of between 15,000 and 20,000 population. There was not one borough in Wales that came within that limit. There was Radnor County with 16,872; but there was no borough. In the electoral statistics the Montgomery Boroughs appeared under 20,000; but in the more authentic Census the population was 20,042. In Scotland there were two—namely, the St. Andrew's group and the Wick group. There was also Bute County. In Ireland there were three boroughs between these limits; but he was sure the Committee would recognize the fact that the distribution of the people was very different in Scotland and Ireland, and he did not propose, by the Amendment, to merge in counties either the two Scottish groups or the three Irish boroughs—Newry, Galway, and Kilkenny—which came within the limit. The Committee would, he was sure, recognize the convenience of the plan he proposed to adopt. And if this important question of preference between further disfranchisement or increase of the number of the House were left until they reached the Schedules, the Committee would be greatly embarrassed in its procedure by the difficulty of making a choice of names; whereas, if the Committee adopted the proposal in the Amendment, they would be following the lines of previous Reform Bills. If they took the 16 English boroughs for further disenfranchisement, they would be proceeding upon the lines of 1832 and 1868. But the Committee would observe that, of these 16 boroughs, the boundaries of one—namely, Newcastle-under-Lyme, were so altered by the 5th Schedule of the Seats Bill as to include a population of 62,000; so they might, therefore, say that there remained only 15 boroughs in England of under 20,000 population. For adopting that limit of disfranchisement they had the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright, who, last year, since the production of this Bill, made a strong recommendation to his constituency in favour of adopting the limit of 20,000. He (Mr. Arnold), however, thought there was good reason for adopting the lower limit of 15,000 in regard to Scotland and Ireland as proposed by the Bill if they adopted 20,000 for England and Wales. A town of 15,000 population in Scotland or Ireland had even a greater relative importance than a town of 20,000 in England or Wales, and the distribution of seats in Scotland was entirely different to that which prevailed in this country. In Scotland the system of grouping existed, and that system was not disturbed by the present Bill. He would call the attention of the Committee to the fact that last year, in the Franchise Bill, the Government established, or, he should say, re-established, a serious difference between Scotland and England. In Scotland the soil of the boroughs was excluded from the Parliamentary county; while in England the soil of the boroughs formed a part of the county. In Ireland there were differences of franchise; and recently, in passing the Corrupt Practices Act, a different scale of expenditure for elections in that country had been established. Under the Bill now before the Committee there would only remain nine boroughs in Ireland returning Members to this House; and he thought it would be very undesirable indeed that they should, by amending the Bill, reduce that small number of boroughs from nine to six. It would be impossible to justify some differences that existed; but he was disposed to contend that it was not difficult to justify the difference of 5,000 in the limit in the Three Kingdoms. Indeed, he thought it would not be just to the circumstances of the population in Ireland and Scotland if a distinction of this kind were not made. The plan he recommended would give the measure greater permanence. The alternative was an increase of the numbers of the House, and he thought there were considerable reasons to be urged against that alternative. It went for something that the number 658 had endured since the foundation of the United Kingdom. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, speaking on this subject the other night, had referred to this particular figure of 658 as a superstition. He (Mr. Arthur Arnold) thought he was as free from superstition as the right hon. Baronet; but he attached importance to prescription. At the foundation of the United Kingdom the distribution of Members was 513 for England and Wales, 45 for Scotland, and 100 for Ireland. In 1865, 20 years ago, the distribution stood thus—England and Wales 500 seats, Scotland 51, and Ireland 105. In 1868 Scotland, as he had said, gained seven, and the distribution then stood—England and Wales 493, Scotland 60, Ireland 105. Since that time Sligo and Cashel had been disfranchised, reducing the Irish seats to 103. Bridgwater and Beverley had also been disfranchised, reducing the English and Welsh number to 489. Latterly, other seats had been held in abeyance, though not abolished; and the fact remained that ever since the Union—ever since the formation of the United Kingdom—the number of the Members in this House had been 634. Now, in 1832 and in 1868, England, to use the words of the Prime Minister, had contributed out of her abundance to the poverty of Scotland, and he now proposed she should do so in 1885. In regard to Great Britain, without enlarging the number of the House of Commons, they had, exclusive of University seats, 544 seats to be distributed. With the seven University seats they were 551. Surely that was a Chamber numerous enough for a population of 30,000,000. In 1881 the population of Great Britain, divided by 548, gave 54,200 as the number of population for each seat, a figure which the Prime Minister, in introducing the Bill, had quoted; and one of his (Mr. Arthur Arnold's) strongest objections to increasing the number of Members was, that by so doing they diminished the ratio of population to seats. A population of 54,200 would contain scarcely more than 6,000 electors. If they increased the number of the House, and carried out the single-seat system, they must form constituencies with a smaller electorate for each seat, and so bring about the danger of a revival of corrupt practices. The right hon. Gentleman, in 1866, and again last year, spoke of this matter as one of policy and convenience. "No, no." Well, he would not dispute on that subject; but he maintained that when the ratio of population to seats was one to 54,200, it was a matter of more than questionable policy to increase the number of seats in the House. There was another reason of policy against such an increase, which had been most forcibly stated by the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman had said in 1866—

"We have concluded, upon the whole, after some consideration, that this House would be disinclined to add to its number, because if the proposal to increase were once assented to, it would be difficult to risk the continual intrusion of new places."

Nothing was more evident than that this Bill was not a final measure of Reform. If the single-Member system—the system of electoral districts established by the Bill—was to endure, it must be carried throughout, and he expected that upon the publication of the Census of 1891 a movement would be organized for the completion of the work. If they now consented to an increase of the number of the House, how would they resist further demands to carry the single-Member system to its logical conclusion, which would probably be made in six or seven years? So much for the question of policy. With regard to convenience, he should be surprised if there was an argument in favour of increase. He would not dwell upon the fact that the House was practically full when there were 350 Members in it. It might be said that it would be possible to build a larger House. But he did not think it would be possible to build a House with seats for 700 Members, and to continue the conduct of our debates upon the English system. They must then adopt the Continental system and have a pulpit or rostrum, and give up the English way of Members rising in their places to address the House. Then he would call attention to the fact that Scotland herself had rejected this policy of increase for her benefit. In 1868 his right hon. Friend the Member for Montrose Mr. Baxter had carried an Instruction, affirming that it was better to disfranchise boroughs in England of under 5,000 population than to increase the number of Members in the House. The right hon. Gentleman had carried that Instruction with the strenuous aid and assistance of the Prime Minister and the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. Though this was an illustrious Parliament, it was well to look abroad. There was no Chamber in the world with so many Members in proportion to the population. The House of Representatives at Washington had 325 Members; the French Chamber, 557; the German Reichstag, 397; and the Prussian Chamber, for a population nearly as large as that of Great Britain, had

[Second Night.]

432. There was, of course, no magic about the figure 658; but upon that figure there ought to be no advance without proved necessity, and the terms of his Amendment must, he was sure, carry the conviction to the minds of hon. Members that there was no proved necessity. There had probably not been a Member of the House during the century who had held a position of greater respect and regard in the opinion of the House than Sir George Grey. Well, there were a few words which he had spoken exactly relative to this question that he (Mr. Arthur Arnold) would ask the permission of the Committee to quote. Sir George Grey, in the course of a debate that took place on this subject in 1867, said—

"I cannot help feeling that the greatest inconvenience will follow any departure from that number (658), which rests on long prescription, without the most paramount necessity. I hope we may do justice to Scotland without incurring so serious an inconvenience."

He (Mr. Arthur Arnold) thought he had shown that on no grounds of policy or of convenience was this increase desirable. There was no "paramount necessity" in the present case. But this was only a part of the argument. Why should the process of merging small boroughs in counties stop in this very populous country at 15,000? In Lancashire the Bill gave one seat to about 60,000 population. Why should they be asked to increase the number of the House in order to retain boroughs with less than a third of that population? Why should they be asked to increase the numbers of the House merely so as to retain 15 constituencies in England with an average of 17,000 population each? In 1867, when Mr. Disraeli's Reform Bill was before the House, it was proposed that 7,000 should be the limit at which boroughs should cease to return two Members to the House; and the hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing) had proposed an Amendment similar to that now before the Committee to raise the limit of 7,000 to 10,000. The hon. Member proposed that, and, with the assistance of the Prime Minister, carried it. What did Her Majesty's Government do on that occasion? Why, they immediately accepted the proposal, and he earnestly hoped that a Liberal Government would not be less ready to adopt an improvement. The Government had in part proposed—and he was exceedingly glad of it—that no borough containing a smaller population than 50,000 should send a Member to the House; but if they now sanctioned an increase in the number of Members in order to retain 15 boroughs having an average of 17,000 population, would it be possible for them to keep the number of the House to 670? He was convinced that their efforts ought rather to be in the other direction. Lord Grey, Lord Brougham, and other great authorities had been in favour of a considerable diminution in the number of that House. If 555 seats were not enough for Great Britain—more than five times the representation of the Kingdom of Ireland, where were they to stop? He regretted very much indeed that the Prime Minister had given the great weight of his authority to the proposal for an increase in the number of Members. Long after they who now sat in the House had passed away the right Gentleman's words would be quoted in the House. All that could be done on the other hand was to express dissent and vote against the proposal. He had heard it said that this question was not to be regarded as an open question; but he could not believe that report. He could not believe that the question of the increase of the numbers of the House would ever be treated by a Government as a question not absolutely within the discretion of the House at large. Surely, if there was one question more than another which ought to be left to the unbiased judgment of the House it was this. No pressure whatever should be put upon hon. Members. He should say that the acceptance of the Amendment would cause no general disturbance of the boundary scheme of the Government. He would undertake that if the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board would consult Sir John Lambert and his Colleagues as to the carrying out of the Amendment, they would assure him that all the changes consequent upon it could be arranged within three days, and that within that time the Amendments could be placed upon the Paper. Long before the Committee came to the Schedules the changes consequent upon the Amendment could be incorporated in the Bill; and there would be no interruption of progress with the measure. Twelve of the 15 seats might be needed for Scotland. In that case three would remain to assist in the redistribution of the 14 English counties which would be affected. Following the precedent of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Orkney, in 1867, he did not propose to say anything on the question of redistribution. He left that to the Government. The places dealt with by the Amendment would not be disfranchised even in name. Each would assume the more proper character of a centre of the division of the county in which it was situated. The Committee, he thought, would see that the Amendment would be a great improvement on the Boundary Commissioners' scheme. In the county of Bedford the Commissioners proposed that there should be two divisions having each of them 60,000 population; and yet in that county they kept the borough of Bedford, with a population of 19,000, returning a separate Member. He was sure the Committee would see how much better the arrangement would be if Bedford were divided equally in regard to that population and three seats were given. Then, take Cornwall. It was proposed to divide it into divisions, having each of them a population of 50,000, and yet they retained the borough of Penryn with a population of about 14,000. The retention by the Committee of such an anomaly as this in order to increase the number of the House would be a matter passing his comprehension. For these reasons he begged to move that the words of which he had given Notice be inserted in the Bill.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 12, after the word "boroughs" to insert the words "in England and Wales which had a less population than 20,000, according to the Census of 1881, and the Parliamentary boroughs in Scotland and Ireland, which had a less population than 15,000, according to the Census of 1881, and which are"—Mr. Arthur Arnold.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: As my hon. Friend Mr. Arthur Arnold proposes to carry the Bill further in the disfranchising direction than it already goes, it is desirable I should begin my remarks by pointing out to the Committee how large already is the change proposed by the Bill—very much larger than the change which has ever been proposed in any Reform Bill. By this Bill 164 seats are taken away from constituencies and given to other constituencies, as against the 143 seats so taken away in 1832. There are also six seats which were disfranchised in 1871, and which are allotted to other constituencies, making 170, as against 143. Then it is proposed to increase the number of Members by 12, so that 182 seats are to be disposed of, as against 143. Now, my hon. Friend thinks that the constituencies against which he points this Amendment sin or err against the general rules of proportion based on population. The change which is made by the Bill as regards proportion based upon population is an enormous one. At the present moment there is a discrepancy of 106 to 1, as between the most represented and the least represented constituencies in the country, taking population as the basis of calculation. Taking the electors as the basis of calculation, there is a discrepancy of 250 to 1. These proportions of 106 to 1 in some cases, and 250 to 1 in other cases, are altered by the Bill to the extreme disproportion of six to one. That is the most extreme disproportion under the present Bill. Now, my hon. Friend's Amendment would not carry this matter much further; the alteration would be one that would not be very considerable as compared with the six to one. Before I come to the special object of my hon. Friend's Amendment, I may tell the Committee that this is a matter upon which it is necessary to draw some line, to take some stand. Of course, we cannot expect that all Members, even those of the Party sitting on this side of the House, will agree in desiring to have one particular line drawn. This is a question of the balance of advantage and of disadvantage; and my own belief is, that we should not have met with general support in the House had we proposed to go further than we have proposed to go. My hon. Friend has assumed that these boroughs which he attacks are all boroughs which are on the decline. That is very far from being the case. At least four of them have very considerably more than 20,000 inhabitants at the present time, and some of them are rapidly increasing in population. My hon. Friend says that the average population of these boroughs is 17,000; but I think it is well to point out that some of them are rapidly increasing. Hereford, Stafford, and Bedford have now more than 20,000 inhabitants, and the population of Windsor is now up to 20,000. Pontefract, which was the smallest of the boroughs in 1881, is the borough which is growing most rapidly, although its population has not yet reached 20,000. My hon. Friend has excepted Montgomery from his list, and stated that the population of that place is over 20,000. I have some reason for doubting that statement. [Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD: According to the Census.] There is some doubt as to the exact population of Montgomery; but I will not press the point. My hon. Friend says he cannot conceive that we can put forward any valid plea for the retention of the representation of these boroughs. I must point out to my hon. Friend that he cannot make the disfranchisement of boroughs of under 15,000 or 20,000 inhabitants a matter of principle. The question must be settled by the consideration of what is best to do. My hon. Friend has assumed that three of the seats he would release would go to England, and that the remaining seats would go to Scotland; but the seats he would give to Scotland would considerably disturb the county averages, and that is a matter which must be borne in mind. He says it is easy to make the necessary re-arrangements. It stands to reason that a large number of county divisions would be disturbed. [Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD: Fourteen.] More than 14 county divisions would be disturbed, and a great deal of trouble would have to be taken by the House in consequence. My hon. Friend has said that his proposal would not cause any great or general disturbance of our scheme. That is very far indeed from being the case, for my hon. Friend has left entirely out of account one of the most delicate balances of the whole scheme, and that is the balance between borough and county. He proposes to take 16 borough seats from England, or to reduce the borough representation of England by that number of seats. But, under the Government's proposal, the boroughs and counties of England are represented at the same ratio; therefore, if the Amendment were adopted, there would be a complete disturbance of the ratio as between boroughs and counties. It will be found by anyone who looks through this Bill that the very large counties are better treated than the very large boroughs—boroughs of the same size—but that is a necessity, if we are to keep a general balance between boroughs and counties. We have thought it desirable to make a fair balance between boroughs and counties. The counties of England contain, as proposed by us, 12,506,000 people; and the boroughs of England, as altered or extended by us, contain 12,106,000. We propose 234 county and 226 borough Members for England. The proportion of population in boroughs and counties, under our scheme, is almost exactly the same. The proportion in counties is one Member to every 53,400 people, and in boroughs one Member to every 53,600—almost exactly the same. My hon. Friend would undoubtedly disturb that proportion. By taking away 16 borough seats from England, he would altogether put the English boroughs, as boroughs, in a worse position than the English counties as such. My hon. Friend is not doing what he calls justice to England. He has strongly protested against increasing the number of Members of the House; but he has hardly put clearly before the Committee what it is he proposes by his Amendment to do. He proposes to leave the representation of Ireland at 103, and he proposes to leave the representation of Wales as it is now, Wales being very much more represented than England. ["Hear, hear!"] There would never be the slightest attempt on my part to conceal that fact. Both Wales and Ireland, being over-represented as compared with England as a whole, my hon. Friend proposes to increase the disproportion; he proposes to take 16 seats from England, and leave the representation of Ireland and Wales as at present. Whatever complaint there is to be made against the proposals of the Bill, in this Amendment my hon. Friend intensifies the evil against which some hon. Members have been protesting. It is only necessary that the Committee should clearly see what is the effect of the proposal of my hon. Friend to cause them to reject it.

Mr. R. N. FOWLER said, he wished to give the reason why, if his hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) went to a division, he would vote with him. Of course, there was a good deal in the speech of his hon. Friend with which he could not agree. For instance, the hon. Gentleman objected very strongly to the proposed increase of the number of Members from 654 to 670. Now, he Mr. R. N. Fowler did not see that any valid objection could be raised to that increase. At that moment six seats were disfranchised; and he believed that four others, those for Sandwich and Margate, were to be added to the list. He did not imagine that in future there would be such a reign of electoral purity that boroughs would cease to be disfranchised. Some of the boroughs against which his hon. Friend directed his Amendment were boroughs which, it was well known, were very corrupt. He Mr. R. N. Fowler apprehended that they would continue to be corrupt, and that before long some of them would be disfranchised. In course of time, therefore, it was very possible that Members would be brought down to the normal number of 654. Certainly, in his opinion, Her Majesty's Government had, under all the difficulties of the question, acted wisely in increasing the number of Members to 670. His reason for supporting the Amendment was that, if the limit of disfranchisement were fixed at 15,000 inhabitants, it would be found that the disfranchisement of the boroughs having from 15,000 to 20,000 population would remain an open question; but if no borough remained with a population of below 20,000, the question of redistribution would very likely be settled for a very considerable time. He supposed they were all anxious that this Bill should settle the question of Reform for this generation at least; none of them were desirous that the question should in their time be re-opened. He was aware that some hon. Members sitting on the Benches below the Ministerial Gangway were prepared to advocate manhood suffrage; but that, however, was not the question the Committee were now considering. If the Bill enacted that no constituency with less than 20,000 inhabitants could send a Member to the House, the settlement would, in his opinion, prevail for this generation, and perhaps for a much longer period; if, however, the limit of disfranchisement was fixed at 15,000, he was afraid the question would be re-opened very soon. He should be very glad to see the Amendment adopted, though not on all the grounds stated by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Salford. No doubt, various claims would be put forward against some of the disfranchising clauses of the Bill; but if this Amendment were adopted those claims could be very properly met.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 21; Noes 213: Majority 192.—(Div. List. No. 45)

VISCOUNT CRICHTON, in rising to move, as an Amendment, the insertion, in page 1, line 13, after the word "Act," of the words—

"Except such boroughs in Ireland as were returned under the Census of 1881, as having a population of 10,000 or over."

said, the object of the Amendment was to remedy, to a certain extent, a great injustice, as he considered it, to the town population of Ireland. As the Bill stood, it proposed to reduce the urban representation of Ireland by 20 Members, or from 36 to 16; and of those 16 one-half, or 8, were allotted to the towns of Dublin and Belfast. He considered that that was not only unfair to the urban communities, but it also contained a great practical danger, as it tended to throw political power in Ireland entirely into the hands of one class of the community—namely, the agricultural class. Even though there were no large towns in Ireland except Dublin and Belfast, it was quite a mistake to suppose that there was no urban element. There was a very large urban element scattered up and down throughout the country in small towns; and those towns, small though they were, had all the characteristics of urban constituencies. They had their merchants and their manufacturers, and their artisan classes, all widely differing from the rural element by which they were surrounded. According to the Census Returns of 1881, the borough population of Ireland—that was to say, the population included in the boroughs which now existed—amounted to 901,454 against a county population of 4,263,844. But that borough population by no means represented the whole of the urban population of Ireland; because, if all the towns having a population of 3,000 and upwards were taken, there would be an increase to the urban population of 303,735, making a total urban population of 1,205,189, for whom representation ought to be provided. Taking away the population of the towns proposed to be disfranchised by this Bill, the urban population entitled to separate Parliamentary representation would be reduced to 730,284, and one Member would be given for every 45,000. But for the total urban population of 1,205,000 there was only a Member to every 75,000. There were two ways, by either of which this great inequality and injustice might be remedied. One was the plan which would be proposed hereafter by his hon. Friend the Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland), and which aimed at the extension of the system which now prevailed in Scotland and in Wales—the system of grouping the smaller boroughs together. The other plan was the one contained in the Amendment which he (Viscount Crichton) now had the honour to move. He believed that this Amendment had the merit of simplicity, and that it would involve the least possible disturbance of existing arrangements under the Bill. The six boroughs which the Amendment proposed to preserve, but which under the Bill would be extinguished, were Dundalk, Drogheda, Wexford, Lisburn, Armagh, and Carrickfergus. Three of the Members for them could be supplied by taking one from each of the three counties in which the boroughs were situated, and the other three seats could be taken from the already over-represented counties in Leinster. He believed the Amendment, although not a very large one, would go some way towards remedying the inequality and injustice of the Bill, and of which he thought the urban element in Ireland had a right to complain. It was with that view that he made the proposition.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 13, after the word "Act," to insert the words, "except such boroughs in Ireland as were returned, under the Census of 1881, as having a population of 10,000 or over."
—Viscount Crichton.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: There is a good deal to be said, at first sight, for the proposal to keep alive a certain number of the small Irish Parliamentary boroughs at the expense of the Irish counties, because there are so few boroughs in that country. When the first sketch of this Bill was being prepared, I took a great deal of pains to investigate, with the sanction of my Colleagues, the existing condition of the smaller Irish boroughs; and, from the best information that could be obtained, it appeared that a fairer representation was to be got from the counties than from the boroughs, and that there was not any real distinction in the pursuits of the people between the boroughs and the counties. ["Oh, oh!"] I am only giving the Committee the information which we obtained. What we were told was that the small boroughs in Ireland are, as a rule, supported by the farmers; that they have no trade or manufactures; and that even the shopkeepers in these towns are farmers in the counties, as well as shopkeepers in the towns. Such boroughs, therefore, are dependent on the farmers, and have no special or separate interests apart from the counties. The noble Viscount who has made this proposal has given us a list of six of these boroughs. In two cases the population of the boroughs that he wished to save is only just over 10,000, and the population of some of the others is a dwindling population. The population of Armagh is only just over 10,000, and so is that of Carrickfergus. The noble Viscount, when he placed his proposal before the Committee, very naturally did not go into much detail as to where he proposes to get the six seats from. It is very easy to give seats, but much more difficult to sustain a proposal to take seats away. If these six boroughs in Ireland are to be specially and exceptionally saved, the seats must necessarily be obtained from Irish counties. Now, before we consent to make any exception in favour of the small Irish boroughs, we ought to know more clearly from what quarter the seats are to be obtained. The noble Viscount has spoken of six seats to be obtained, one each from Louth, Antrim, and Armagh, and the other three are to be obtained from the over-represented Leinster counties as he calls them. Now, if they are over-represented, they are over-represented by being let alone. It is not the proposal of the Bill to increase their representation; but it is the fact that they have two Members each now, while they are rather small for two. It is the general principle of the Bill to leave undisturbed the seats of counties which are of middle size. They are left undisturbed in all parts of the United Kingdom; and it is rather difficult to justify a proposal to disturb them, and to take seats from them in Ireland, without also proceeding to take seats away from the over-represented agricultural counties of England. There are a number of counties in England which are very small and which are represented a good deal above the average. If you were to take away one seat from each of these counties in Ireland you would have similar proposals for the agricultural counties of England. I do not know whether the Committee is prepared to open so wide a door as that by accepting this proposal. It is also dangerous for Irish representation generally to open this question. Take the county of Fermanagh, for instance, which is far from being the smallest county in Ireland—there are several smaller—but even the county of Fermanagh, with two Members, is much smaller than the county of Mid Lothian and four or five other counties in Scotland which have but one Member, and which are left alone by the Bill. It would be dangerous to make special provision for these special and exceptional cases, and very difficult to do it in Ireland without making changes in the Scotch constituencies. If a special and exceptional treatment were to be extended to Ireland, I should have thought it would have been better to follow the general lines of the Bill, and take the Members from counties the representation of which it is proposed to increase. That would open a much less dangerous door, though I cannot myself hold out any hope that even such a proposal as that would be considered a desirable one. At the same time, if this general Amendment should be negatived, it would not prevent the raising of one or two cases which hon. Members may desire to bring forward later, where they are cases of boroughs which might possibly be brought over the 15,000 line.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I am very glad to find, in the concluding remarks of the right hon. Baronet, symptoms that he may be able to concede something to the wishes of my noble Friend Viscount Crichton) in this matter, because it seems to me that, as the Bill now stands, it does deal in a very remarkable way with the borough representation of Ireland. I say this without any Party view of any kind. Whatever Members these constituencies may return, and in whatever part of the House they may sit, it is a matter of some importance that the boroughs of the country, as distinguished from the counties, should have their due representation. That is provided in England, because here we have a large number of large towns; and, notwithstanding the great change that is made by this Bill in the proportion of representation between boroughs and counties, still, owing to the existence of these large towns, the borough population in England will be adequately represented. That is also the case in Scotland and in Wales. They are not countries in which, with rare exceptions, there are any large towns at all. In Wales there is only one county—Glamorganshire—in which there is any large town, and yet in this Bill there is no attempt whatever to abolish the borough representation of Wales. In the same way, although in a great part of Scotland the borough groups consist of very small towns indeed, there is no attempt to abolish the borough representation. Therefore, the borough representation of Scotland and Wales is to be preserved, although in both those countries the towns comprised in the groups are very small, having, as the right hon. Baronet has just pointed out in regard to Ireland, precisely similar intervals with the counties in which they are situated, to a far greater extent than is the case in many instances in Ireland, because very often they are no more than mere villages. This Bill preserves, then, in one way or another, the borough representation of England, Scotland, and Wales, and yet it almost entirely extinguishes the borough representation of Ireland, because there are only eight Members, besides those allotted to Dublin and Belfast, who will in future, under this Bill, be Irish borough Representatives. Now, speaking for myself alone, I do not think that this is a fair and adequate representation. I remember very well that some years ago, when I had the honour to hold the Office of Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, it fell to my lot to address the House upon the provisions of a Sunday Closing Bill for Ireland. I objected to that Bill principally on the score of the extreme difficulty, as it appeared to me, of carrying out the provisions of the measure in the large towns; and the right hon. Gentleman who is now Prime Minister (Mr. Gladstone) at once answered me with great force, by pointing to the fact that Ireland was not a country of large towns, and that, therefore, my objection did not apply. It seems to me that in this Bill the Government have really forgotten that Ireland is not a country of large towns, and that yet Irish borough representation ought to be preserved. I do not think it is quite the fact, although I do not presume to offer an opinion as against that of any Irish Representatives—I do not think it is quite the fact, as stated by the right hon. Baronet, that in the smaller Irish boroughs there are no distinct pursuits as compared with the counties. Certainly it is the case that in some Irish boroughs on the sea coast, as in Kinsale, there is a very distinct fishing interest, which would undoubtedly have no representation at all if that borough was turned into the county, because it would be entirely swamped by the agricultural population. In the same way, in the North, there is a distinct manufacturing interest, as at Lisburn, which, if thrown into the county, would be swamped by the agricultural interest. I therefore think that there is some ground for the suggestion made to the Committee that, in some way or other, this blot in the Bill should be dealt with, and some further representation given to the borough population of Ireland than it now receives under the Bill. Whether it should be given by grouping, or by lowering the limit of dis-franchisement, is a matter upon which, perhaps, Her Majesty's Government are the best persons to decide; but I will venture to say this—that I do not think we shall come to a satisfactory solution of this question if we attempt to delude ourselves into the idea that we are really legislating equally for Ireland as compared with England, Scotland, and Wales, if we deal with the one country in precisely the same manner as we have dealt with the other three. That would only be a sham, and not a real equality, and it would not bring about that satisfactory and equal result which we should all desire to aim at in the provisions of such a Bill as this. I must say that, so far as my own opinion goes, of the two proposals before us—that of my noble Friend (Viscount Crichton), and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland)—I rather lean to that of the hon. Member for Downpatrick. I think that by adopting a certain number of groups—some, perhaps, in the North, and some in the other Provinces—it might be possible to arrive at an adequate borough representation which should not have any Party character about it, but be framed with the idea of representing the urban as distinguished from the agricultural population. That is all I am anxious to see, and I believe it could be satisfactorily accomplished consistently with the number of Representatives allotted to Ireland by the Bill. The Members to be allotted to these groups might be fairly provided, either by taking away the additional Members to be given to the larger counties, or, perhaps, in one or two instances, by lowering the representation of counties to which two Members are proposed to be given. At any rate, in whatever way the matter may be settled, I hope it may receive some further consideration beyond that which it has yet had, and that some attempt may be made to make this a real measure of equality for Ireland.

MR. HEALY said, that, while he could not go the length of the noble Viscount (Viscount Crichton), he could, at least, understand the motives which had induced him to bring this Amendment forward. But what he (Mr. Healy) was quite unable to understand was the position that had just been taken up by the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach). He understood that right hon. Baronet to represent the Tory Party on the Front Opposition Bench. Who had the arrangement of this Bill in private? Why, the right hon. Baronet and his Party, who had been engaged with the Prime Minister and the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) in arranging in secret the provisions of the Bill. He (Mr. Healy) therefore, maintained that the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire was debarred from coming forward now and proposing to make changes in the Bill.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

The right hon. Baronet had had his say in Downing Street, if not in person, at all events through the mouths of the Leaders of the Opposition, and having had the dealing of the cards, he could not now object to the way in which the game was being played. The right hon. Baronet could not have two says, one in Downing Street and the other in the House of Commons. He had had his say already, and had inspired the Bill; but the Irish Members, those who were really interested in this question, had had no opportunity of giving any inspiration at all. The first time they saw the Bill was when it was on the Table of this House, and the first chance of their debating it had occurred in the House itself. The noble Viscount (Viscount Crichton) and the Opposition had had their say, and they were stopped from now coming forward in this House and wanting a different arrangement from that of the compromise. The noble Viscount and the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire were "pumped." They had had their say, and their functions were at an end. As for the noble Viscount's proposal, he, Mr. Healy, would admit that he did feel considerable sympathy with the Opposition over the extinction of certain boroughs in Ireland. But there was always this difficulty confronting them—from whence were the seats to be obtained which were to be provided? That was really the difficulty to be met. They would have no difficulty whatever in arranging this matter if the Irish Members of the various conflicting Parties were only able to put their heads together. Any arrangement they might make which would be satisfactory to the Government would, no doubt, be equally satisfactory to the House. For once, the House would, no doubt, allow them to have that amount of Home Rule, however much the House might like to intermeddle in their affairs in other respects. But if once the Irish Members got into communication as to the boroughs which were to be saved, and as to the counties which were to be their saviours, what would be the most natural proposal? There was the proposal of the Royal Commission—the Hexham Commission—in 1841, in favour of the extension of certain areas in the borough of Drogheda. If the proposal of the Hexham Commission had been carried out, the borough of Drogheda would have been above the limit of 15,000. The same would have been the case with the borough of Lisburn. It was, he thought, grossly unfair that the borough of Belfast should have had rights given to it under the Bill by incorporating the boundary of the Hexham Commission which, if extended to the cases of Drogheda and Lisburn, would have preserved those boroughs. But the Government, for reasons of their own, in that mysterious conference in Downing Street, gave the borough of Belfast that extension, and provided the means of carrying out that extension from the counties of Down and Antrim. Other boroughs in Ireland, if dealt with in the same fashion, would have been preserved. Supposing the Irish Tory Members and the Members of the Irish National Party were to agree that these two boroughs—Lisburn and Drogheda—merited special treatment, then, although they might agree that both these boroughs should be retained, were they at all likely to agree as to the counties which were to suffer through their retention? He had looked into the facts, and he understood that what the Tories would propose was that as the borough of Lisburn was situated in the county of Antrim, and as Antrim possessed four seats, the borough should be kept alive by taking one of the four seats from the county. Well, they might keep their borough if they liked, and Antrim might be left with the four seats, including that of Lisburn, because the Tory Party would carry her four seats in any event, and therefore that arrangement would do the Nationalists no harm. Then there was the borough of Drogheda, in the county of Tyrone. The Nationalists could carry the whole of the four seats there, for there would be 80 per cent. of Catholics in County Tyrone, and it was the lowest populated county in Ireland that was allowed four Members. The Nationalists could carry the whole of the four seats, and it was immaterial to them whether they carried three for Tyrone and one for Drogheda, or none for Drogheda and four for Tyrone. If the Tories were willing to take one seat out of Antrim for Lisburn, the Nationalists were equally willing to take one out of Tyrone for Drogheda. But they did not want any change in the Bill—they were not anxious for any alteration. They thought it a hardship that a borough like Drogheda, with a population within 250 of the vivifying 15,000 which entitled to a Member, should be compelled to suffer in this way. The borough of Drogheda, within 250 of the right number of inhabitants, was in the unfortunate position of the person who stood at the gate of Paradise—they all knew the quotation—beholding Heaven and enduring Hell. If it had had the same benefit from the Hexham Commission which Belfast had obtained, it would not be extinguished under the Bill. It was a very hard thing that a borough which was a county in itself, which had an ancient Charter, and its own Mayor and Corporation and Sheriff, should be disfranchised, while, if it had had the benefit of the Hexham Commission, it would have been kept alive for Parliamentary purposes. He repeated that this was a very hard case; but the Irish Party did not wish to play ducks and drakes with the Bill as a whole for the sake of a few seats; it would not be their game to do it. But if the Tory Party would lay their views before the Government on this subject, the Nationalists would assent to their proposition, so far as regarded Antrim and Lisburn, Tyrone and Drogheda. But further than that he did not think his Friends could be expected to go. He only gave his own opinion—he had not had the advantage of consulting any of his hon. Friends on the subject—and it was possible that they might be totally opposed to this arrangement. But he gave his own personal opinion, and having viewed the subject in this way he would only say further that he quite understood the difficulty which the Government had had in dealing with the matter, and he did not see how they could make any change in the Bill unless there was practical unanimity among all sections of the Irish Members.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that when the Amendment proposed by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay) was discussed, the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Charles W. Dilke) laid great stress upon one point—namely, that a reduction in the number of Members for Ireland would be a violation of the Treaty of Union. The proposal of his noble Friend (Viscount Crichton) was one which would prevent an entire violation of the Treaty of Union, as would be seen from the following extract from the 4th Resolution, containing the terms proposed by the Lords and Commons of Ireland:—

“And 100 commoners (2 for each county of Ireland, 2 for the City of Dublin, 2 for the City of Cork, 1 for the University of Trinity College, and 1 for each of the three most considerable cities, towns and boroughs) be the Members to sit and vote on the part of Ireland in the House of Commons of the Parliament of the United Kingdom; that such Act as shall be passed in the Parliament of Ireland previous to the Union, ‘to regulate the mode by which the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and the Commons to serve in the Parliament of the United Kingdom on the part of Ireland shall be summoned or returned to the said Parliament,’ shall be considered as forming part of the Treaty of Union, and shall be incorporated in the Acts of the respective Parliaments by which the said Union shall be ratified and established.”

It was evident from that, that the number of borough Members established was 31; and, notwithstanding that, it was now proposed to reduce them by nearly one-half—if the total number were 32, it would be exactly one-half—it was proposed to leave only 16 borough Members for Ireland. The other Representatives would be agricultural Members. It was then said by the right hon. Baronet that there was hardly any distinction between the population in the small boroughs and small towns in Ireland, and the surrounding agricultural population. Well, he (Mr. Macartney) did not know what the distinction could be. It was well known, for instance, that for centuries Lisburn had been the central place of the damask manufacture. It had a most industrial population, and to say that its people were assimilated to the agricultural population that surrounded them would be as true as to say that the population of Cardiff was assimilated to the colliers and sailors who frequented that port. He could not understand such statements being made. Ireland was usually treated as an exceptional country; but, now, when it suited the convenience of the Government, a hard-and-fast line was laid down, and when a proposal to treat Ireland different to England was made by Irish Members, they were met by this plea—“Oh, no; we cannot do it for Ireland because we cannot do it for England.” That was not the position taken up by the Government when they passed the Bill dealing with the Irish Church, and that was not the position they had taken up when passing other considerable measures. Let them apply the same laws to Ireland as they applied to England—let them repeal the laws they passed for Ireland which differed from the English laws—put Ireland on the same footing as England in all respects, and he would be satisfied. He did not wish, however, to go into this matter at very great length, because he believed that arguing it with the Government was like pouring water into a bottomless tub, and that nothing was likely to result from it. There was concord between the two Front Benches. Irish Members might be listened to, but that listening would be without effect. He begged leave to second the proposal.

Mr. T. A. DICKSON said, he wished to make just one or two observations with reference to this matter. The hon. and learned Member opposite Mr. Healy seemed anxious to enfranchise Drogheda at the expense of Tyrone; but he Mr. T. A. Dickson would take care that that was not done. He sympathized with Drogheda in losing its Member, and considered that it was one of those towns very hardly dealt with; but, at the same time, if it was thought desirable to give it a Member, that Member should be taken from the Province of Leinster, which was already over-represented. He would point out the difficulties which would arise if the Amendment of the noble Viscount was adopted by the Committee. Let them take the county of Antrim. They heard about the borough of Lisburn; but he would ask what about Carrickfergus, also in the county of Antrim? If Lisburn were enfranchised, and had a separate representation given to it, it was only natural that Carrickfergus should be treated in the same manner. Thus, two Members would be taken from Antrim, and two would remain to represent an agricultural population of 228,000, or one Member to each 114,000. How was Tyrone over-represented with four Members to a population of over 197,000? Why, its representation was one Member to 49,000; and he thought that if Irish counties generally were examined into, it would be found that in several of them the representation was much more excessive. If the proposals of the noble Viscount were adopted, they would take one Member from the county of Armagh, giving the seat to the city of Armagh, with a population of 10,000. In the agricultural districts, therefore, they would have one Member to represent 78,500; whereas the noble Viscount, in his own county, would represent 42,000. The proposal before the Committee would not hold water. If they enfranchised the six boroughs in question, they could do so only at the expense of the agricultural constituencies of the rest of the country, and against that he must earnestly protest.

Colonel NOLAN said, that up to the present they had had four Ulster Members speaking one after another; consequently, the argument of the Ulster Members was now thoroughly well known. But there were other parts of Ireland to be considered as well. The proposition of the noble Viscount amounted to this—that, practically, they should take away three Members from the three Leinster counties, and hand them over to three Ulster boroughs. "No, no!" Yes, that was what it would amount to, if hon. Gentlemen would consider the details of the proposal. Hon. Gentlemen who came from the North would like to have as many Members there as they could. If, in this matter, the Committee was to be guided by population, then Connaught ought to have more Members. He did not believe that that Province had its fair share of representation, and yet he did not seek to increase the number; but what he desired to point out in this connection was, that if once they departed from the principle they had laid down, they would not know where to stop. It would be Lisburn to-day, Carrickfergus to-morrow, some other place the day after, and so on. He did not wish Tyrone to lose a Member, and probably he was guided in that matter somewhat by selfish considerations. He had nothing to do with Tyrone; but if they dealt with that county on the principle of population, they would soon be coming to Galway, Mayo, and other counties. He did not see why Tyrone should not be favourably considered, and he believed that they would be just as much taking away a Member from Tyrone by the adoption of the proposal in question as they would be taking away one from Louth, if they gave it two instead of three. The population interested in this matter had instructed their Members to support the proposal; but if it were accepted, the Committee would be breaking up the agreement come to. He trusted the Government would reject the proposal. If he were advocating such changes, he should put down an Amendment to keep the two Members for the three boroughs, because he looked upon these as the most important towns in Ireland, next to Cork, Belfast, and Dublin. That was to say, he looked upon them as the towns which were most likely to rise. But they could not do that without breaking up the Bill, and he held that it would be most dangerous to take such a step. If they set the House of Lords the example of breaking up the Bill, however slight the excuse might be, the House of Lords would wish to have a finger in the pie. Let them ask themselves this question—when they saw the noble Viscount who represented the Province of Ulster, in which the House of Lords took a deep interest, bringing forward such a Motion as this, how far might they not expect the House of Lords to endeavour to part from the principle laid down in the Bill? If they gave the House of Lords the slightest opening, they would rush in and make all sorts of changes in the Bill. A proposal had been made to the effect that the Irish Members sitting below the Gangway should go into conference with the Ulster Members, and discuss the question; but he objected to any such proceeding. He had always been most anxious to go into conference with the Ulster and the Liberal Members; but there was now no common footing between the Party to which he belonged and the Conservative Ulster Members. Those Members had made a most extraordinary proposal, which, to his mind, ought not to have come from any part of the Committee. They had made, or at any rate supported, a proposal for Ireland to lose Members, and that being so, he could not see how the Party to which he belonged could have anything to do with them. They had set a most extraordinary example, and had done that which, in the old Irish Parliament, would never have been proposed—that was to say, they had tried to reduce the number of Irish Representatives. It was perfectly impossible, under the circumstances, for the Home Rule Members to go into conference with those Gentlemen, because they would always be afraid of proposals being made which would have the effect of breaking up the Bill, and of giving the House of Lords an opportunity of seriously interfering with the Irish representation.

Mr. CORRY said, the hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down (Colonel Nolan) had declared that he and his Friends would not go into conference with the Ulster Members. Well, he (Mr. Corry) did not think there was any fear upon that point, because the Ulster Members were not prepared to go into conference with them. As to Belfast, it was said that it had succeeded in getting four Members; but he maintained that, even without the extension of boundaries, that city was entitled to four, as it had, at the last Census, 207,000 inhabitants, an enormous increase since the previous Census, when the population was only 174,000. That increase was still going on, and without the counties of Down and Antrim, it was quite entitled to four Members. He was of opinion that the proposal should be accepted. If it were not, the small boroughs would be swamped by the rural population in the counties.

Mr. CALLAN said, he very much admired the cool, calculating manner in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway County (Colonel Nolan) took up a subject when he had an interest in it, however remote. He (Mr. Callan) had wondered how it was that the sympathy of the hon. and gallant Member extended so far to the North as Tyrone; but the hon. and gallant Gentleman had now let the cat out of the bag, because he had declared that if Tyrone was interfered with and deprived of one of its Members, the county of Galway would be the next victim to suffer. The hon. and gallant Member evidently considered that he had a better chance of being returned for Galway if that constituency had four Members than he would have if it were reduced to three. In reference to the proposal which had been made by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), that they should come to an amicable arrangement, and that Whigs, Tories, Home Rulers, nominal Home Rulers, and Nationalists should agree to some proposal for the restoration of certain Members, and the reduction of the 15,000 limit, which dealt most unfairly with the Irish borough representation. Mr. Callan had never, and he certainly would not now, speak of the Irish borough representation as one that, on the whole, recommended itself to the country for its purity or its honesty. But whilst he admitted that, yet, having represented a borough, as he now represented a county, and having no interest whatever in the extension of any borough amongst the non-liberated boroughs of Ireland, he certainly did think that the suggestion that had been made was well worth the consideration of the right hon. Baronet Sir Charles W. Dilke who had charge of the Bill in this House. He thought that the framers of the Bill might, without doing injury to the county representation of Ireland, dock the county of one Member for the purpose of giving it to Lisburn, which was in that county, even if Carrickfergus were included with it. If they grouped Carrickfergus with Lisburn, they would amply satisfy those who proposed that one Member should be taken from the county of Antrim and given to a borough, and such grouping would remove all local jealousy. If they did the same in another direction, and restored Drogheda with the Hexham limit, grouping with it the borough of Dundalk, they would get an addition of an independent and intelligent constituency, and one which would truly represent the borough interests of the East Coast of Ireland. He was surprised that the Government did not show some signs of yielding with reference to Drogheda. How was it proposed to act with regard to Warwick? In introducing the Bill, the Prime Minister had said that he would not stand to any hard and fast line with regard to the limitation of the extent of boroughs. Then, why did they adopt the limit in the Bill with regard to Drogheda? If they extended the limit a mile and a-half from the centre of the town—which would be a very fair thing to do—they would get a population of 15,000. Warwick had only a population of 11,800; and yet, in order to enable it to keep its Member, its boundary was extended from five to six miles in one direction, taking in towns which were entirely distinct. Warwick, as a matter of fact, had been jerrymandered for a political purpose. But when they came to the Schedules, the Committee would hear a great deal more on this point than they did now. This arrangement reflected no credit on the framers of the Bill. They had jerrymandered the borough of Warwick for purposes which were not creditable to them, and, at the same time, they refused to do the barest justice to the town of Drogheda. It would have been the easiest thing in the world to have extended that borough a thousand beyond the standard. It was, however, of no use appealing to the good feeling of the Treasury Bench, for it was quite evident that they had their arrangements made. He had been very much amused by the speech of the junior Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson.) The hon. and learned Member for Monaghan had said that one Member should be taken from Tyrone and given to Drogheda; and the hon. Member for Tyrone had replied—"I will take good care that you do not," and had said this with all the airs of an occupant of the Treasury Bench. The hon. Member did not sit upon that Bench as yet, and it appeared to him (Mr. Callan) that if before taking his seat upon it, he had to be re-elected, it would not be by an Irish constituency that he would be returned. With regard to Drogheda, that borough had every right to consideration, looking at its population and its industries, and its flax works especially, and generally at its busy and enterprising character. Even with its present boundaries, it required less than 3,000 people to enfranchise it, and it would easily have been enfranchised if the President of the Local Government Board had treated it with only half the amount of favour with which he had treated Warwick—a borough which had been jerrymandered in order to secure a seat for a partizan of the Government. The Irish Members said that in County Tyrone, where there was a majority of over 40 per cent of Catholics, and where they could return four Members, they would be content with three, in order to give one to Drogheda, even if Dundalk were grouped with it and Carrickfergus were grouped with Lisburn. If the Government would do that, they would please everybody but a few discontented Whigs. Though he could not support the proposal of the noble Viscount, he was in favour of the compromise he had stated—that was, that they should have an increased borough representation to the extent of two Members, one for Lisburn district, and one for the Drogheda district.

MR. WARTON said, he wished to draw attention to the peculiar character of the Amendment. On what plan did it rest? They had, in the 1st Schedule, a certain list; and on page 14, they had a second list, drawn upon the principle that the boroughs mentioned in the first part of the Schedule should cease to return Members. Then they had this extraordinary Amendment—extraordinary in two distinct ways—first of all, because it went into the question of population. They had been told a great deal about population, and the lines upon which the Government had drawn the Bill; but, as a matter of fact, nothing about population appeared all through the Bill. They seemed to forget that they were only looking at present at a plan, and not really at a finished structure. There was simply to be a list for the purposes of striking out names of places for it. There was nothing on the face of the Bill to show what the population was of any one of the boroughs mentioned in the Schedules. What was being done certainly seemed to him contrary to every sound principle of legislation. He suggested that the best and simplest plan would be to withdraw the Amendment, and strike out of the Schedule the names of the places which were to retain their Members, supposing it to be so decided.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I quite understand the criticism of my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Warton), and I presume there is no doubt that if this Amendment of my noble Friend (Viscount Crichton) were adopted, it would be necessary to make some Amendment afterwards in order to make the Bill complete. But what I understand my noble Friend's wish is, to bring forward his Amendment in the present shape, and at the earliest period possible to raise a point which he is desirous of raising. I understand he wishes to raise the point in such a form as to show on the face of the Amendment what it is he aims at, and what is the object to be gained. The position my noble Friend takes up is, that none of the boroughs in Ireland with 10,000 inhabitants should be disfranchised. There is no doubt that in any Reform Bill or Redistribution Bill which you could pass, you will have a certain number of hard cases—you may have a very large number of hard cases; but when you have to deal with questions of this magnitude, it is necessary that you should, in the first instance, lay down the lines upon which you desire to proceed, and on which you intend to proceed. Whether any exceptions can be admitted to those lines is a subsequent question, and one of a rather difficult and delicate character. But the lines laid down must be clear and distinct. There were several questions discussed when the Franchise Bill was under our consideration last Session, and one of those questions was whether the Bill should extend to Ireland, and the general feeling was that it should. The general principle was laid down that Ireland should receive substantially the same treatment as England, and when Her Majesty's Government were drawing up this Bill, and had laid down a certain line of population below which boroughs were to be disfranchised, they held that the same line should be observed throughout the country, and that the line should be even as between Ireland and England; that whatever figure should be adopted, it should relate to one part of the United Kingdom as well as to another. Therefore, when they had fixed upon the 15,000 limit, they, so I understand, considered that, by the rule laid down for themselves, 15,000 must be the limit both in England and in Ireland. Now, my noble Friend challenges the principle. He does so by laying down another principle—namely, that 10,000 is a fairer figure in the case of Ireland than 15,000. Well, I do not know whether that is so or not; but there must be considerable difficulty, no doubt, in adopting a disfranchising line for all parts of the Kingdom, and it was upon that understanding that, in the conversation which took place with regard to the Bill, Lord Salisbury and myself accepted the proposal that the line should be the same for the two countries, and that 15,000 should be the limit. I do not think it is competent for us, whatever our opinion might be, to depart from the principle so laid down that there should be an even line; but whether there could be any arrangement made or suggested, by which better representation should be given to the urban populations of Ireland, is a matter upon which I do not wish to pronounce any definite opinion; if any such arrangement could be found later on in the discussion of the Bill, I should be very glad. As I understand the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill Sir Charles W. Dilke, he does not think it is altogether impossible that some arrangement might be made to meet particular cases. However that may be, the point on which we have now to vote is upon the principle which is involved and freely stated by my noble Friend's Amendment—namely, that 10,000 should be taken as the limit for disfranchisement in Ireland, instead of 15,000, and that is a proposal which I cannot support.

Mr. SEXTON said, he assented to the proposition laid down by the right hon. Baronet Sir Stafford Northcote, that if any fair arrangement for equitably improving the urban representation of Ireland was come to, it might receive general approval. He also thought the right hon. Gentleman had given a very fair and succinct sketch of the history of the present position of this debate. He had told the Committee that 15,000 was understood to be a hard-and-fast limit for representation of boroughs in Ireland; but upon the latter stage of the question—namely, upon the proceeding which led up to the private compact, the right hon. Baronet was somewhat less definite than in the earlier part of his observations. Undoubtedly, the limit fixed upon did work some harshness in individual cases. The case of Drogheda was an exceedingly hard one, when compared with the extraordinary treatment dealt out to the borough of Warwick, in England; because the population of Drogheda was 350 below the 15,000 limit, it was refused separate representation. Now, as a matter of fact, the 350 people could be found in one street in physical contact with the existing boundaries of the borough. Now, the Government had taken the borough of Warwick with its 11,800 inhabitants, and had added to it 7,000 more. Now, that was so bald and so indefensible a contrast that he had no doubt it would form the subject of prolonged debate at a later stage of the Bill. The cases of Limerick and of Sligo, with their 12,000 inhabitants each, were also hard cases. The three boroughs in Ireland which he had specified were boroughs of a class which had interests of their own—trading interests entirely distinct from the rural community. It was a very serious enterprise, he admitted, to set about taking the Members from communities in the counties, varying from the lowest, of the 34,000 in Longford, to the highest limit of 75,000 in Galway, and giving them to urban districts with 10,000 inhabitants. The enterprise might be justified in individual cases; but he should like to see these individual cases very fully proved. The right hon. Baronet Sir Charles W. Dilke was strictly accurate when he said that, generally speaking, the small towns in Ireland had no large material interests distinct from the agricultural interests, for the farmer depended upon the land, and the shopkeeper depended upon the farmer. Before he sat down, he thought it might be useful, especially in view of the tone of some speeches delivered by hon. Gentlemen sitting above the Gangway, to state that, whatever Party might receive benefit by the disfranchisement of the small boroughs in Ireland, it was certainly not the Party with which he was associated. There were three boroughs—for instance, Drogheda, Limerick, and Waterford—which would lose between them three Members, which Members might safely be counted upon as supporters of the Nationalist programme. The representation of 22 boroughs was to be discontinued, and of these 22 the Nationalists at present held eight, and there was no doubt that, under the new franchise, they would win Clonmel, Dundalk, Kinsale, Youghal, and others; in fact, out of the 22 seats disfranchised, the Nationalist Party were certain to have won 16. Though the hon. Members above the Gangway might not be satisfied with the arrangement of the borough representation in Ireland, it certainly could not be contended that the Nationalist Party had gained any advantage by the arrangement.

Mr. BIGGAR said, no doubt there were hard cases, and that hon. Members would like to put in a word in favour of particular constituencies with which they were on more or less good terms. If he had been drawing up the Bill, he should have drawn it up differently, and probably more favourably to his own side. He suggested, however, to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill (Sir Charles W. Dilke) that he should resist steadfastly any change in the limit of disfranchisement, because, if he did not, the practical result would be that they would not have done with the Bill until this day next year; if they commenced to make exceptions in one constituency and then in another, they would never have done, because the exceptions would commence in the North of Ireland and end in the South of England. There was not a single constituency in England, Ireland, or Scotland that would not claim some exceptional treatment. This was only the thin end of the wedge, and he impressed it upon the right hon. Gentleman, who understood Parliamentary tactics better than he (Mr. Biggar) did, that if he wished to get through his Bill in a reasonable time, he must put his foot down upon such Amendments as this.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

REDISTRIBUTION.

Boroughs.

Clause 2 (Boroughs named in First Schedule to become parts of counties or boroughs).

MR. MULHOLLAND said, he rose to move, as an Amendment, after the word "Act," in page 1, line 13, to insert the words—

"Except such boroughs in Ireland as shall hereafter by the provisions of this Act be grouped together, or grouped with other towns not at present represented, for the purpose of forming borough districts in Ireland."

The object of the Amendment was to suspend the disfranchisement of certain boroughs of Ireland until the Committee had had an opportunity of considering whether some scheme might not be introduced by which the borough representation of Ireland might be increased by adopting a system of grouping something like that which was carried out in Scotland. In the event of no scheme being afterwards adopted the Amendment would be inoperative, as it was proposed simply to suspend the scheme of disfranchisement, so that the Committee would not be in any way committed by adopting the Amendment if it should hereafter be thought fit to disapprove of the scheme now brought forward. He hoped to be able to persuade the Committee that some modification of the proposals contained in the Bill in reference to Ireland were really essentially required. The scheme of disfranchisement, in regard to the Irish boroughs, was carried out to such an extent that it appeared to be in the interests of both Parties that some Amendment should be introduced; and he was glad to perceive, from the tone of the speeches delivered, both last night and in the debate upon the Motion for the Speaker leaving the Chair, that that feeling was shared by both sides of the House. There seemed to be a general feeling of regret and alarm at the system of Irish borough representation proposed in the Bill. They had been told that this was inevitable, owing to certain broad lines having to be adopted in consequence, he supposed, of the agreement of the Leaders of the two Parties, who had already decided upon the fundamental principles of the Bill; but if it could be proved that the result of the application of those broad lines would lead to consequences that were really absurd and undesirable, surely it was not too late to remedy the evil which would positively arise from not considering the case of Ireland by itself. They were told there was a difficulty, because a compact had been entered into between the two Front Benches. His object at present was, if possible, to conciliate the two Front Benches, and therefore he would conclude that the agreement which had been made, and which was likely to lead to such consequences in Ireland, had been made in ignorance of the effect which the disfranchisement of the Irish boroughs would produce. He did not believe that there was any intention to do injustice to Ireland, or in a permanent settlement of so great a question to be guided only by views of temporary expediency, but as regarded the compact, it appeared to him that it was only a compact entered into between the two Front Benches themselves. A mutual agreement could be got rid of by another mutual agreement; and he thought that when they considered the position the Irish representation would be reduced to by this Bill, it would be felt that, even putting the interests of Ireland altogether aside, the interests of the United Kingdom required that both Parties should join in some arrangement by which a remedy could be provided. He might add that even if the two Front Benches were committed, individual Members of the House were not committed in any way, and he knew that there was a strong feeling on this subject in the minds of many individual Members on both sides of the House. But he did not wish to press that point, because he would rather that the question was settled by a general agreement. They all knew that in that House opinions did not always coincide. That would be an answer to the question of the difficulty that had arisen from the compact entered into upon this question; but there was a stronger one still—namely, that the remedy he proposed did not appear to him to be in any way outside the broad lines on which the Bill had been framed. On the contrary, he found a distinct precedent for it in the Bill itself. The Bill included arrangements with respect to other parts of the United Kingdom precisely analogous to that which he now proposed for the adoption of the Committee in the case of Ireland. Therefore, it seemed to him that there could be no difficulty whatever upon the score of inability to break through the broad lines on which the Bill had been framed. The right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon—Sir Stafford Northcote—stated last night upon that subject that it had been arranged last year that the Franchise Bill should be extended to Ireland; that the feeling of the House was against the exception of Ireland from the operation of the Franchise Bill, and, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman thought that the House was bound to apply to Ireland the same rules with respect of redistribution which had been determined upon in respect of England. But why that was to be so the right hon. Gentleman did not explain. He Mr. Malthus could see no reason whatever why the lines adopted in regard to England should be applied to Ireland if they could find a better analogy elsewhere. The effect of the present Bill was that in Ireland it led practically to the representation of one class and of one interest. The agricultural class in Ireland was so numerous that in any case that was inevitable. By no fair arrangement—and he asked for nothing that was not a fair arrangement—would it be possible to exclude the agricultural class in Ireland from a preponderating importance, but if it were possible to introduce a counterbalancing element, it would, he thought, be wise to do so. If it were possible in any way to alleviate it, it would be wise to do so. He complained that the present Bill went out of the plain path, not to alleviate this preponderance, and not to diminish it, but rather to exaggerate the anomaly and to increase the preponderance of this particular class. A year ago, when speaking in the debate upon the second reading of the Franchise Bill, he had stated that he felt there was great danger in the sudden enfranchisement of large masses in Ireland. There was no such danger in the case of England; but in Ireland the numbers proposed to be enfranchised exceeded the whole of the previous constituencies, and they would, therefore, have a complete monopoly of political power. He would say, further, that, from ignorance, or from want of educational advantages, from the fact of their poverty, because, according to the Census Returns, more than one-half of the new voters lived in houses represented to be cabins built of mud, there was great danger; and he hoped that when the provisions of the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill came to be disclosed, it would be found that there had been some attempt to guard against the danger likely to arise from such a state of things. In any country it would have been desirable, under such circumstances, to make some provision for the division of classes; but in Ireland it was more than ever necessary, because there was a distinct line which divided different pursuits and different industries, and the effect of this wholesale enfranchisement would be to place political power almost solely in the hands of the class who were intellectually inferior to the other class. His disappointment, therefore, was very great when he found, after the provisions of the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill had been disclosed, that not only had no such step been taken, but that the effect of the Bill would be greatly to increase the evil that would necessarily follow enfranchisement. It obliterated the distinction which naturally arose from the difference between a town and a county population. It was stated last night that there were now 36 boroughs in Ireland, and the Bill absolutely proposed to take 20 of them out of the list. Of the 16 that would remain eight were given to the three great towns, so that there would only be eight left to represent the mercantile, professional, and manufacturing interests of the whole of the rest of Ireland. He did not think any hon. Member would defend so sweeping a change in itself. Such a proposal, in fact, could not be defended upon its own merits; and the only defence which had been placed before the House was that it was inevitable owing to the application to Ireland of those broad lines which had been laid down in reference to England. The result was that 85 seats were to be given to the agricultural population in Ireland. He had not a word to say against the enfranchisement of the agricultural population of Ireland; but it must be evident to everyone that in the present state of Ireland, with its subdivision of farms, with its small holdings, and with its congested population, in many respects the agricultural classes, from their individual isolation, were more likely to be led astray by agitators than any other class of the people. There was also a special temptation that could be addressed to them as being connected with the soil, of the gift of the land to the occupiers, so often advocated in Ireland, and as being calculated to follow the guidance of those who promised them revolution and confiscation. Now, he would say that, in any case, the agricultural population of Ireland would require a representation, according to its numbers, of nearly three-fourths; but the present Bill proposed, instead of three-fourths, to give them seven-eighths, notwithstanding the fact that the urban population was one-fourth of the whole, and they all knew that the urban population was more thoroughly represented than the agricultural population, because the unit which conferred the seat was smaller than in the counties. They were told that the principle of the present Bill was to continue the representation of boroughs of 15,000 inhabitants, and to continue a second seat to boroughs of 50,000. That was what was done in England, and was really the principle of the Bill for urban constituencies. Representation was given to towns of 15,000 inhabitants; and seats, therefore, would be actually taken away from larger numbers in the counties than if they had been divided into equal electoral districts. The proposition of the Bill was not to divide the country into equal electoral districts, but to give a fair representation to urban interests; but what he complained of was that that would not be the case in Ireland, because the application of the principle was not suited to the conditions of the country. There had been a proposal to remedy this evil and anomaly by reducing the limit of population; but that proposal had been negatived, upon the ground that the 15,000 allowed was a hard-and-fast line which should not be transgressed or set aside. The proposal he now made was not open to that complaint, because he was quite willing to recognize the limit of 15,000; but he proposed to bring in the population of adjoining towns by grouping them together up to that point, in exactly the same way as was sanctioned by the Bill in the case of Scotland. There were a sufficient number of towns in Ireland to enable this to be done, and quite a sufficient urban population to continue her borough representation. The towns at present represented were not large enough to secure representation if the principles of the Bill were adopted upon the present plan of the Government scheme. The towns of Ireland were comparatively small, because in Ireland trade and manufactures were still in their infancy; but in Scotland trade and manufactures were once in the same undeveloped condition. His proposal, if adopted by the Committee, would enable the Irish boroughs to retain that limit of population which would fairly entitle them to representation, and it was simply carrying out in Ireland the same principle that was already applied to Scotland, and which had worked well. As he had said, it was proposed to be continued by the present Bill; but with regard to Ireland, the measure took away 20 Members from the present borough representation, the borough representation in Scotland being, on the contrary, actually increased by the Bill. He asked, then, why the analogy of England should be taken instead of that of Scotland? He confessed that he was unable to see any reason for it whatever. It was open for Her Majesty's Government to take whatever course they chose, and there was a precedent in the Bill itself for taking either the Scotch or the English system. The advantage of taking the Scotch system, in the case of Ireland, was, he contended, that it was adapted to the circumstances of Ireland, whereas the English system was not. Then what objection could there be? It was not yet too late to adopt the Scotch system of representation on this occasion. Surely there was no special reason why the Irish boroughs should be disfranchised, and he was afraid that the mistake committed by the Government arose from their not having looked fairly into the facts. The effect of adopting the propositions contained in the Bill would be that the urban population in Ireland, which amounted to between 100,000 and 500,000, would be absolutely disfranchised. In the case of the English towns, notwithstanding their absorption into the counties, they would still have considerable influence in the representation. In some cases he was told that it was very doubtful whether the urban influence would not actually predominate in the English counties over the rural element; but in Ireland there was no parallel whatever. The towns there were very small, and the agricultural population was very large, and the result would be that when the towns became absorbed in the counties they would have no voice in the representation at all. Nor would it be just, he thought, to disfranchise the artisans, the traders, and all those engaged in different occupations in the towns to this large extent, merely because the town population was scattered, and not concentrated as it was in England, and only reached the arbitrary limit in a very few instances. He did not think that any hon. Member would say that that was either fair or just, nor could it be politic, putting aside mere Party considerations. He did not propose to allude to what was likely to be the result. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) told them last night that the Members returned would in all probability be Nationalists; and that would be so, no doubt, when the urban population found itself swamped by the agricultural element; but the town population was less likely to be influenced by the views of agitators than the rural population, as they had more intercourse with the world, and better opportunities for discussion among themselves. They had also a greater variety of interests at stake, and there was more chance that they would be persons of education and intelligence. By the Franchise Bill they were handing over power to the Democracy. Was it wise, then, to exclude from representation that portion of the Democracy which was likely to be the most intelligent? There were many towns in Ireland in which the intelligence of the people was very high.

[Third Night.]

There were seaport towns of considerable size, and inland towns also, and in all of them there was a highly intelligent population who would rise above the dead level which was likely to prevail if the constituency was to be all of one class. The right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) told them that, in his opinion, the interest of the towns of Ireland was so identical with that of the country, and that the trades of the towns were so much connected with the agricultural pursuits of the rest of the population, that he did not believe there would be any great divergence of opinion between the two, and that men chosen to represent the counties might be fairly assumed to represent the towns also. He admitted that that might be so in many instances, and that there were many towns in Ireland where the opinions of the farmers would have great influence upon the minds of the other sections of the population; but there were other towns to which that remark did not apply—for instance, there were the seaport towns such as Coleraine, Carrickfergus, and others, which had trade with other countries and which were not in any way dependent upon the farmers. Then, again, there were manufacturing towns in the North of Ireland which were comparatively large, and were certainly growing—such as Lisburn, Ballymena, Portadown, Newtonards, and Armagh. Those towns had no special farming interests, but they possessed industries of their own, and industries which, in his opinion, ought to be fairly considered and duly represented. The manufacturing towns he had just referred to were, no doubt, not so large as those which were to be found in the manufacturing districts of England, and were not relatively of such importance. That arose from the fact that power-loom weaving was supposed, for a long time, to be unsuited to the manufacture of linen. That industry was, therefore, for a long time carried on by farm labourers and others engaged in agricultural pursuits, and had the effect of increasing the rural population without concentrating the industry in towns. It was only within the last 20 years that the improvements in power-loom weaving had led to the manufacture of linen cloth in factories instead of the cottages of the people, and it was only since that time that the rapid growth of the towns had brought them into importance. There was not the slightest doubt that that growth would still go on; and the manufacturing towns in the North of Ireland even now contained an intelligent, well-educated, and industrious artizan class, who were well deserving of representation. For these reasons he asked the Committee to affirm the principle of the Amendment he had placed upon the Paper. With respect to details as to how far the principle should be carried out, he was, of course, in the hands of the Committee. He did not ask that all the borough Members and all the borough seats should be retained which Ireland now possessed, although it had been pointed out last night that a precedent for that demand could be found in the Act of Union. He had not the slightest doubt, however, that at least eight or nine borough seats might be retained and brought well above the limit of 15,000 population by grouping more than one town together. It was suggested, last night, by some hon. Members below the Gangway, that two groups might be formed combining manufacturing towns—such as Lisburn, in the one case, and seaports, such as Carrickfergus, in the other. He should be glad to see that system adopted, but he did not think that it would be desirable to limit the representation to two groups of that kind. There were over 50 towns in Ireland with a population of more than 3,000. Among them were the important seaport towns and the important manufacturing towns he had named, which averaged about 10,000 each. Indeed, there were several above 10,000 and none below. Those boroughs could easily be formed into groups by combining them with neighbouring towns, and would, in every respect, represent a variety of interests, as well as an amount of intelligence on the part of the inhabitants, which would compare favourably with the groups now being continued in Scotland by the present Bill. As for the seats which would have to be provided being obtained from the counties, he maintained that many of the counties at the present moment were over-represented. The right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) said, last night, that it would be dangerous to open that question, because it would be found that the Irish counties were in many cases over-represented as compared with the Scotch counties. But that was exactly the position Mr. Mulholland took, and was the point he wished to impress upon the Committee. In Scotland the representation was allotted between the counties and the towns in such proportion that the towns got more than their fair share; and if they adopted the same system in Ireland, it would follow that the county representation must be diminished. He need only point to the case of Mid Lothian, and compare it with Fermanagh. Fermanagh, with a very small population, enjoyed two Members, whereas Mid Lothian, with a much larger population, had only one. Why should that anomaly exist? Why should Fermanagh have more representation than Mid Lothian? He thought that by far the best plan, in both cases, would be to divide the representation fairly between the towns and the country. There was this peculiarity with regard to Ireland that in giving to the counties they gave to those who were more than adequately represented, and in taking from the towns they took away from those who were not represented as they ought to be. He had only alluded to Scotland, in the course of his argument, because the arguments raised last night had been confined to Scotland; but they had also heard of the grouping of Pembroke and Haverfordwest and of Warwick and Leamington. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy Mr. Trevelyan, in his speech upon the Question that the Speaker should leave the Chair, said that he could give a satisfactory explanation of those cases, but the right hon. Gentleman forgot to do so. No explanation, however, could be given, and no case could be made out for the grouping of those boroughs, that would not apply, with still greater force, to many of the towns in Ireland. He now left the question with confidence in the hands of the Committee. If they affirmed the principle of his Amendment, he would at once put down the details of his proposal. He hoped that, in deciding upon what might effect a permanent distribution of political power in Ireland, Her Majesty's Government would take a broad view of the question. It was a most important subject, and the most important part of it was the decision as to what would be a permanent settlement, and he feared that in any case the settlement would contain the germ of much future trouble; but if Ireland and England were to have their representation finally settled, he maintained that the present proposal was the only one by which they could hope to mitigate the evils of which he complained. He begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name upon the Paper.

Amendment proposed.

In page 1, line 13, after the word "Act," to insert the words "except such boroughs in Ireland as shall hereafter by the provisions of this Act be grouped together, or grouped with other towns not at present represented, for the purpose of forming borough districts in Ireland."—(Mr. Mulholland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that it would be perhaps right, before coming to an examination of the remarks of the hon. Member, that he should state the intentions of the Government, and the general principle upon which they were proceeding in this matter. They distinctly thought that the extension of the principle of grouping was generally undesirable. That remark applied to the whole of the United Kingdom; and when the hon. Member pointed out that grouping existed in Wales and Scotland, he must say the Government felt that it would be more desirable to limit than to extend the principle, and if there were any question of making a large alteration in the existing state of things it would be in a contrary direction. They did not think, on the whole, that the results of grouping in Wales and Scotland had been so good as to make it desirable to extend the system either in England or Ireland. No doubt, they had shown a certain amount of tenderness to the existing state of things in Wales and Scotland, though it was open to the Committee to consider the principle on which that grouping rested. At the same time, they had made up their minds to resist any proposal for an extension of the principle. In their opinion it would be impracticable to carry out any system of grouping in Ireland. The hon. Gentleman had left his details very wisely and prudently for a later stage of the Committee, and he asked the Committee to affirm in general terms the principle without entering into the details. The hon. Gentleman, however, had thrown out certain suggestions which showed what was influencing his own mind. He did not want to say anything that might be disagreeable to Members who represented any of the small boroughs; but he thought the Committee generally would be inclined to go with him as far as this—namely, to admit that the towns which it would be necessary to group together in Ireland had not always a community of political views and interests such as would induce them to lead afterwards a very happy life. He was bound to say, after looking carefully into the question of grouping in Ireland, and bearing in mind what towns it would be necessary to join together, that it would be like the grouping of domestic animals of a kind not generally supposed to live happily together. The hon. Gentleman had suggested that towns of 3,000 inhabitants might be grouped.

[Third Night.]

MR. MULHOLLAND said, he had not made that suggestion. He had mentioned that there were 50 towns of over 3,000 inhabitants in Ireland.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Then the hon. Member had not committed himself to the suggestion that all towns in Ireland of over 3,000 inhabitants should be grouped for the purposes of borough representation.

MR. MULHOLLAND said, he had not spoken of the towns with more than 3,000 inhabitants with reference to grouping at all, but simply to show the extent of the urban population.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE thought in that case he was entitled to complain that the hon. Member was extremely vague, as he had given no indication of the kind of towns he would propose to group. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had supposed that the figure "3,000" meant something, because the borough represented by the hon. Member himself (Downpatrick) was a borough of between 3,000 and 4,000 inhabitants, and he had assumed that the object of the hon. Member was to save towns of that size. The hon. Member had spoken in general terms of the smaller boroughs in the North of Ireland as increasing in population; but he found that the hon.

Member's own borough was falling off in population, and had been doing so for some time. It was not the case that, as a general rule, these boroughs were increasing in population. Some were increasing and some were falling off, and the borough represented by the hon. Member was a case of falling off. Then the hon. Member had said that the urban population was likely to be more intelligent than the rural population; but he would be disposed himself to contest the general truth of that assertion, for there were parts of the country—certainly in Great Britain—in which the rural population was at the least as intelligent as the urban population. From what he knew of the miners of Durham and Northumberland, and of the shepherds in the agricultural districts of the Eastern and Lowland parts of Scotland, they would certainly support his assertion that the rural population were quite as intelligent as the urban population. He knew less of Ireland, but his impression was that the agricultural population there was quite as intelligent as the population of the smaller towns. The hon. Member was also discreetly vague as to the sources from which he would draw the Members for the grouping of the boroughs. He had said that eight or nine county seats would be available for the purpose, and might readily be obtained; but the hon. Member had not given the slightest indication of the two-Membered constituencies from which he would take them. The hon. Gentleman must remember that when he came to details he would meet with very considerable opposition from his own Friends in the Conservative Party, because they would be forced to reconsider the case of the smaller English counties, such as Huntingdon and Rutland, if any steps were taken to reduce the representation of the Irish counties. For all of these reasons he thought the Committee would be very much indisposed to accept the proposal of the hon. Member, to which he must certainly himself offer the most decided opposition.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he certainly admired the self-control and commanding confidence with which the hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) had submitted his proposal to the Committee. The hon. Gentleman had placed it before the Committee in a most seductive manner, almost after the model of Joseph Surface, for he calmly asked the Committee to agree to the principles of his Amendment, and he would condescend to oblige them with the details at some future time. In point of fact, it was put before the Committee, as a simple matter of form, to accept the principle laid down by the hon. Gentleman. The course pursued by the hon. Gentleman reminded him of a somewhat impetuous tradesman in an Irish town, who confidentially asked the assistance of a friend in the shape of his signature to a bill, and consoled him with the assurance that it was a mere matter of form. That assurance, however, was not borne out when at the end of three months it became necessary that the bill should be met. What was the proposition now made by the hon. Gentleman? He (Mr. O'Connor) was gratified at the firm attitude the Government had taken in regard to the proposal, for they must have known, after what occurred last night, that they must expect no assistance whatever from the Conservative Party on that side of the House, either in the shape of Leaders or followers, towards adhering to the compact which had been made by the Leaders on both sides in reference to the present Bill. They had had a speech last night in which a picturesque and expressive phrase was used about passing the "hard word," and it was said that the Leader of the Opposition had passed the "hard word" to his followers that while he himself would abide by the agreement he had entered into on behalf of his Party, other Members would be at liberty to vote as they pleased with regard to the Amendment of the noble Viscount the Member for Fermanagh. Viscount Crichton ("No.")

An hon. Member. Well, at any rate, they did vote as they pleased.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR remarked that certainly the Irish Members of the Conservative Party persisted in taking a division, although their Leader went into the opposite lobby. A nod, however, was as good as a wink to a blind horse, and hon. Gentleman on the Opposition Benches knew very well that they were at perfect liberty, so far as their Leaders were concerned, to do all in their power to violate the compact to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote, was a party. He (Mr. O'Connor) was, therefore, glad that Her Majesty's Government had taken a firm attitude in regard to the insidious proposal which now came from that side of the House, because they must be perfectly convinced that they would get no assistance from the Heads of the Tory Party. The hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) had laid down the proposition that the urban population was necessarily more intelligent than the rural population. Certainly that was not the case in Ireland. The rural population in Ireland was perfectly conversant with the bearings of all the political questions brought before them, and for the excellent reason that they had had the best task-masters in the world, in the shape of the arbitrary and oppressive coercion they had had to endure from the Party of which the hon. Gentleman was a distinguished Member. There was not a peasant dwelling in his mud cabin who was not a reproach to the Loyal minority, and who had not been driven into the arms of the Nationalist majority by the systematic oppression he had undergone. There could be no doubt that the occupier of the smallest mud hovel in Ireland was perfectly clear as to which side his own interests would lead him in any contest in which he was called upon to take part. The hon. Member said there was no community of interests between the borough and the agricultural population of Ireland. As a matter of fact, there was practically only one interest in Ireland, and it was the agricultural interest. "No." He would repeat that, generally speaking, there was no interest in Ireland except the agricultural interest. Perhaps there might be one exception, and he would deal with that exception presently; but, in the first place, he would remind the Committee that the exception proved the rule. Everybody knew that the prosperity of the towns entirely depended on the prosperity of the agricultural community. Every shopkeeper in Ireland knew very well that one of the main causes of the bankruptcy of agriculture in Ireland was that the hon. Member and the Party to which he belonged had done their best to drive their tenantry into the Bankruptcy Court. There was a perfect community of interest between the small boroughs and

the agricultural inhabitants around, and that was one of the causes why some of the small boroughs were growing in prosperity. He would take one of the cases mentioned by the hon. Member—that of Ballymena. He knew something of Ballymena. Ballymena had largely diminished in prosperity so far as its manufacturing interests were concerned, but it had largely increased in prosperity because it was the market town, and the people of Ballymena would before long know that their interests were not to be served by that Party which had impeded the progress of agriculture by bad Land Laws. The hon. Member said there was only one interest among the rural population, and he (Mr. O'Connor) had been glad to hear that statement. The rural population consisted partly of labourers and partly of farmers, and he was glad to find the hon. Member acknowledging that their interests were identical. No doubt they were identical, although wicked attempts had been made, in more quarters than one, to convince the labourers and the farmers that their interests were not identical. As the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had clearly pointed out, the hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) had taken very good care not to enter into detail. There was no plan the hon. Member could propose which would not group the boroughs at the expense of the county population. It would be impossible to group boroughs which did not contain within themselves the most discordant elements, and even grouping would not help the Party to which the hon. Gentleman belonged. The hon. Gentleman said that if the Bill passed in its present shape, no interest but the agricultural interest would be represented; but he (Mr. O'Connor) had pointed out that there was only one great interest in Ireland, and it was the agricultural interest. If there were any manufacturing interest, it was still in the infancy of its development; if there were any commercial interest, it had already decayed, or had still to grow. The only towns in Ireland in which there was any mercantile interest were already sufficiently represented—namely, Dublin, Belfast, Waterford, Limerick, Galway, and Cork. All of those towns were adequately represented already, and to take the boroughs and group them with villages that were entirely dependent upon an agricultural population would not help the boroughs. The hon. Gentleman said that there would be no Representative for what he called the commercial and trading interests of the country. What were the professional interests outside Dublin, Belfast, and the other large towns? Did the hon. Member not know that every barrister in Ireland, practically speaking, had to live in Dublin, and that all the professional interests were centred in that City, and would receive adequate representation by the four Members which the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill proposed to give to the City of Dublin. There were a few solicitors scattered over Ireland, and a few doctors; but he did not think that the whole of them put together would make up one street of a ward in any borough constituency. Yet these were the professional interests which the hon. Gentleman asserted to be inadequately represented under the Bill. The trading and commercial interests, where they existed, were already adequately represented by the seats given to the large towns, and if trading or commercial interests existed elsewhere, they would still be represented. The hon. Gentleman had let the cat out of the bag in his closing observations. The hon. Member had spoken with alarm, either real or affected, of the evils the redistribution of seats would produce in Ireland. The only persons who had any cause to feel alarmed were persons who had hitherto been robbing the people, and who would not be permitted to rob them any longer of their natural rights and interests. What was wanted was the creation of an artificial power by which the masses of the Irish people would be able, in the future, to emancipate themselves from the thralldom of landlord coercion.

DR LYONS said, he must confess that he sympathized very much with the boroughs which were to be extinguished, and he believed that in the future of Ireland it would be found that the disfranchisement of those boroughs would be very much to the detriment of the country. He could not help remarking the large interests which were represented by those boroughs. Many of the boroughs themselves were of very ancient date, and they had filled a very honourable position in the history of Ireland. Many of them were situated in the North of Ireland, and although he was not particularly familiar with them he strongly sympathized with them on this occasion. There were also boroughs in the South of Ireland which had been connected with very important interests in the past, and which, if Ireland was ever to undergo that large development which he, for one ventured to hope for it, must again become places of great importance, and of considerable trade. He alluded specially to boroughs circumstanced like those of Kinsale and Youghal. Anyone who had studied the visible condition of Ireland and the relations of that country to the sea, and who looked forward to the development of her fisheries, which ought to be one of the great resources of her national wealth, must see how, in the future, important questions would arise in connection with the development of the fisheries, in which it was exceedingly desirable that those boroughs and all the interests connected with them should be duly represented in that House. He trusted that the investigation of the Select Committee appointed last night, at the instance of his hon. Friend the Member for South Warwickshire—Sir Evelyn Walter—would be the means of opening up a new field for the development of the resources of Ireland, and that hereafter there would be very large interests called into existence in connection with the fisheries off the coast of Ireland, acknowledged, as they were, to be a mine of untold wealth, which had never yet been worked at all in the way in which the fisheries of America and of other countries were being worked at the present day. He hoped to see the examples which had been set followed up in Ireland, for it was notorious that there was an extraordinary amount of fish upon the coast, which required but a small exercise of the intelligence, science, and knowledge of the present day to supply the markets of this country. It could not be supposed that a rural population, and the Representatives of rural populations, having enormous difficulties to contend with, of which every man must be fully conscious, could by any possibility devote that attention to the sea interests of Ireland which would be devoted to those interests by the Representative of a borough such as Kinsale or Youghal. He believed that some increase of political power should be given to the important districts included within the great county of Cork. While, therefore, he certainly would not consent to any diminution of the political power which it was proposed, by the present Bill, to give that great county, he desired to say that a more natural distribution of the power, so as to take in and include all the interests concerned—the interests of the sea, as well as those of the land, and the development of both, ought to progress pari passu, in equal steps, in order to secure the full development of the country. He did not see that there need be any great delay or any insuperable difficulties in adjusting a scheme by which the maritime boroughs around the coast of Ireland might be brought into a system of equal-handed justice all round, to every interest concerned, without sacrificing a particle of the political power it was proposed to distribute throughout the country generally. Without any such sacrifice he felt convinced that the representation of Ireland might be dealt with in a more equitable manner than it was now proposed to be dealt with under the present Bill. Looking forward, as he did, with the greatest hope and confidence to the development of the many interests connected with Ireland, he was bound to admit that he felt very strongly indeed that some effort should be made, even at a little additional sacrifice, to do justice to the boroughs which were situated on the seacoast. There was a great deal to be said for them, and for the advantage they were likely hereafter to confer upon the productive industry of Ireland. He wished to see some plan devised—and he believed that it was perfectly feasible—for giving adequate representation to the important districts in which these industries were centred—industries which must be developed in order to give to Ireland that general prosperity which she was fairly entitled to.

MR. JOHN MCCONNOR said, that he had been very much instructed by the manner in which the discussion had proceeded, not only in reference to the Amendment now before the Committee, but on previous Amendments. They had seen hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House rising to propose Amendment after Amendment calculated to increase or retain their interests in the representation of Ireland; but, judging from the manner in which the proposal for proportional representation was received by the Committee, and judging by the attitude taken up by the Government on the matter now before the Committee, he could not help thinking that these Gentlemen were like drowning men grasping at straws in the political sea. Those best acquainted with the circumstances of Ireland knew that the proposal now made for the grouping of Irish towns for Parliamentary purposes was a proposal which, in the present circumstances of Ireland, was utterly incapable of being carried out. Absence of proximity, in the first instance, would destroy the prospect of carrying out any feasible plan of grouping together the towns or seaports of Ireland. Take the case of Kinsale. It would be necessary to travel 50 miles along the coast before there could be found another community similar to Kinsale, with interests identical and feelings in common with those of Kinsale. Therefore it would be necessary to group Kinsale with other towns that would have no community of interest with it as a seaport town. The inhabitants of these seaport towns did not represent any mercantile or industrial interests; but they represented the people from whom they purchased the commodities they exported to other countries. Therefore the interests of the inhabitants of these towns was indestructibly bound up with the interests of the agricultural community, and those who fairly represented the agricultural interest of Ireland would represent also the interest of the towns. Of course, there might be a few towns in the North of Ireland where there were industrial interests; but he would ask whether a principle was to be destroyed in order to oblige those who would represent these few small towns? Was a further distribution of seats to be carried out in order to satisfy the demands of those who, as he had said, were grasping at straws in the political sea? They had heard from the hon. Member who had just spoken (Dr. Lyons) something about Kinsale and Youghal. Well, he (Mr. O'Connor) had a personal knowledge of those two towns; and he would say, without fear of contradiction, that those who were most interested in these towns had no desire for the separate independent representation the hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) was contending for. The best men of those localities were quite satisfied that they should be obliterated once for all, and identified with the common interest of the country—the agricultural interest. There was no desire whatever to preserve these boroughs as pet places to be represented by Gentlemen who would have no prospect of being returned by the majority of their fellow-countrymen. They had heard from the hon. Member who proposed the Amendment a good deal about the anomalous state of things the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill, as now proposed, was likely to create. With all respect to the hon. Member, the anomaly had been in the past, and the present Bill was only designed for the purpose of destroying that anomaly. The anomaly that existed was the anomaly of seeing Gentlemen like the hon. Member himself returned to represent only a class, and having no interest in common with the people, and no sympathy with them, but, on the contrary, doing all in their power to mar the prospects and destroy the interests of the majority of their countrymen. That anomalous state of things was about to be ended. The hon. Member talked about a revolution that was about to take place in Ireland, and said that the people of Ireland had entrusted their welfare to those who promised them revolution; but he could hardly think it would be regretted—on the contrary, the result would be gladly accepted—if this Bill revolutionized that Party from off the face of the country. They had, in the past, been false to the best interests of Ireland; they had received notice to quit from the Irish people; and if they had now to depart, all he could say was, so be it; for their existence in the position they now occupied was a simple anachronism.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he had listened with attention to the speech of the hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland); and he must say that, if the principle of grouping were to be adopted, the hon. Member had laid before the Committee an absolutely unanswerable case for the adoption of that system in Ireland. There was no part of the United Kingdom in regard to which were for the grouping of small boroughs could be as strongly made out as in the North of Ireland, but he rejoiced, with all his heart, that the principle of grouping had been denounced by Her Majesty's Government, and that they had now, once and for ever, condemned the existence of that system. He extremely regretted that it was not taken for any part of the Bill, but he was glad to feel that his right hon. friend the charge of the Bill had clearly conveyed to the mind of Parliament that the system of grouping boroughs was a system which was certainly not to be extended and in the next Conservative or Liberal Reform Bill it would probably be abandoned altogether. He was extremely glad that such a declaration had been made. His hon. friends opposite did not appear to have recognised, or to have been grateful for, what their leaders had done for them. Their leaders had consented to establish in the United Kingdom a system of electoral districts which was absolutely a new departure from the electoral system hitherto adopted in the United Kingdom. But again, the acceptance of the system of electoral districts the whole plan of grouping boroughs must not necessarily be abandoned. It could not be rejected. It was a new system, and it had to be accepted. He was glad that it was accepted, and he could only always regard it as one of the greatest possible evils in the system of representation. One of his hon. friends always used to say, "I am not sure that it was precisely the concern of the House of Commons to consider the question of the electoral system, but it was a question which they ought to be allowed to deal with." His hon. friend the Member for Salford had now embarked on a system which accepted that principle, and which proposed to continue the system and modify it in the manner which he proposed.

Sir HERVEY BRUCE said, he thought the Member who suggested the matter was a very good friend of the Bill, and he was sure that the hon. Member for Salford, Mr. Arnold, was exactly the man who ought to be associated with the hon. Member for the County of Warwick, who was himself a Member of the Government, who proposed to support last night. He, Sir Hervey Bruce, was entirely at a loss to understand the principles on which the Government had framed this Bill, and if they were to give weight to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, Sir Charles W. Dilke, he thought they ought to have been with them on their side, instead of against them. One of the right hon. Gentlemen's main arguments last night against the proposition of the hon. Member for Salford, Mr. Arnold, was that he did not wish to interrupt the proportion which now existed between the county and borough representation, but that he wished them to be as nearly equal as it was possible to make them. But the position which the Bill left Ireland in, Sir Hervey Bruce was right, and he thought he was, was that for the counties there was to be one Member for every 4,000 inhabitants, and for the boroughs, including the towns of 3,000 inhabitants, to which his hon. Friend the Member for Downpatrick, Mr. Mulholland, had referred, there would be one Member only for 80,000.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE explained that he had not meant the English boroughs in that sense, but he had only meant them as portions of Parliamentary constituencies. There were many boroughs and urban districts in England possessing a population of more than 3,000, which would supply some part of a county district.

Sir HERVEY BRUCE said, he would give the right hon. Gentleman the advantage of that correction; but it would be found that in the Irish counties each Member would represent about 10,000 persons, whereas the borough Members, including all the towns and urban population, would represent one Member for something like 75,000 persons. Colonel NEAVE: In Ireland? Yes, in Ireland. He was not quite sure of the exact number, but it would be more than 75,000. The right hon. Gentleman said he did not like to interfere with the counties or with the boroughs, nor would he consent to group the towns together, or take Members from the counties. But, nevertheless, what was it that they saw in England? In this country this much abused system of grouping had in reality been increased, and Warwick was now to be joined with the town of Leamington.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE pointed out that Warwick was represented already, and it was only the creation of an extended constituency. The districts were conterminous.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked upon what grounds the right hon. Gentleman made that assertion? Was he acquainted with Warwick and Leamington?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked if the right hon. Gentleman was intimately acquainted with, and knew the road between them?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, that certainly, if the principle adopted in the case of Leamington and Warwick was not to be regarded as grouping, he did not know what grouping meant. As a matter of fact, it was the grouping together of an existing borough and an unrepresented town, which had never been represented before; so that it was carrying the principle of grouping to an extent to which it had never been carried before. The right hon. Gentleman objected to the proposal on the ground that it would involve the taking away of some of the county Members. The Bill, however, did that already. It took away a Member from the county of Carlow, and in England it took away a Member from the county of Rutland. If they were asking for anything that was not contained in the four corners of the Bill the right hon. Gentleman might say that they were unreasonable; but they were not asking for one single thing that was not contained in the provisions of the Bill. All that they asked was for justice to the urban population of Ireland, which was certainly deprived of justice by the provisions of the Bill now in charge of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman said he did not know a great deal about Ireland; but he had acquired his information from some source which he had not named. The right hon. Gentleman was continually saying, "I have heard so and so." That observation was frequently repeated in the discussion of the Amendment of the noble Viscount the Member for Fermanagh Viscount Crichton. Now, the Committee were not informed what that authority was; but, at any rate, the information was not acquired from the right hon. Gentleman's personal experience, but from some unknown informant. The right hon. Gentleman told them that the connection between the urban and rural population of Ireland was so close and intimate that, as a matter of fact, they represented one interest. Certainly there was a connection, as there always must be, between a buyer and seller; but there was no real community of interest between the city and borough Representatives and the agricultural districts. All the objections taken by the right hon. Gentleman applied to proposals which would be found contained in the Bill itself; and, therefore, he thought they were fairly entitled to press this Amendment upon the Government. As to the arrangement which had been made between the Government and the Leaders of the Opposition, they were in ignorance of what it was. They had heard something about it; but if this Bill was the outcome of it, all he could say was that it was a most unfortunate arrangement for the county in which he lived. That was all he would say. Complaint was made by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) last night that, at a mysterious conference which was said to have taken place, the Nationalist Party had not been represented. Well, he (Sir Hervey Bruce) did not know whether they were represented in the flesh or not; but there must have been some invisible good angel who watched over their interests. Certainly the Province of Leinster was abundantly taken care of. In that Province a Representative was proposed to be given for every 43,000 inhabitants, while Ulster would only have one for every 55,000 inhabitants. It would have been well for Ulster if a similar invisible angel had been present to watch over their interests in the same way as the interests of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) and his friends had been served. One word as to the representation of the county to which he belonged. He regretted that it had not received more careful consideration from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker). What was the condition in which the Bill would leave the county of Londonderry? It would only have one Representative for every 64,000 inhabitants, while the neighbouring county of Donegal would have its representation increased, and would receive a Representative for every 57,000 inhabitants. Let them go a little further away. It was an extraordinary anomaly that the

Province of Leinster should have been so carefully looked after. He found that in the county of Louth there would be one Member for every 20,000 inhabitants. It was unnecessary to enter into the extraordinary discrepancy which these figures displayed, so extraordinary, that in one county there would be a Representative for every 14,000 inhabitants, while in another county there would be a Member for every 20,000 inhabitants. There were many other counties in the same position, but he would not weary the Committee by enumerating the figures. Tipperary was a case in question, although not such an extraordinary case as Louth, and the representation would also be in an anomalous position in King's County, Longford, Westmeath, and Wicklow. In each of these cases there would be an excessive representation over that of Londonderry. He did not know that he had much more to say after the very able and exhaustive speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Downpatrick, Mr. Mithelland. His hon. Friend had clearly shown, and his noble Friend the Member for Fermanagh, Viscount Clifden, had also shown, that what they asked for was a simple act of justice to the urban constituencies of Ireland. It had also been clearly shown, and he detected any Member of Her Majesty's Government to gainsay it, that, in making this proposal, they were not departing from the four quarters of the Bill. Every anomaly, as the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill chose to call it, for which they asked was down in the Bill itself. Everything for which they made a demand, in the name of right and justice for the urban population of Ireland, was provided for in the Bill, and the changes which were introduced into the measure, to say the least of it, were of a somewhat extraordinary nature. He had great pleasure in joining with his hon. Friend in submitting this proposal to the Committee.

MR. SHAW LEEFVRE said, he thought the Committee would be of opinion that the hon. Member for Coleraine, Sir Hervey Blake, had scarcely justified the attack he had made at the commencement of his speech upon the hon. Member for Salford, Mr. Arnold, because, although the hon. Member spoke of the Party having been abandoned by their Leaders, it must be borne in mind that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), who led the Conservative Party in that House, after having made a speech in favour of the Government, went into the Lobby without being followed by a single Member of the Tory Party. It should be borne in mind that the system proposed by the Bill of single Member districts was a substitute for the system of grouping which the Government, after careful consideration, had condemned, although they were not prepared to do away with it altogether. It certainly was unpopular both in Scotland and Wales, and was a system which certainly ought not to be extended. He therefore hoped that the Committee would not adopt the Amendment. What was the main argument at the root of the proposal of the hon. Member for Downpatrick, Mr. Mithelland? It was that the small boroughs would be practically swamped by the rural districts. He did not agree with the hon. Member that that would really be the case. His own impression was that many of these boroughs instead of being swamped by the Parliamentary Elections Redistribution Bill, would become the centres of county districts in which they would exercise a very important influence. Take the county of Louth. It possessed a population of 78,000 inhabitants, and it would be divided into two districts, in each of which there would be what was now a borough forming the centre—namely, Drogheda and Dundalk—one with 14,000 inhabitants and the other with 11,000. He was satisfied that in the future these two urban populations, being the centres of the new rural electoral districts, would exercise the most important influence in the selection of Members. He therefore could not agree that in future these small boroughs would be to any serious extent swamped. The hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mithelland) stated that the voters in the rural districts would be less intelligent than the voters in the small boroughs. He, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, was disposed to question that assertion, and he very much doubted whether it was the case, especially in all parts in the rural districts of Ireland. From what he knew of the rural population of Ireland he would undertake to say that the small farmers in many parts of the country, possessing farms of from 10 to 20 acres, were, as a rule, more intelligent than the labouring people in the small boroughs. On the whole, he thought the Committee would do well to reject the Amendment, and to stand by the proposals contained in the Bill.

MR. BERESFORD, as one of the Members whose constituency was deeply affected by the Bill, desired to say a few words on behalf of the borough he had the honour to represent (Armagh). The President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), in his speech last night, alluded specially to the City of Armagh; but he seemed altogether to have derived a wrong impression of that part of the country. The right hon. Gentleman included it with other rural districts, and seemed to infer that although it was a manufacturing centre it was supported only by the farmers and the traders of that locality. Now, he begged to differ from the right hon. Gentleman altogether. The City of Armagh was a city containing more than 10,000 inhabitants, and it was one of the most remarkable cities in the North, or, indeed, in any other part of Ireland. He believed that its history went back beyond that of any other town of Ireland, not excepting Limerick, of which hon. Members below the Gangway had made so much. There seemed to be an impression on the part of the Committee that the city he had the honour to represent was only a small borough, with purely agricultural interests; but he could assure hon. Members that it was a most important manufacturing centre. After what the President of the Local Government Board had stated last night in regard to this city, he felt it his duty to assure the Committee that within a radius of less than a mile of the City of Armagh there were 14 mills at work, employing from 50 to 60, up to 200 to 300 persons in each. He did not think that a city in that position should be spoken of as a rural town, supported solely by farmers and traders who occupied the land there. Of course some few of the merchants had farms, as they had in other parts of the country. Many of them had small holdings—pleasure farms and such like, where they kept their cows; but beyond that they were principally, if not entirely, dependent on the manufacturing industry of the city. The Bill now before the Committee preserved the proportion of representation between the urban and the county constituencies in Great Britain; but it ignored that principle altogether in the case of Ireland. He wanted to know whether that was so? Why should there not be the grouping of boroughs in the manufacturing towns of the North of Ireland, just the same as in Scotland, and as was proposed to be carried out in the special case of Warwick and Leamington? Why should Warwick and Leamington be specially converted into a joint borough when the borough interests in the North of Ireland were entirely ignored and neglected? He could assure the Committee that the boroughs to which he alluded felt their position very acutely. They felt that they were being left in the lurch, and that their interests had not been considered by those who ought to have looked most particularly after them. The Bill, as it now stood, threw the whole representative power into the hands of the agricultural population, and entirely set aside the manufacturing population. Any man who had gone through Ireland and had seen the South, as compared with the North, would draw a very favourable comparison of the North as distinguished from the South. An hon. Member who spoke just now from below the Gangway seemed to take a Southern view altogether of the question; but hon. Members who knew Ireland well were well aware of the difference which existed between the two portions of the country. Indeed, it might almost be said there were two Irelands—the agricultural Ireland in the South, and the manufacturing Ireland in the North. He saw that almost every day of his life when he was engaged in travelling in Ireland. He very frequently went to the South, and what did he see? The South was a different country altogether, the houses were of a much poorer class, and there was not the same amount of cleanliness and thrift displayed as in the North. When he returned to Armagh he saw a totally different state of circumstances. In point of fact, throughout the North of Ireland, there was a vast improvement in the condition of the people; their homes and their social position were quite different from what they were in the South and West. Instead of disfranchising the manufacturing centres in the North of Ireland, he should have thought it would have been the duty of the Government, if possible, to enfranchise them more largely than had hitherto been the case. They fully deserved enfranchisement. It was there that capital was expended, and employment given, which was not the case in any part of the West or South of Ireland. No manufactures had held their ground out of the North. He would give an instance. He remembered some years ago, in the county of Lestrin, that an English Company came over and established smelting furnaces. The Company did well for some time, but one of the employers engaged in keeping up the furnaces allowed them to go down. He did not keep the heat up to its right pitch, and he was consequently reprimanded, and his wages stopped. By way of spiting the Company, he allowed the furnaces to go out altogether, and he was then summarily dismissed. Within a week afterwards the manager of the works—Mr Cox—was shot at his own bedside, whereupon the Company gave up the works and left the country. To this day these smelting furnaces might be seen there, falling into a heap of ruins. The same thing occurred in the West of Ireland at Longballan, in the county of Lestrin. Some iron-making works were established there and did very well, but when the Home Rule agitation was set on foot, pressure was put upon the Company to pay money advances which had been made to them, and the only alternative left them was to give up the undertaking and abandon the works. Let them compare that state of things with the manufacturing industries in the North of Ireland at Larnarn, Lurgan, Portadown, and Armagh. In all these places thousands of men were employed in manufacturing processes, and were doing well. Then, was it wise to disfranchise such districts and reduce them to the same condition as the populations in the South and West of Ireland? Was that the object with which the Bill had been introduced? If the Amendment which his hon. Friend the Member for Downpatrick, Mr. Mulholland, had moved went to a division, he should have the greatest pleasure in voting for it. He firmly believed that their best policy was to promote the general interests of the country, as well as to improve and develop those manufacturing industries in the North of Ireland, and not, as had been the case in regard to the South and West, to adopt a course of procedure which must result in getting rid of them altogether.

THE HON. NOLAN said, he could quite understand the gallant stand which was made by the Representatives of the small boroughs in the North of Ireland. Those boroughs were about to be disfranchised, and they naturally felt they should have their say. It in their criticism of the Bill hon. Members had gone a little too far, or if their statistics had been a little highly coloured, the Committee would be sure to have some consideration for them. He had no doubt, however, that some of the hon. Gentlemen would find one of the larger constituencies framed by the Bill prepared to return them. But the peculiarity about this movement was, that it was almost exclusively confined to the Northern districts of Ireland; it was the Northern Members who advanced all the arguments in favour of taking away a certain number of seats from the counties to give them to boroughs. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Armagh, Mr. Beresford, drew a very deplorable picture of the representation there would be under the Bill of the manufacturing districts of Ireland. No doubt Armagh was a very fine district; but he, Edward Nolan, really did not think its manufactures would suffer if instead of having one Member for 10,000 inhabitants, as at present, the 20,000 shared representation with 30,000 or 40,000 of the rural population around the city. He had heard it said that the town of Sligo had greatly progressed since it was deprived of Parliamentary representation. There had been less fighting between the two factions, and that had had a very salutary effect. He could not agree with the hon. Member for Armagh, Mr. Beresford, that if the six boroughs acted up to the Amendment lost their Members they would very probably lose their manufactures. But the boroughs did not lose their representation, they only lost their extra portion of representation, because they would get under the Bill their average representation. They would be part of a population of 10,000 who would vote for one Member. He denied that the manufactures of the North of Ireland would lose representation. Belfast, the great manufacturing town, had now only two Members; it was, however, to have four, a clear gain of two. The counties of Armagh and Antrim would return between them four Members, and in the return of those Representatives the manufacturing populations scattered up and down the counties must have a voice. It was well the Committee should examine the proposition of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland), and see if it was the outcome of any real grievance. The proposition of the hon. Gentleman was not that the boroughs should get a fair share of representation; it was not asked that boroughs in Ireland should be grouped together until the total population came up to 48,000 or 50,000; and that that population should be entitled to return one Member. If that were the proposition, there would be a good deal to be said in favour of it. But the supporters of this Amendment wanted to have a Member for every 15,000 or 20,000; it was not quite certain whether hon. Gentlemen would declare for 15,000 or 20,000 as the limit. It was pointed out last night that if they gave a seat to one place they would have to take it away from another. Why should the counties, such as Queen's County, King's County, and Westmeath, which had been divided into districts of 38,000 inhabitants each, lose a Member, in order that urban places in the North, with 15,000 or 20,000, should retain separate representation? He could not see that such a suggestion was at all fair. It had been often stated in the course of the debate that under the Bill towns would lose representation. As a matter of fact, he thought all the small country towns that had not got Members at present would be enormous gainers by the Bill. The small towns in his own part of the country, for instance, would be great gainers. At present there were only two Members for the county of Galway, and two for the county of Mayo; but under the Bill the two counties would return between them eight Members. The towns had great influence in the election of the Members at present; but when the number of the Representatives was doubled their influence would be enormously increased. There would not be more than one or two towns in each electoral division; but those towns would become the centres of all electoral movements, and, being the centres, they would have great power in the formation of the opinions of the country voters. There was no jealousy between town and country; but the people of the rural districts were willing to submit to the guidance of the shopkeepers, and the people they met in the markets. He should say that the influence of the small towns in the West of Ireland—in Galway and in Mayo—would be vastly increased; for it would in future bear so much more directly on the constituencies, inasmuch as they would be political centres, instead of being one of six or eight towns, as they were in the present constituencies. Therefore, for any town which did not now possess separate representation, he considered the Bill would be very useful and valuable. One great objection to acceding to the proposition of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) was that it was dangerous to make alterations in the Bill in face of the existence of the House of Lords. He was afraid that if the Commons made any great change in the Bill, and they sent it up to the House of Lords in June or July, when there might possibly be some great complication in the East, the House of Lords would send it back, containing other innovations; and then the House of Commons would either have to accept the Lords' innovations or sacrifice the whole work of the Session, and go back to the old constituencies. This was a Bill which had been agreed upon by the Leaders of the two great Parties in the House—by the Prime Minister, and by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote). Certainly, the Irish Members below the Gangway were not consulted in the settlement of the details; but they had been told by the hon. Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce) that there was an angel in the conference guarding their interests. They were, of course, much obliged to the hon. Gentleman for the intimation; but, after all, they would have preferred to have been represented in the flesh. However, the House was in the very strong position that they had the Leaders of the two Parties pledged to the Bill; and, therefore, it was impossible to introduce in the measure any important innovation. If the Amendment of the hon. Member for Downpatrick Mr. Mulholland were adopted, it was quite possible that the House of Lords would go further, and manipulate the Irish representation in such a way as would be positively injurious to the interests of the people. In what he had said he was supported by a very valuable precedent. Hon. Members knew that the House of Lords introduced in the last Reform Bill the principle of the three-cornered constituency, and they might attempt something of the kind on the present occasion if the House of Commons evinced any anxiety to disturb the settlement arrived at. If this proposition, however, was rejected, he did not think the House of Lords would make any great protest so far as Ireland was concerned. One argument was advanced by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Dublin, Dr. Lyons; and if he, Colonel Nolan, thought it was founded on fact it would have great weight with him. The hon. Gentleman, Dr. Lyons, said great injustice would be done if the representation of the fishery interest were extinguished, and he suggested the fishermen should be grouped together in a way that would preserve their representation. He (Colonel Nolan) thought it was important that the fishing community in Ireland should be represented; but that would not be secured by the adoption of the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Downpatrick.

Mr. Mulholland—indeed he thought that Amendment would do injury to the interests of the fishermen. "Oh, oh!" He saw the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Dublin, Dr. Lyons, dissent, but let them take, as examples, the constituency of the hon. Gentleman, and the constituency which he, Colonel Nolan, had the honour to represent. They were very different constituencies, but they were both very large, and very typical in relation to the fishery question. There were many fishermen in the county of Dublin, but they were at Kingstown; they were in the rural parts, and not in the towns. There were none in the City of Dublin. In his, Colonel Nolan's constituency there were many fishermen, indeed, he believed there were 5,000 registered fishermen in the county of Galway. These men, however, were scattered all over the county of Galway, and were not located in large numbers in any given place. He should think that at least half of them would, under the new franchise, have votes; and, therefore, they would be able to wield some influence in the division to which they were assigned. He should think that in future the Member for Kinsale might be regarded as a direct Representative of the interests of the fishing community, and two or three of the Denational Members would be very largely interested in fishery questions. That was to say, if they did not take up in the House a proper position on fishery questions, they would stand little chance if ever they appealed for a renewal of the confidence of the electors. Furthermore, two of the Members for Galway would necessarily be very largely interested in fishery matters. If they grouped these boroughs he did not know where they would find one borough, with the exception of Kinsale, which really represented the fishing interest. The real fact was that the fishermen of Ireland did not live in towns as the fishermen of England did; but they were scattered up and down the counties in little villages. In Galway they did not even live in villages, but on small detached farms, scattered over the whole coast. In the county of Down, also, it would be impossible to group the fishermen so that they would make up a good-sized constituency; but they were, nevertheless, numerous, and would have a very appreciable share in returning the Members for the county in the future. Wherever they went on the coast of Ireland they would find the same state of things, namely, that the fishermen lived outside the towns. He quite admitted that the case of Kinsale was an exceptional one. Fishermen either lived in large towns such as Belfast, Cork, and Galway, or in villages, or on detached farms along the coast. He did not think that the Bill would hurt the fishermen, but, on the contrary, be of immense advantage to them. In Galway, at present, he did not think there was on the Register one fisherman in four electors; and he had no doubt that the same would be found in other counties. In about 20 constituencies the fishing interest would, under the Bill, be very formidable indeed, and, therefore, any remodeling of the Bill in the direction of grouping boroughs together, so far from being favourable to the interests of fishermen, would, in his opinion, be hurtful. The Committee ought to be very chary of Amendments such as the present, because if they were to set the example of introducing innovations there was no knowing what the House of Lords would do with the Bill.

MR. EWART said, there was much force in the taunt of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) that the Ulster Conservative Members were deserted by their Leaders. The best thing those Members could wish was that their Leaders would continue to stay away that day, for if they were present at the division he had no doubt they would be found in the Lobby against the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland). If, in the conference which was held between the Heads of the two great Parties in the House, there was a good angel representing Ireland, he was sorry to say that that good angel had little regard for the welfare of the manufacturing districts of Ireland. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) made very little indeed of the manufacturing districts of Ireland; he spoke of the trading and manufacturing population as a mere nothing, and scarcely to be taken into account at all, contending that Ireland was solely an agricultural country. In the main, Ireland was an agricultural country; but it, nevertheless, had great trading and manufacturing interests. They had the well-known linen trade, in all its branches; they had cotton industries; shipbuilding; in fact, they had no end of trades prospering, some of them more or less, and others springing up. There was an adaptation in the North of Ireland for manufacturing which did not exist elsewhere; and his contention and that of his hon. Friends was, that the manufacturing interest was almost overruled by this Bill. There were to be four Members for Belfast, who might very fairly enough represent the manufacturing interests; there were to be four Members for Dublin, who might very fairly be taken as Representatives of the professional and other classes and of the trading interests; and there were to be several borough Members, who, it might be said, would represent the trading interests. So far as he could see, the manufacturing interests would only be directly represented by the four Members for Belfast. He might instance several manufacturing places which were altogether ignored by the Bill. There was Armagh, which they had heard from the hon. Member for that city (Mr. Beresford) contained within its district 14 mills; there was Ballymena, which was a very large centre of manufactures, containing something like 10,000 inhabitants; then there was Lisburn, one of the most ancient towns in Ireland connected with the linen trade, with 10,000 of a population; Lurgan, a town of 10,000 people, largely increasing and very prosperous; there was Portadown, than which no place was more prosperous; Coleraine was a large manufacturing place; there were Carrickfergus and Strabane. These were all manufacturing or trading places, not to speak of Omagh, Enniskillen, and Newry. He maintained that the Bill was doing a great injustice to those places. The interests of the manufacturing portions of Ireland had been sacrificed to the uniform rule of which the Committee had heard so much. The disfranchisement of all places with less than 15,000 people might be all very well for England; but it would work out extremely unfairly in Ireland. He completely sympathized with the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) in favour of the grouping of boroughs; and he was very sorry to hear the speech which the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke), who had charge of the Bill, made on the subject. His (Mr. Ewart's) opinion was that the grouping of boroughs would have met the difficulties of the case, and that it would have applied with equal fairness to the South as well as to the North of Ireland. He understood that at the conference between the Members of the two Front Benches the subject of grouping was one that was discussed, and that the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) put his foot down very strongly against the proposition to group boroughs in England. As he (Mr. Ewart) had said, the disfranchising provisions of the Bill might not work any injustice in England; but they certainly would work the grossest injustice in Ireland. He spoke without any hope of success on the present occasion; and he feared all that he and his hon. Friends could do was to protest against the disadvantages which the Bill would effect with regard to the representation of the North of Ireland.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, he was glad the Government had determined to reject the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Downpatrick, Mr. Mitchell. The acceptance of the Amendment would lead to endless complications, for it would cause the reopening of the whole Irish portion of the Bill. Knowing something of the political history and life of Ulster for the last 25 years, he could only say that nothing could possibly have been more surprising than to see the Ulster Conservative Members that day turning their backs upon their old friends the farmers of the Province of Ulster. The hon. Member for Downpatrick spoke of the danger of enfranchising the agricultural population of Ireland, and said that the influence of that population ought to be counterbalanced by the keeping up of a number of the small boroughs in Ireland in which the artisan classes held sway. What were the charges made against the agricultural population? Why, that the agricultural community were inferior in intelligence and education to the people dwelling in towns. If the hon. Gentleman had taken the trouble to read the statistics in the possession of the House he would see that in point of education and intelligence the people who resided in the counties of Ireland were quite equal to those who lived in the small boroughs. Anyone who knew Ireland must admit, if they were prepared to speak out their mind frankly, that the grouping of boroughs would not only be very unpopular, but unsuccessful in its results. Although the hon. Gentleman the Member for Downpatrick addressed the Committee for 40 minutes, he gave them no idea of how the grouping he proposed was to be carried out; he did not give the Committee a particle of information as to where the Members were to come from for the boroughs he proposed to group. But from hints which were thrown out last night it was evident that some Members of the Conservative Party had fixed their minds upon taking one Member from the county that he, Mr. Dickson, had the honour to represent. He supposed that that was the outcome of the negotiations which had been going on for the past four or five days between the deputation from the North of Ireland and the Leaders of the Opposition. Tyrone was fairly entitled to four Representatives in Parliament, and it was impossible not to refer to the generosity of hon. Gentlemen, who, in order to enfranchise a small borough like Larnham, would deprive Tyrone of one of its Members. Their generosity brought to one's recollection the couplet about an old Irish squire who

"Enfranchised his county,
But bridged for himself at the expense of the county."

He, Mr. Dickson, and certain other Ulster Members were determined that small boroughs in Ireland should not be enfranchised at the expense of the counties. His hon. Friend the Member for the City of Dublin, Dr. Lyons, referred to the advantages of grouping boroughs like Kinsale and Youghal. He, Mr. Dickson, considered that the interests of the fishing community of the borough of Kinsale were quite safe in the Kinsale division of the county of Cork. As a matter of fact, the hon. Member for Tipperary, Mr. John O'Connor, entirely disposed of the arguments put forward by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Dublin. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Armagh, Mr. Beresford, pleaded that that city should be allowed to retain its separate representation. If the small boroughs were to be retained he, Mr. Dickson, could plead for another borough in Ireland, the borough of Dungannon, in which he had some interest, a borough whose voice was heard in the House with very considerable effect at a great crisis in the history of Ireland. But he believed that neither Dungannon nor the City of Armagh were afraid of committing their commercial interests to the division of the county of which they formed a part. He hoped they would hear less of interfering with the Irish portion of the Bill, and that the Government would stand firm and keep the Bill in the shape in which it had been framed.

MR. MACARTNEY said, the hon. Gentleman who had just got down, and who shared with him the representation of the county of Tyrone, was sometimes terribly afraid—he was the other day—of being taken for him, Mr. Macartney. Now, whatever dislike the hon. Gentleman might have to that, he (Mr. Macartney) could assure the hon. Gentleman he would be equally annoyed if he were to be mistaken for him (Mr. Dickson). The other day hon. Members below the Gangway were referring to some remarks made by the hon. Member for Tyrone, when the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dickson) cried "the junior Member." The hon. Gentleman repeated the interruption about 20 times, at which he (Mr. Macartney) was very much surprised. He did not think anybody would fall into the mistake of supposing that a speech made by the hon. Member was made by him (Mr. Macartney), or that a speech made by him (Mr. Macartney) was made by the hon. Gentleman. At all events, their constituents would never make such a mistake. The hon. Member had said that he was rejoiced that the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke), who was conducting the Bill, had put his foot down resolutely against any alteration of the Bill. Now, when the hon. Member put his own foot down resolutely yesterday, and declared that he would not allow any Member to be taken from Tyrone, he (Mr. Macartney) presumed the hon. Gentleman possessed an intimate knowledge of the length, breadth, and weight of the right hon. Baronet's foot. He believed that the reason why the hon. Gentleman was quite ready to sink the borough of Dungannon in the county of Tyrone was that he knew full well that if an election were to take place upon the present constituencies he or any of his family would not be returned for that borough. He (Mr. Macartney) had the honour of representing Tyrone in conjunction with the hon. Gentleman, and he had always ridden upon one horse perfectly straight. Mr. T. A. Dickson: (Oh, oh!) He defied the hon. Gentleman to prove that he had done otherwise; he had insinuated it, but he had never been able to prove it. But the hon. Member reminded him of a performer in a circus, who had one foot upon one horse and one foot upon another horse—the hon. Gentleman rested one foot upon the Radical electors of Tyrone, and the other upon the Nationalists in the same county; and he thought that by sometimes leaning gracefully one way and sometimes the other way he could conciliate both Parties. He was afraid that what happened sometimes to the circus-rider would happen to the hon. Gentleman—that when he took a leap through one of the hoops he would find he had landed between the horses. He (Mr. Macartney) did not wish to allude to language used by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, because he did not care to bandy bad words with his fellow-countrymen—["Oh, oh!"]—he was quite aware hon. Gentlemen did not acknowledge him as a fellow-countrymen of theirs. But the hon. Member for Galway Borough (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), in concluding his speech, turned round and, looking fiercely in the direction in which he (Mr. Macartney) and his hon. Friends sat, accused the Ulster Conservative Members of being robbers—["Oh, oh!"]—robbers and robbery were the words used. He knew that strong language in the House had become so common of late that it was now almost impossible for the Chairman of Committees or for Mr. Speaker to stop it. Personally, he did not expect good taste always from the quarter whence the remark he had referred to came; but he consoled himself with the old proverb that "it is very difficult to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear." Passing from that topic, he wished to allude to what had been said by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold). The hon. Gentleman said that the Ulster Conservative Members did not seem to be penetrated by the situation which existed between the two Front Benches. They were penetrated to their very marrow by that situation. They understood it so well that they were disappointed and disgusted with it; but that was no reason why they should not, at least, put forward their title to consideration. They certainly did not expect much consideration from the Ministerial side of the House; but they thought that the champions of the Constitutional and Conservative cause would not forget those who had always stood by the Crown and Constitution of this country. They would not cease to do so; but, at the same time, they could not help expressing their deep disappointment and disgust at the compact that their Leaders had entered into with the Government. Now, as to the Amendment before the Committee, a good deal had been said by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway Colonel Nolan as to the unreasonableness of the demand involved in that Amendment. It was supposed that the promoters of the proposition under consideration wanted to rob other parts of Ireland of their representation. They wanted to do no such thing. The hon. and gallant Member had acknowledged that the Province of Leinster was over-represented, as compared with the three other Provinces. Was he mistaken? Colonel Nolan: I did not say so. The hon. and gallant Member said the other day that the Province of Ulster was not the only Province that suffered, or was under-represented, as compared with Leinster. That was their case. He, Mr. Macartney, and his hon. Friends maintained that Connaught and Munster were in the same position as Ulster, for whereas they had only one Member for every 10,000 people, the Province of Leinster had one Member for every 14,000 people. They were puzzled to make out the reason for Leinster being treated in such an exceptionally favourable manner. They had been unable to get at the cause. They were told that there was no wish to disturb the Articles of the Union, but he showed last night that the 14th Article of the Union was violated by this Bill. That Article provided that the Irish boroughs, to the number of 31, should be represented in the House of Commons. But by this Bill the number of represented boroughs was to be cut down to 10. That argument, therefore, fell to the ground. What was the next? Why, "We must treat you exactly as we treat England, Scotland, and Wales." Did they do that? He denied it. What he and his hon. Friends asked for had been done in England, Scotland, and Wales. Scotland and Wales had already grouping of boroughs, and, therefore, they did not now ask for it, and even by the present Bill it was proposed to group the boroughs of Warwick and Leamington. It was true the Government had the authority to assert that Warwick and Leamington were really one place. He never heard that asserted before. He had always thought that Warwick and Leamington were separate and distinct places. He always understood that Leamington was a place like Cheltenham—a village town, but now it had been discovered that Warwick and Leamington were one place. If it was wrong, and a breach of the agreement, and not in consonance with the principles of the Bill, that one place should be joined to another so as to make one large borough, he asserted that it had been done, or was projected to be done, with the Bill, and he did not see why it should not be done in Ireland as well as in England. A rather remarkable trail had been drawn across the path by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Dublin, Dr. Lyons, though it was not intentional on his part. Some years ago they used to hear a good deal of the "three F's": now they only heard from the hon. Member of two—forests and fishermen. The hon. Gentleman seemed to have a great desire to re-forest Ireland; and he also seemed to think that the only boroughs in Ireland were those where fishermen lived. He, Mr. Macartney, agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway County, Colonel Nolan, that, generally speaking, the fishermen of Ireland lived on the coast; that they were half farmers and half fishermen; that they spent most of their time ashore, but that they did not live in boroughs. He did not consider that, except in a place like Kinsale, they made up a large constituency. He thought they were a class who might very fairly be merged in county constituencies. He and his Friends were as anxious that fishermen should have their interests represented in Parliament as other Members were. It seemed to be suspected that they wanted to have Members for Ulster at the expense of other places. They wanted nothing of the kind. All they wanted was to have, with Connaught and Munster, as great a share of representation as was given to Leinster by the Bill. They maintained that Ulster, with a population which exceeded that of any other Province in Ireland, was entitled to representation equivalent to its population. Let Ulster have its fair share of representation by means of grouping boroughs. Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway seemed to be alarmed at the Amendment, because, if it were adopted, it would give six seats to the Representatives of the robbing landlords. Those hon. Gentlemen imagined there were no loyal people in Ireland except landlords, but he could assure them that if it ever came to a stiff fight, they would meet in the field many others besides landlords. He said the other day that the Loyalists of Ulster were not afraid, and his words were misinterpreted. He was reported to have said that the people of Ulster were not afraid of the increase which would take place in the representation of the Irish Nationalists. He never meant that. They were afraid of that, and they did not like it, because they considered they had been robbed of their rights. But as to being afraid of the Nationalists as a body of men, as to being afraid of being turned out of the country, they only said—"Come on and try us." He hoped that the arguments which had been used by those who had advocated this simple measure of justice to the inhabitants of the manufacturing and industrial boroughs of Ireland would weigh with hon. Members opposite. But he was afraid that, however much those arguments might weigh with hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Liberal Benches, the division would not be influenced. Perhaps, in conclusion, he might be allowed to relate a little story to show how independent the occupiers of the mud hovels were, and how intelligently they would vote. [Mr. KENNY: Is it a true story?] It happened to himself. In 1873 he was a candidate for the representation of Tyrone; and on one occasion, when he was proceeding from his residence to Five Mile Cross to address the electors of the county, he met half-way the Rev. Mr. M'Ilroy, parish priest. Mr. M'Ilroy was a man with whom he was on the best of terms, and the rev. gentleman said—"Where are you going?" He said—"I am going to make a speech at Five Mile Cross;" whereupon Mr. M'Ilroy said—"Take me with you." He (Mr. Macartney) was a little taken aback by the request, because he was the candidate of the Orangemen of Tyrone; and he thought that if the parish priest were seen in his wagonette his chances of election would be completely damned. Mr. M'Ilroy said—"Don't you be afraid; I'll do you no harm," and got in the conveyance. Several speeches were made to the meeting, and at last Mr. M'Ilroy rose to speak, and, to his (Mr. Macartney's) great astonishment, commenced his address by saying—"Protestants and Presbyterians." The rev. gentleman frequently addressed the people as "Protestants and Presbyterians," until he (Mr. Macartney) getting alarmed, pulled him by the sleeve, and said—

Mr. Macartney

"Speak to your own people." He turned round, and said—"Leave me alone; I am all right." As a matter of fact, Mr. M'Ilroy made a capital speech in favour of his (Mr. Macartney's) candidature. At the conclusion of the address he (Mr. Macartney) asked—"Now, will you tell me what is the reason you would not speak to your own people?" and the reply he received was—"My dear friend, the other men have to be convinced; my people vote just as I tell them."

Mr. SEXTON said, that reference had been made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) to Warwick. If hon. Gentlemen thought that any process of grouping had gone on in reference to Warwick they were under a great delusion. Grouping meant the joining together of places which had an intervening space; but the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Macartney) must find, if he took the trouble to ascertain the facts, that no such process had gone on in the case of Warwick. What had been done was simply to add to the existing Parliamentary area—partly urban and partly rural—another similar area which adjoined. There was certainly no question of grouping. Now, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Macartney) need not be alarmed of being mixed up with his Colleague (Mr. Dickson) in the representation of Tyrone. No one would be so foolish as to take a speech delivered by the one as a speech made by the other; and there were few people who would mistake a speech made by either of them for a speech made by any third person. Now, the hon. Gentleman who had last addressed the Committee (Mr. Macartney) had taken upon himself a position for which he was not qualified by nature or training, and that was the position of censor in that House in the matter of good taste. The hon. Member had accused hon. Members sitting below the Gangway of being guilty of bad taste in the references they had made to other Members from Ireland; yet surely he himself was guilty of a most glaring piece of bad taste when he quoted the ancient aphorism about a silk purse and a sow's ear. If the hon. Gentleman doubted that the name was applicable to any Gentleman of his order, he would invite him to go into the Library and look at the Blue Books, and examine the proceedings of the Irish Land Commission. He understood that when a man appropriated that which was the property of another, the word "robbery" might be applied to him, and that was exactly the Irish Land Commission had been robbers. He sympathized with what the hon. Member for Salisbury Mr. Arnold had said in regard to the Irish Party—that the leadership had taken out of commission. Last night the Irish Party Members had indulged in the wild delight of rebellion, and that day they were learning that rebellion had its disadvantages and its risks. Some of them appeared to be unaware that a compact had been entered into; others had admitted its existence; but to what a conclusion of genteel comedy had the argument of the question been brought when they saw last night the Leader of the Conservative Party, followed by the whole rank and file of the English Conservative Members, go into the Lobby against them. The hon. Member for Armagh Mr. Beresford either did not know what he wanted to prove, or he only wanted to prove too much. He commenced by making a plea for Ulster, but his argument resolved itself into an argument that one Ulster county differed from another, because, if his speech meant anything at all, it meant that he was desirous of making a difference between the counties of Cavan and Armagh. It appeared to him that an argument of that sort did not rise to the height of national dimensions. The hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine Sir Harvey Bruce was not, as Michael Casson was a great arithmetician, and it was very dangerous to handle figures unless one was a skilful craftsman. The hon. Baronet said that each Member for County Leath would represent only 26,000 people; but he would advise him to go back to the Blue Book, and, if he did so, he would find that the towns of Drogheda and Dundalk had been added to the county of Leath. That would add to the county a population of 25,000, so that each Member for the county would represent 51,000. The hon. Baronet was as indifferent in his facts also as he was in his figures. He had soared into the realms of imagination, and talked about the good angel that guarded the Nationalist interests in the private conclave, but he Mr. Sexton might say that, so far as the general impression in Ireland went, it never the interests of the National Party were considered in a conclave of English Ministers, the supernatural influence proceeding over it was altogether of another kind than that of angels. The hon. Gentleman who made this Motion Mr. Mulholland appeared to him to be very much too ingenious and a great deal too good for a place like this, where the sharper faculties of the human intellect were, perhaps, unduly developed. He appeared to possess a good deal of the character of the Vicar of Wakefield, and a good deal of the hopefulness of that distinguished clergyman, which arose, in a great degree, from an imperfect appreciation of facts. The hon. Gentleman asked the Government and the Committee to group Irish boroughs. Well, the Nationalist Members were as anxious for the grouping of Irish boroughs as he was, so long as the process was carried out with firmness. But the hon. Gentleman forgot that they were in Committee considering, not principles, but details; and he had not told them these two essential and indispensable facts—namely, what towns he intended to group, and what counties he intended should find the seats. The hon. Member seemed to think that the Committee had adopted a system common in judicial matters in Ireland, of finding the verdict first and considering the evidence afterwards. They had all heard of a certain compact, and all he could say was this—that if the Irish Tories listened any more to the voice of the charmer, the noble Viscount the Member for Fermanagh Viscount Crichton, as they did last night, and followed him into the Lobby, in opposition to the Conservative Leader and the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill Sir Charles W. Dilke—if they had any more of these idle Amendments and these fruitless and hopeless debates the right hon. Baronet would have a perfect right to go to the Marquess of Salisbury, and say to him, "You entered into a compact which you appear to have neither the political power nor the moral force to execute."

Mr. KENNY said, this Amendment seemed to him to be entirely unjustifiable. The hon. Member who moved it asked the Committee to take a leap in the dark. He wanted them to approve of a principle without putting any practical scheme before them, and as soon as he had concluded his speech his Colleagues had followed him, with a view of showing that the people of Ulster had been treated badly by the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill; but, on the contrary, he (Mr. Kenny) considered that the people of Ulster had been singularly well treated by that Bill. After that Bill had been passed into law Ulster would be represented by 33 Members; and he desired the Committee to compare those figures with those of Connaught. They would find that, whereas the 400,000 people of Ulster would have 33 Members, the 800,000 of Connaught would only have 15 Members. Therefore, the arguments of the hon. Members who had supported this Amendment were utterly worthless. At the present time, under this Bill, there would be something like four or five of the Ulster boroughs disfranchised. The hon. Member who moved this Motion represented one of those boroughs; and he presumed the hon. Member desired to have it grouped with some other boroughs. It only had a population of 3,000 people, which was a very small borough. There was no borough in Ireland which had so just a claim to consideration, in addition to Drogheda, as the borough of Lisburn; and he thought that those who were responsible for that which he would mention might almost be charged with an attempt to commit fraud. The population of the borough of Lisburn was last Census considerably under 15,000; but when he looked at Thom's Directory he found that, whereas the population of other boroughs in Ireland was put down under the Census of 1881, the population of Lisburn was put down in 1883 at exactly the required number of 15,000. He should like to know who it was who had used his influence with the managers of Thom's Directory and induced them to alter these figures, in order to deceive the Government in regard to this Bill. It was absolutely impossible to group boroughs in Ireland. A scheme of grouping had been suggested in regard to Ireland in a Private Bill which an hon. Member had brought in, and in that measure it was proposed to connect with Limerick the boroughs of Ennis and Carlow. Now, Ennis was about 40 miles from Limerick, and the two boroughs had not the slightest interests in common. He believed that if this Amendment were adopted, it would be found that any proposal for grouping the hon. Member might make would be as absurd and senseless as that which had been made in the Private Bill he had referred to. He hoped the Committee would throw out the Amendment by an overwhelming majority.

MR. LEWIS remarked that, after the speeches that had been made by several hon. Members on this subject, he did not think he would be justified in detaining the Committee for any length of time; but still he could not help referring to two points that had not so far been very much touched upon. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) and the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had proceeded rather upon the non possumus argument, and had said that the scheme that had been put forward that day entirely subverted the scheme of the Bill—namely, which was drawn upon the principle of anti-grouping. They knew that they had in Scotland one of the worst systems of grouping which existed in the entire Kingdom. What was the reason of it? He turned to the Papers, and he found that the Lord Advocate, representing the Government, intended to place all the existing groups of Scotch burghs in Schedule I.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): No, none.

MR. LEWIS said, he was sorry the Lord Advocate interrupted him. He found that the Ayr district was to be disenfranchised, that the Kilmarnock Burghs, that the Falkirk Burghs were to be disenfranchised, and the Elgin, Stirling, Montrose, Inverness, Wick, and Cromarty districts of burghs were to be treated in the same way. ["No, no."] Perhaps hon. Members would not be quite so eager if they would only wait to see what followed. Nine district burghs were to go to Schedule I., and when he read that Amendment he said—"Surely the Government are going to be consistent; they have a strong objection to grouping in England and Wales, and they are going to abolish it in Scotland." But, on turning to another page of the Amendments, he found that nine district boroughs were to be created by the Government. This was the action of the Government that found itself unable to consider the present proposal, because it was alleged that it would subvert one of the leading principles of the Bill, which was to do away, as far as they could, with district boroughs. Those Amendments were on the Paper in the name of the Lord Advocate. This was the consistency of the Government. They destroyed the present system of grouping, and created an entirely new one, which they thought they could make defensible. Yet the hon. Member for Suffolk (Mr. Arnold), who was alternately kicking and putting the Government, congratulated them that they had once and for ever condemned the system of grouping, and said he hoped they would hear no more of it. The way they got rid of it was to disturb the present system of grouping in Scotland in nine cases, and to substitute another system which they hoped would be defensible. That was an illustration of the consistency of the Government. They objected to the principle of grouping, and, therefore, this Amendment, which was opposed by the President of the Local Government Board.

Sir CHARLES W. PILKETT said the hon. Member had three times stated that he, Sir Charles W. Pilke, had opposed grouping on principle; what he did say was that he voted like grouping, and they would rather diminish than increase it, and that they thought its extension impracticable for reasons that were given.

Mr. LEWIS remarked that if there had been as much pressure put upon the Government as had been put upon them by the Scotch Members the results would have been different. At any rate, the Irish Members had said that the system of grouping was too hasty, had. There had not been a sufficient discussion on what related to Warwick, and it would be interesting to learn why a large town like Leamington was to be joined to a small town like Warwick. He supposed they would hear something from the Government at some time or another. Anybody who knew what Warwick and Leamington were could not possibly imagine that they were one and the same thing. He desired to answer the points which had been thrown out to the Ulster Members with regard to the so-called compact, and he ventured to make one prophecy, which was, that there would never be another compact made such as had been entered into between the two Front Benches with regard to this Bill. He did not suppose that either party to the compact would justify the consequence, which was a public evil, that the hands of Members on both sides of the House should be absolutely tied. What were they there for if they were not to discuss these matters? Why did they go through the farce of moving the Chairman in and out of the Chair if there was to be no real freedom of action? He denied that they were acting, in any ordinary sense of the word, in rebellion against the Leaders with whom they usually acted. At any rate, they hoped that their Leaders would not desert them in this division. It was true that the Ulster Members were a very small, and it might be a diminishing body; but they were there to defend their own interests, and he thought it was far too common a thing on both sides of the House to listen patiently to tirades from below the Gangway. He did not think this was the time to play into the hands of the Nationalist Members of the Irish Party, when the Press of that Party was teeming with dishonour to the Crown and the Members of the Royal Family. Did hon. Members think that the Ulster Members should hide their diminished heads while the Nationalists were doing everything they could to insult the Royal Family? He might tell them that there was one part of Ireland where Royalty would not only meet with loyal, but, if necessary, physical support. The Nemesis that would overtake the House in consequence of the increased power that had been put in the hands of the Nationalists would be an honorable fight, over and over again, on the floor of that House, for the repeal of the Union with all its consequences. The Irish Landlords had already had to suffer in their individual persons the consequences of what was called a generous system of legislation for Ireland. The House was generous at their expense. It was a generosity that came out of the pockets of the Irish landlords. The measures they had taken were supposed to have been done for the good of the Empire, but without the slightest compensation having been given to the Irish landlords. Irish Members were constantly saying that the Irish Protestants were the cause of all the mischief and trouble in Ireland. That was much the same as what they said when a collision occurred between the police and the people. It was always held in such cases that if there had been no police or military there would have been no rioting—that was to say, he supposed, that the mob should be allowed to carry out its designs without interference. So it was in Ireland; and he ventured to say that if it had not been for the Protestant minority, every evil, every form of disloyalty—he would not say crime—would have been rampant. It was because the Protestants were always supporting all that was loyal and good in the country that hon. Members below the Gangway said—“Oh, if it was not for the Protestant minority there would have been no disturbance.” Irish landlords had been allowed to be stigmatized as robbers, and that was thought to be within the privilege of Parliamentary speech; but to his mind it was disgusting that such a charge should be made against men who, in many cases, had had to sacrifice their absolute means of existence for what was called the public good. When they asked for compensation the Prime Minister came down there with smooth words—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is departing too far from the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. LEWIS said, he was merely replying to attacks which had been made from below the Gangway; and if they happened again he was afraid he would have to come under the ban of the Chairman once more, because he thought they ought to be answered.

MR. TREVELYAN said, it was impossible for Members of the Government to remain silent when an hon. Member attempted to turn the debate into a question between loyalty and disloyalty. He begged hon. Members to consider that this was not a question of loyalty of Parties in Ireland, but a question of the details of the Bill. The Government were determined that they would not treat Ireland differently from England and Scotland. Hon. Members opposite must have been present at the debate on going into Committee, when the Government were vindicating the Bill against the attacks of hon. Members below the Gangway, who stated that it did injustice to the National Party; and in the same way the Government were now vindicating the Bill against hon. Members opposite, on the ground that it did no injustice to the great number in Ireland who were opposed to the National Party. He begged hon. Members who belonged to either of those Parties to consider that in the long run no good would come by attempting to give any Party in that House an unfair advantage in the Irish constituencies by arranging them in a manner which did not commend itself to the House on general grounds. By pursuing any such course of conduct they would give the Nationalist Party in Ireland a real grievance; and the great object of the Government and of the country ought to be to give Ireland no real grievance whatever. Now they were told that the voice of the disfranchised towns was no longer to be heard. The hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) said they were to be absolutely disfranchised. The principle of this Bill was that while by merging boroughs they might remove boroughs from the borough list, they would give them, perhaps, exceptional influence by making them the centres of larger districts. Indeed, they would in many cases have a much larger political influence than they possessed when they remained boroughs. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) had taunted his right hon. Friends with having created a great number of Scotch groups, and he took exception to the statement that grouping was not a principle of the Bill. It must be recollected that in a Bill of this description they must look to its general tendency; and there could be no doubt whatever that the general tendency of the measure was adverse to grouping. His right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate had not created a single additional group. Not one single additional group had been created in Scotland; not one single town had been made into a borough which was not a borough before, and a very large number of towns had been merged into counties, and had ceased to be boroughs altogether. The only ground that hon. Members could have to make a statement that this Bill was a grouping Bill was afforded by the single case of Warwick; and he believed that hon. Members, if they inquired into the matter, would admit that that was not a group. The boroughs of

Warwick and Leamington had five miles of common frontier on which they touched, and the very essence of grouping was that the frontier should be separated. Hon. Members opposite had spoken with a certain amount of bitterness with which he had some degree of sympathy, although he did not agree with them. They complained that they had been left in the lurch, and that their interests had been neglected, by those who ought to have looked after them. He thought that these sort of complaints ought to remind statesmen that they should be extremely careful in making promises. Hon. Members opposite had been thrown over by their Leader, not, however, by any action which the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) took recently, but by the action which he took 18 months ago during his visit to Ulster, and which had been extremely regretted by the right hon. Gentleman since. The Leader of the Opposition had made a speech on Irish representation, which made the Government very cautious as to how they touched on Irish representation; for he told the assembled Conservatives that if justice were done according to the number of electors Ulster, instead of having 29 or 33 Members, he did not remember which, as at present, ought to have 44; and he also told them, in words that could only have this significance, that Connaught, with its enormous population, ought only to have 18 Members as against 12 for Belfast. The basis on which the right hon. Gentleman founded his argument was the number of present electors. People who listened to that sort of speech in excited Party meetings did not go into the argument by which such statements were supported, and he thought at the time it was very much to be regretted that hopes were held out to the Conservatives of Ulster which, in calmer moments, the right hon. Baronet knew could not be fulfilled. The right hon. Baronet was no doubt carried away by the circumstances of the moment, but now, sitting on the Front Bench, he was acting as a statesman, and he was obliged, when he came to review this question as a patriotic statesman, to come down very much from his previous promises and help in bringing forward and advocating before the House a scheme which, whatever might be said, he was convinced the more the House examined it the more they would find it was drawn up without any reference to Party or creed in Ireland, and with the one intention of doing justice all round.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) should have reserved his reply to a speech delivered 18 months ago by his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition to an occasion when he was unavoidably absent. Had he been present, he would no doubt, have been able to give a full and sufficient answer to the long bottled-up impeachment. He must go farther, and say that if Her Majesty's Government were anxious that the Bill should proceed with the full support of the Front Opposition Bench, or even the general support of that part of the House, they must defer replying to speeches made by their political opponents 18 months ago to a more auspicious occasion. The Bill had not been delayed by speeches from that part of the Committee, but by the allies of the right hon. Gentleman below the Gangway; and if, in addition to that sort of delay, they were to be driven upon occasions to reply to partizan speeches from Cabinet Ministers, he did not know when this Bill would pass through the House; and, for himself, he was disposed to agree with what was said by his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis), that it was not likely that compacts of that sort would be repeated in future. No doubt, on the present occasion there was a compact; and when the right hon. Gentleman talked so glibly of fulfilling their share of the contract, he begged to say that the most important part of the compact, so far as the Conservative Party was concerned, was accomplished and fulfilled when the House of Lords passed the third reading of the Franchise Bill. That he took to be an undoubted fact. As to what the right hon. Gentleman had said as to the principle of the Bill, he could not understand why the Government regarded the formation of one or two groups in parts of Ireland or Scotland as necessarily hostile to the principle of the measure. One right hon. Gentleman said he looked with disfavour on the principle of grouping, while another right hon. Gentleman had said that if they looked at the whole construction of the measure, they would find that it was hostile to the principle of grouping. But, for his part, he could not see, with regard to Scotland, that the Bill was altogether hostile to grouping. Now, in regard to Ireland, no doubt, there were practical difficulties in the way of forming any substantial system of grouping boroughs; but he did not understand that his hon. Friends who proposed this Amendment were in favour of any very large principle of grouping. But they thought that, in one or two cases, the system of grouping might be advantageously adopted. If it was true that Her Majesty's Government considered that the principle of grouping in Ireland, carried out to however small an extent, was in hostility to, and in derogation of, the compact or agreement which was entered into between the two Leaders of the Conservative Party, the moment that was stated, he, for one—and he spoke for nobody but himself—should feel bound by the declaration. He should, however, press upon Her Majesty's Government the further consideration of this question. If the Government said that they regarded the question of grouping in Ireland as opposed to the essence of this measure, and that they could not accept any proposal as to grouping, however limited in extent, he, for one, should be bound to support Her Majesty's Government in opposing that Amendment; but he earnestly hoped, in the interests of peace and of the future progress of this measure, that they would receive from the Government an assurance that they were prepared to consider proposals of this moderate nature.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE remarked, that he had already addressed the Committee on this subject; but as the noble Lord had made a rather distinct appeal to the Government he would repeat what he had stated. He had told the Committee that day that it was impossible for the Government to accede to the proposal for grouping in Ireland; but last night he had said that if there was any general concurrence of opinion in favour of the views then supported, that one or two Irish boroughs should be increased by the addition of suburbs, that was a matter which he thought should not be shut out, but ought to be considered in Committee when they reached the Schedule, and that it was a matter which might very properly receive the attention of the House. He thought it only courteous to the noble Lord to repeat that statement.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked if that was not impossible, on account of the compact?

MR. CALLAN said, he thought the outburst of loyalty on the part of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis), and the simulated passion with which it was delivered, would have been more in season, and would have come with greater force, if it had come from him on one of his platforms, and had it been addressed to that one of his standard-bearers, during his election campaign in Derry, who declared, on the same platform as the hon. Member, that he would kick the Queen's Crown into the Boyne. He opposed the Amendment for two reasons. In the first place, because the hon. Member who moved it (Mr. Mulholland) had not put on the Paper the names of the towns he proposed to group; and, secondly, because he was opposed to the principle it involved. The Postmaster General, in the course of his short speech on this subject, showed an utter and deplorable ignorance in regard to the effect which the Bill would have in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman, in arguing against the principle of grouping boroughs, stated, as a compensation, that they would exercise the preponderating influence in the counties in which they were merged. But what was the fact? There were two boroughs to be merged in the county which he represented—Dundalk and Drogheda. What would be the effect? They were at present represented by two thorough-going Whigs; but the county of Louth would never be disgraced by being represented by Whigs. They would only be represented by thorough-going Nationalists. He should be very sorry to see the borough of Portarlington impregnating with its corrupting influences Queen's County and King's County. He was glad to hear that it would never impregnate the county he represented with its corrupting influences. In like manner, he should be sorry to see Kerry corrupted by the Whiggery of Tralee. He desired to know from the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, or the right hon. Baronet Sir Charles W. Dilke, that the limits of the borough of Drogheda had not been extended, seeing that they had extended Warwick to a distance of five miles from the centre of the town. Why, in regard to Drogheda, had they refused to extend the boundary, on the principle laid down by the Hexham Commission? Had the Government been guided in these matters by political exigencies or political jerry-mandering? On what principle could they allow the borough boundary of Warwick to be extended five miles, and refuse to allow the borough of Drogheda to be extended a quarter of a mile—particularly when the borough of Drogheda came to within 348 of the 15,000 limit, and Warwick wanted as many as 4,000, or, at all events, more than 3,000? If they enfranchised Warwick, they would commit a gross injustice if they did not, at the same time, and by the same Act, enfranchise Drogheda. He thought that, instead of having this subject constantly recurring, it would be well to give some explanation as to the causes of the enfranchisement of Warwick and the drawing of a hard-and-fast line in the case of Drogheda.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, it would be out of Order for him, at the present moment, to argue the case of Warwick in detail—it would be encouraging a discussion which would be entirely irregular. He had already answered questions with regard to Drogheda, and had stated that if the circumstances of that town were considered by themselves it would be a question whether this place ought not to be treated exceptionally. As it was, when they came to deal with the case, they would have to consider it very carefully. Applications had been made from various parts of England similar to those referred to by the hon. Member.

MR. LEWIS said, he did not think it would be right to pass this question by. The case of Ladburn was exactly similar; and he did not see how it was possible to discover the circumstances of Drogheda, as well as those of Ladburn, from the case of Warwick when that came on.

MR. HICKS said, that before the question was put he wished, as an English Member, to be allowed to say a very few words on this Amendment. On a former occasion, hon. Gentlemen forming the Party below the Gangway had claimed the right to be heard after the House had been occupied by English and Scotch Members for some considerable time. Well, this debate had been carried on that day entirely by Irish Members, or Members connected with Ireland; and he, therefore, thought it but right that an English Member should be allowed to say a few words. Last night one of the most eloquent Members belonging to the Party below the Gangway had said that he hoped this question would be debated without Party feeling. He (Mr. Hicks) was sorry that that hope had not been realized that day. They had heard language in that House that ought not to have been uttered there—language which had been cheered by hon. Members below the Gangway; and he thought that the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) was only within his right when he protested against it. The question really before the Committee was the question of grouping. For his own part, he had felt for years that that was the one way of solving the difficulty. He thought that this grouping with regard to Ireland would be a fair and just proceeding. They had it from the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold), that if the system of grouping was to be adopted at all, Gentlemen representing the North of Ireland had made out a very strong case for its application to that part of the United Kingdom. What he wanted to know was, and his only reason for rising was to ask the Government, whether they were or were not going to put their foot down on grouping, because in this Bill the Committee found, notwithstanding the chronicle smile of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), that the Government were not only maintaining but extending the system, in spite of what had fallen from the right hon. Baronet. The Committee had to consider not only the question of Warwick, which had been so prominently brought forward, but they had also to consider the question of Pembroke. They found that under the Bill Pembroke was to be joined, not to the town running alongside of it, but to the town of Haverfordwest. They saw there two towns grouped together, apparently for the purpose of securing a seat to a very faithful follower, the present Member for Pembroke (Mr. W. Davies). If they were to have the principle of non-grouping let it be stated clearly and distinctly; and let it be done generally, and not applied here and there. He said this—that if they were not to have a system of grouping in the future let them not have it now. Let them not have another of those points left over for future consideration—another point added to that of the Universities which the right hon. Baronet told them the other night was to be brought up again on the first opportunity. He should have liked to know whether this was another part of that great compact and agreement, the conditions of which were to be open for reconsideration and reversal on the first opportunity? If this was a point to be reconsidered as soon as ever the Government could get out of this unfortunate alliance with the Opposition, he should like to know how many other parts of the Bill were to be torn to pieces as soon as the measure became an Act?

MR. DEASY said, he could not remain silent after the answer of the noble Lord (Lord John Manners). He had been under the impression that the compact that they had heard had been entered into between the Government and the Tories existed down to the present time. It appeared now, however, from what they had heard from the noble Lord, and from a statement which had been made on behalf of the Government, that that compact was virtually at an end. ["No, no!"] The right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) appeared to dissent from that view; but he (Mr. Deasy) believed the right hon. Baronet had approved of the words of the noble Lord when the noble Lord had said that the Conservatives were released from this treaty when the Franchise Bill had passed the House of Lords.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that what he had intended to convey was that the major part of the compact on the Conservative side was accomplished by the passing of the Franchise Act by the House of Lords—not that the compact was itself at an end.

MR. SEXTON asked whether he was to understand from the noble Lord that the Conservatives, by allowing the Franchise Bill to pass, had carried out their part of the treaty? "No, no!"

MR. DEASY said, he trusted that if the Government took into consideration the extension of the boundaries of some of the Northern towns with a view to their enfranchisement, they would also consider the claims of Limerick and other Southern towns, and not enfranchise towns in the North at the expense of Southern constituencies. He did not think there was any reason for grouping such towns as Bandon, Kinsale, and Mallow. The two first were in the same district, with a joint population of 12,000 or 13,000, and there were several large villages near. There could be no doubt, therefore, that at an election the number of people who would vote in these places would have great influence in deciding who should sit for that division of the county of Cork. The same argument would apply to every other such constituency in Ireland. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would not alter their Bill in this respect.

Question put.

The Committee divided.

As the Tellers came up to the Table to announce the numbers The O'GORMAN MAHON, interrupting them, addressed some words to Lord RICHARD GROSVENOR, one of the Government Tellers, on the floor of the House, and immediately afterwards proceeded to his place.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR reported the numbers:—Ayes 93; Noes 183: Majority 90.—(Div. List, No. 50.)

THE CHAIRMAN called upon Mr. Dalrymple to proceed with the next Amendment.

MR. SEXTON: I rise to a point of Order. I understand my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Clare (The O'Gorman Mahon) did not hear the Question put in the last division, and therefore had remained in the right Lobby without voting. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether, that being so, the hon. and gallant Member is not entitled to have the Question put to him from the Chair, and, if necessary, to have his vote recorded?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member would have been entitled so to do if he had made his complaint at the proper moment; but he allowed the opportunity to pass.

MR. KENNY: The hon. and gallant Gentleman, I understand, endeavoured, under misapprehension, to rectify his mistake by informing the Clerk at the Table of what had occurred before the result of the division was declared; and I wish to know, Sir, inasmuch as he likewise appealed to the senior Government Whip, whether he is not entitled to have his vote properly recorded?

THE CHAIRMAN: It would have been open to the hon. and gallant Gentleman to have made his mistake known to the Tellers, and then it would have been corrected.

MR. SEXTON: He did appeal to the Whip.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am informed that the hon. and gallant Member communicated with the Clerk beside me, who informed the hon. and gallant Member that the course to pursue was to convey the information to the Tellers.

MR. SEXTON: He did so.

THE CHAIRMAN: But the hon. and gallant Member did not do so before the numbers were announced.

MR. SEXTON: Before the numbers were announced I saw the hon. and gallant Member make a statement to the noble Lord Lord Richard Grosvenor; and I appeal to the noble Lord to state what the communication was which the hon. and gallant Member made to him?

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: The hon. and gallant Gentleman spoke to me just before I read out the numbers.

MR. SEXTON: In these circumstances, Sir, I appeal to you to amend the record.

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand that the hon. and gallant Gentleman did communicate with the Tellers before the numbers were announced, and in that case I think the correction may be made.

THE O'GORMAN MAHON: I wish, Sir, to register my vote with the "Noes."

THE CHAIRMAN: Did the hon. and gallant Member hear the Question put?

THE O'GORMAN MAHON: No, Sir; I did not hear any Question put.

THE CHAIRMAN stated the Question to the hon. and gallant Member, and asked: Does the hon. and gallant Gentleman wish to record his vote with the "Ayes" or the "Noes"?

THE O'GORMAN MAHON: With the "Noes," Sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: Then the numbers must be corrected accordingly. The Ayes to the right were 93, and the Noes to the left 184.

The following is the entry in the Votes:—

"The O'Gorman Mahon, Member for Clare, came to the Table and informed the Chairman that, not having heard the Question put, he had remained in the right Lobby without voting, and that he had informed one of the Tellers for the Ayes of the circumstance before the Numbers were declared:—

"Whereupon the Chairman stated the Question to the honourable Member, and he declared himself with the Noes, and the Chairman directed that his name should be added to the Noes:—
Ayes 93, Noes 184

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he wished to move an Amendment to the clause, to except from its operation—

"Such burghs in Scotland, forming part of existing groups of burghs, as shall be grouped with other burgh districts, or such burghs as shall be grouped with other towns not at present represented, for the purpose of forming burgh districts in Scotland."

He made no apology for troubling the Committee with his Amendment. He considered that the subject was of great importance to Scotland, and that a question ought not only to be asked, but that they ought also to have a definite answer from the Government with regard to it. The Amendment was not inconsistent with what was proposed by the Lord Advocate on the part of the Government, but had a different object in view. Whatever fate it might meet with on the present occasion—whether it was ultimately withdrawn or negatived—he was quite aware it was in his power to raise the question again on the details of the Schedules; but, at the same time, he thought it would be a great convenience to the Committee that the question generally should be raised at this stage. He wanted to make clear the principle on which Amendments to the Schedules would be subsequently moved. The Amendment was in two parts, which were quite distinct; but they both had reference to the desirableness of continuing and developing the grouping system in Scotland. He wished, with regard to the first part of the Amendment, so to speak, to check the process of liberation in one case, because he proposed to deal with one burgh about to be liberated by having it transferred to another group; and as to the second part of the Amendment he wished to leave the door wide open for adding to groups now existing other towns in the same counties. He wished to say a word as to the expression "liberation," with which they had become familiar. That expression always reminded him of the now famous expression about the evacuation by Egypt of the Soudan and its restoration to freedom. There was a notion of satisfaction—almost of exhilaration—about this "liberation;" but he maintained that, as in the one case so in the other, it was a contradiction in terms. Just as in the case of the Soudan it meant liberation to chaos and terror, so in the case of the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill it meant liberation to electoral discomfiture, liberation to aggravated anomalies, liberation to smothering and suffocation of country interests in counties under the great numerical superiority of the towns. He desired the fair consideration of the Committee, and especially of hon. Members from Scotland sitting opposite, to the case he was about to bring before them. He wished them to put him out of consideration altogether, and to consider the case itself. He should be content if they would dissociate all idea of any Tory taint in the Amendment as he moved it, and only consider the circumstances of the case. He did not mean to refer in the slightest degree to the political character of his object. He was very doubtful whether, supposing the Amendment were carried, the political effect would be great; but he thought an anomaly of the most aggravated description would be remedied, under which, as he maintained, the country part of counties would, in time to come, be practically unrepresented. What he proposed was consistent, and what the Government proposed was inconsistent, with the instructions given to the Boundary Commissioners, which were to the effect that in forming the divisions the population of several districts should be equalized as far as practicable, and that care should be taken, in all cases where there were populous localities of an urban character, to group them all in the same division, unless it were found that it could not be done without great inconvenience. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government, in introducing the Bill to the House, or rather when he moved the second reading, distinctly pointed to an endeavour on the part of the Government, when they dealt with the details of the question, to separate, as far as might be practicable, the urban and the rural elements. He was not an advocate of anything in the nature of equal electoral districts; nothing was more remote from his mind; but he concluded that when an extended franchise was given to the counties it was intended that the country parts of counties should have some weight in the electoral scale. Could it be said that in the Bill as it stood, or if the Amendment of the Lord Advocate should be adopted, there was any fair attempt to separate the urban and rural elements? He said that so far as the Bill stood, and the proposals of the Lord Advocate went, there was not a shadow of an attempt to fulfil those conditions which were shadowed out by the Prime Minister, and which were in the instructions to the Boundary Commissioners. A man said to him not very long ago, when speaking of this subject—"But are they not all men?" "Yes;" he replied, "they are all men, and they will all be voters; and if the whole notion that is in your head is what Mr. Carlyle called 'head counting by thousands,' I quite understand that you attach very little importance to redistribution; but if there is any idea of redistribution, if there is any sense of a fair proportion of representation between town and country, then, I say, there ought to be some addition to existing groups of boroughs, to relieve to some extent the great inequality that will prevail between town and country." He remembered that the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan), who was the pioneer in all these matters—although other men now interested themselves in them, and little was now said of the right hon. Gentleman's share in the movement—used to say, speaking in a somewhat rhetorical fashion, that it was shocking to think that if Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, were alive now, he would not have a vote. Well, he would not have had a vote now if it had not been for the service franchise; and, what was more, Hogg, if he did have the benefit of the service franchise, would, under the Bill as it now stood, have not the smallest conceivable say in the political condition of the country; because in various regions of the country it was perfectly obvious that, as the Bill stood, the urban element would outweigh out of all sight the country element. It was worth mentioning how vast was the disproportion between the county and burgh representation of Scotland. The burghs returned one Member for every 39,000 odd of the population, and the counties one Member for 53,000 odd. These numbers, he believed, were not disputed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking on the last Amendment, said that they would give much larger political influence in time to come to the towns that were to be liberated; and he had pointed out that the towns would be the places where the newspapers would be published, where the markets would be held, and so forth. Well, that was perfectly true; it was what he not only admitted, but asserted; and it was because the liberated towns would have a so much larger influence in time to come in the counties to which they belonged that he said that in some cases the disproportion between town and county ought to be more adjusted, and that in other cases existing groups of burghs ought to be increased by the addition of towns of considerable proportions in the same counties. They used to hear a good deal about anomalies in former times; and he was under the impression that one of the objects of this Bill was to prevent anomalies; but, as it stood, the Bill aggravated them to a great extent. They might not be the same anomalies; but, at all events, there would be created new ones of a very startling character. He would illustrate by a single instance what he meant. He took one county particularly as an illustration, because he was not connected with it in the remotest degree. He took the county of Stirling. It was proposed by an Amendment on the Paper to group together the burghs of Stirling and Falkirk, with a population of 20,000, and it was intended in the Bill that the county population to be represented by one Member should be 51,000 or 54,000; so that these interesting burghs of Stirling and Falkirk would enjoy in the time to come fully a third more representation than the county, and not only so, but in that county there was a great variety of populous places—he need not define “populous places,” for there was no doubt as to what was meant—and the country parts of the county would, for good or for evil, be overruled and overridden by the urban element in the county. So that there was not only the extraordinary anomaly of the burghs being represented by one Member on the one hand, and the county, with its very large population, being also represented by one Member, but that the country population would be large, out of all right, when compared with the burgh population represented. He could give other instances, but would not trouble the Committee with them now. He hoped that on the Schedules it might hereafter be possible to mention other cases of equal importance. If the President of the Local Government Board dealt fully, as he hoped he would, with this Amendment in reply, he must not only say that the Government never contemplated regrouping; that they never contemplated the enfranchisement of these new towns in connection with existing groups—it would not do to say that alone, because the Government must have fully foreseen the effect of the greatly extended franchise in the counties; and, as he had already said, by the Bill as it was introduced, and by the instructions to the Boundary Commissioners, it was distinctly contemplated that the urban and rural elements should be, as far as possible, kept apart. The right hon. Gentleman should, he thought, also justify the departure from that principle which was laid down so prominently in both those quarters. The right hon. Baronet must account for the abandonment of the proposal to have a fair division between the urban and rural elements such as he Mr. Dalrymple desired to see. As he had said, he had no intention of going in for the creation of electoral districts, but he was of opinion, in the spirit of the declaration of the Prime Minister, and of the directions to the Boundary Commissioners, that an attempt should be made to rectify the extraordinary electoral anomalies that the Bill would create between the burgh and the county constituencies. It was for that purpose that he had brought forward his Amendment; and he should listen with interest to what the right hon. Baronet would say in reply.

Amendment proposed.

towns not at present represented, for the purpose of forming burgh districts in Scotland."—(Mr. Dalrymple.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he thought the hon. Member had made a very good defence of a case for which there was a good deal to be said. It was a case which, if they were to negative his Amendment on that occasion, they should not be able to avoid a discussion upon on a future occasion, because this was a matter which could be raised, undoubtedly, whether or not the words proposed by the hon. Member were here introduced. It was not a case that could be decided by the rejection or the acceptance of the Amendment on the present occasion, because there were two ways of doing what the hon. Member proposed. By the scheme of the Bill itself, if the Scottish groups were to be treated in the way the Lord Advocate had proposed to treat some of them, or treated as the groups in Welsh counties were treated, even if those words were negatived, it would be competent to the Committee on the Schedule to abolish certain existing Scottish groups, to re-group them, and to extend them by adding others to them. The matter, therefore, would not be finally concluded on that occasion; and he was afraid the result of the moving of the Amendment now would be that they would have two debates on the question. But, perhaps, that would be an advantage, because he thought it was deserving of very careful attention and consideration from the Committee. No one, he thought, was disposed to say that the present constitution of groups in Scotland was altogether satisfactory. He never heard of any Member of the House who took that view. Therefore, the door was open, by that general admission, to proposals that might be brought forward by the hon. Member. This was a matter as to which he should be glad to hear the opinion of Scotch Members when they came to the Schedules, and he had no doubt opinions would be very freely expressed. He had already had some means of forming an impression of the general opinion of Scotch Members; and certain proposals had been made by the Lord Advocate, which would come on in the Schedules, in which his right hon.

and learned Friend had tried to act on the opinions which appeared to be those of the majority, but with some doubt as to what was the exact opinion on details, which they could only discover satisfactorily when they came to discuss the Schedules. The hon. Member (Mr. Dalrymple) had told them that the urban element would outweigh the rural element in Scotland. The hon. Member had spoken in a very guarded way; but there could be no doubt that here and there there were counties in Scotland where the urban element would outweigh the rural element; but so there were in England; and he altogether took issue with the hon. Member if he made that statement a general statement. He did not think that such general statement could be seriously maintained by those who knew Scotland as well as the hon. Member did. The hon. Member said the Prime Minister, when he first gave a general sketch of the provisions of the Bill, attached great importance to the separation of the rural and urban elements. His right hon. Friend did so, and it had been the desire of the Government, as was shown in the instructions to the Boundary Commissioners, with regard to the formation of districts in counties, to act upon that principle, and, as far as possible, to separate these elements. It was undoubtedly the case, as he knew from the great number of remonstrances that had reached him from those who sat on his own side of the House, and representing those who were not in the House, that a great deal of dissatisfaction had been given to Members of the Liberal Party by a too strict adherence to those instructions. He knew that in one division of Lanarkshire, and in the case of the division of the county of Perth, great dissatisfaction had been expressed because the Commissioners had acted strictly on their instructions. It was his intention, however, on the part of the Government, to give the firmest support to these decisions. Although the hon. Member was quite within his rights in raising a discussion on this occasion, he could only point out that the insertion of his Amendment was not necessary from his own point of view. If the Committee negatived those words, they would be able, when the question cropped up on the Schedule, to extend the present grouping by adding outside burghs, if they thought fit, and they would also be able to break up and reconstitute groups anywhere, if it seemed desirable to the Committee. Looking, therefore, to the difficulty of discussing this as an abstract question, and the desirability of discussing it with facts before them, he thought it would be more desirable if they discussed it on the Schedule of the Bill.

Mr. ORR EWING said, that after the observations of the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill, Sir Charles W. Dilke, it might appear unnecessary to continue the debate. The proposal of the Lord Advocate, concurred in by the Scotch Members at their meeting upstairs, was that no burgh or populous place should be added to any group of burghs, however unjust the redistribution of those burghs might be. That was a proposal he, Mr. Orr Ewing, condemned. It was true that the instructions given to the Boundary Commissioners in Scotland, England, and Ireland were, unfortunately, identical, but the circumstances of each country were different. In his opinion, the only way in which they could fairly separate the urban and rural populations was either by proportional representation or by grouping burghs, and he was very much surprised that the Leaders of the Conservative Party, in making arrangements with the Government, did not stipulate that any burghs which were being disfranchised and added to the counties should be grouped together, thus separating the urban from the rural population. But as this arrangement had been agreed to by the Leaders of both Parties, so far as England and Ireland was concerned, he would not now reopen the question. He would, however, point out to the Committee the peculiarities of Scotland, and that the same instructions were not suitable to Scotland as to England and Ireland. Wherever they had a system of grouping of burghs, as in Scotland, where they had 13, or nearly a quarter of the total number of Members—they must either continue the system, or destroy grouping altogether. In order to show how inadequate was the proportion of the Government, he would give an illustration from the case of the county of Stirling. That county had a population of 112,000 and it had now one county Member and a portion of a burgh Member in respect of the burgh of Stirling. The remaining burghs belonging to this group, called the Stirling Burghs, were out of the county altogether—namely, in Fife shire and Lanarkshire. The Lord Advocate, no doubt, recognized that anomaly, and proposed now to make one group in the county of Stirling, and leaving the county Member; but he gave to this group of burghs a population of only 20,000, whilst that of the county was 80,000; and this notwithstanding that there were in one part of the county of Stirling numerous burghs and populous places—manufacturing towns—that could be added. He would call attention now to the extraordinary proposal of the Government as to Fife shire and Ayrshire. The county of Fife had two burgh Members and one county Member, and the Government proposed to continue the burgh Members and give another Member to the county. The population of the burghs was 10,000 for Kirkcaldy, and 19,425 for St. Andrew's, and that of the whole county 170,000. By dividing the latter by four, it would be seen that there would be about 40,000 to each constituency. Ayrshire had a population of 220,000, and had hitherto nearly four Members—at all events 3½ or 3. The Government proposed to take away one Member; and he asked whether that was just or fair, especially considering the way in which Fife shire was treated? For his own part, he considered it a manifestly unjust arrangement, and he trusted the Lord Advocate would reconsider the matter, and come to the conclusion that, by an amalgamation of the St. Andrew's and Kirkcaldy Burghs, the county of Fife might be satisfied with one Member. Then he wished to call attention to the county which he represented. The county of Dumbarton was one of the most prosperous and rapidly increasing counties in the whole of Scotland. It had increased 28 per cent in the last decade, and was increasing to a greater extent at present. Looking to the enormous works that were being constructed all down the Clyde, he had no hesitation in saying that the population of the county would soon be over 100,000. It was said that they might look for some farther drastic alterations in regard to the representation of the people when the new Parliament was brought together, but he thought, at all events, they ought to look forward to a settlement of this question which would last for a long period, and that, therefore, they should be guided by principles of fair play rather than by Party politics. Instead of forming a Dumbarton group of burghs, the Lord Advocate proposed only to take the burgh of Dumbarton, with a population of 13,782, and group it with Renfrew, leaving the county of Dumbarton with a population of 73,000, although it contained several burghs and populous places which might minimize the influence of the rural voters. He thought they ought rather to make a Dumbarton group of burghs; and he hoped, at any rate, that the Lord Advocate would meet this matter in a fair spirit.

MR. C. S. PARKER said, that, in common with the hon. Member who had just sat down, he had listened with great interest to the remarks made by the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bute (Mr. Dalrymple); and he entirely agreed with him when he said that, although the action of his hon. Friend in putting this Notice of Amendment on the Paper might cause them to have two debates on the subject, that might not be a loss, but a gain, because the Amendment raised the question of principle before proceeding to handle matters of detail. He thought that most of the Scotch Members were under the impression that, although the Government had made no formal declaration on the question of the grouping of burghs, yet, practically, they had determined that the Committee should not open it, except in regard to Parliamentary burghs already existing. But now they had a definite answer from the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill; not that the Government were prepared to agree to further grouping, but that they were prepared to admit the free discussion of that, among other proposals, for the re-arrangement of burghs. He thought Scotland had not in this Bill been considered with as much care as the more important and larger part of the United Kingdom. He thought that principles had been laid down chiefly with reference to England, and that these principles had been too hastily applied to Scotland. No attempt had been made in the Bill to mitigate the anomalies presented by the old Scottish system of grouped burghs. Throughout Scotland, he believed, the impression had gone abroad that, in making any proposals for the amendment of the present inconvenient arrangement, it was necessary to confine themselves to such arrangements as would not include any burgh that was not already a Parliamentary burgh. But he now understood, from what had fallen from the right hon. Baronet, that they were not so precluded. If that were so, he would suggest that, having now received an answer on the question of principle, they might postpone further debate until they reached the Schedules of the Bill. It would be to the benefit of Scotland that they should allow the country to consider the question. In his own county of Ayr they should be allowed to reconsider their position as to the grouping proposed in the Bill in the light of the new declaration from the Treasury Bench. Under the circumstances, he hoped the discussion on the question of principle would not be greatly prolonged.

MR. COCHRAN-PATRICK said, he did not think that his hon. Friend the Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing) had quite followed the development of the question; because he had not alluded to the fact that the Lord Advocate, who proposed that the representation of Ayrshire should be curtailed, had very recently put on the Paper certain proposals which practically gave back to the county of Ayrshire the representation which it now had. He was inclined to be satisfied with that Amendment; but he wished to take the opportunity of saying that he had heard the remarks of the right hon. Baronet, and looked upon his statement with great satisfaction. He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Mr. Parker) that the country should have an opportunity of considering the matter; and as they would have a certain opportunity of raising a great number of these points of detail when the Schedules were reached, he ventured to suggest that his hon. Friend should withdraw his Amendment.

MR. BUCHANAN said, he was obliged to confess that he did not wholly agree with the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Mr. Parker). He had heard with surprise the statement of the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill, because it appeared to him to be absolutely contradictory, not only of what had been said by Members of the Government on former occasions, but of what he himself had stated at an earlier period of the sitting. He understood the right hon. Baronet to say, when discussing the Amendment of the hon. Member for Downpatrick, Mr. Mulligan, that the Government thought the extension of grouping was generally undesirable, and that they should be more desirous of limiting than extending its principle. The results in Wales and Scotland, the right hon. Baronet went on to say, had not been so good as to make it desirable to extend the system in England and Ireland, and the Government had made up their minds to resist the extension of the system. What the right hon. Baronet said now appeared to him Mr. Buchanan somewhat different. The door was open, he said, to proposals for extension of the system of grouping, that might be brought forward by the hon. Member for Bath. The hon. Member for Perth was therefore perfectly justified in welcoming the present statement of the right hon. Baronet, because it gave him and the other Friends of the grouping system an opportunity of extending, or at least an invitation to extend that system in Scotland, by adding burghs having no Parliamentary representation to the existing groups.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said that he had stated that if they negatived the Amendment it would be quite open to them to raise the question again on the Schedule of the Bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN: It is in our power to carry any Amendment we like when the Bill does not move, but we want to know whether Amendments for the extension of grouping are, in the opinion of the Government, a desirable Amendment or not.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: I have already discussed the question on its merits, and as anything we can do would not prevent its being reconsidered on the Schedule.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I do not want to enter on any alteration, but I think the right hon. Baronet did discuss the question on its merits earlier in the day.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: The earlier Amendment shut out all further discussion on the question of Irish burroughs; but that is not the case with the Amendment before the Committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he was glad to have obtained some further explanation from the right hon. Baronet. It was evident that hon. Members had found considerable ambiguity in his remarks on the question of grouping burghs. His hon. Friend the Member for Perth, Mr. Parker, had said he hoped the statement of the right hon. Baronet would go down to Scotland and be duly considered, and the hon. Member for North Ayrshire, Mr. Cochran-Patrick, viewing the statement with satisfaction, said that a number of Amendments would be proposed on the Schedule in order to carry it out. He, Mr. Buchanan, should deprecate entirely any such step as the extension of the system of grouping in Scotland. He had always maintained that it was fallacious to treat a group of burghs as if it were a single burgh. The population standard should have been applied to the contributory burghs individually, not to the group collectively, and the same standard should have been applied, and in the same way, to all parts of the United Kingdom. That was the only logical method of dealing with the problem, and he regretted that it had not been adopted by the Government.

Sir JOHN HAY said, that one would have supposed that a Bill which gave an additional number of Members to Scotland would have provided some additional representation for the more populous parts of Scotland. But in the case of the county of Ayr, although 12 Members had been added for Scotland, this county, now represented by three Members, was in future to have only two. Again, with regard to the county of Stirling, he found that out of the 112,000 persons contained in the whole county, 70,000 lived in towns and 40,000 in the rural districts, and yet, by the proposal now before the Committee, there would be two Members given to the latter, and one only to the former. That surely could not be a fair arrangement, and as there were many towns in Scotland to which the same principle was applied in the Bill, he was glad that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to consider for this matter, and he hoped that before the Bill left the House some arrangement would be made by which the burghs and towns of Scotland which had burghal government, and which were united under Act of Parliament as places self-governing, should be represented as hitherto.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): My right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) rather deprecated a discussion of the general question just now, inasmuch as, he said, the whole matter would be opened on the Schedules. But I think if any hon. Member interpreted what he said as implying any intention on the part of the Government to propose the addition of new towns to the existing groups of burghs, my right hon. Friend's meaning was misapprehended. There was no such intention conveyed. Had it been the view of Her Majesty's Government that it would be a fit and proper thing either to increase the number of groups or the number of units of existing groups, they would have placed upon the Paper Amendments to carry out that object. But there are no such Amendments on the Paper. My right hon. Friend indicated that the matter would be fully open for discussion when the Schedules are reached, and that if before that time there did appear to be a widely prevalent feeling on the part of the Scotch Members that such additions should be made, then that matter would be duly considered by the Government. I do not, however, think there is the least likelihood of a proposal of the kind emanating from Her Majesty's Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. Orr Ewing) asks whether the views I expressed on this question have been changed. I can inform my hon. Friend that my opinions have not changed. The general principle throughout the Three Kingdoms has been to distinguish between burgh and shire. It is an exceptional thing to have, as in Scotland, groups of burghs arising historically from somewhat exceptional causes, and the causes which led to these groups being formed are much less in operation now than in former days, because in the old times there was a sharper distinction between the old Royal burghs and the surrounding counties than now exists between town and county. From time to time these burghs have been increased by the addition of places that were not Royal burghs, but which were elevated to the rank of Parliamentary burghs. But when the whole country is receiving an identical franchise, many of the reasons which led to these distinctions ceased to exist; and when we have the number of populous places largely increasing in this country, and are prepared to extend this system almost indefinitely, I say it would be impossible to increase the number in the manner indicated by my hon. Friend. It has been suggested that the only distinction should be between what have been termed agricultural and urban populations. But I must point out that agriculture, although a very great and primary industry, is by no means the sole industry pursued in the counties. There are practically industries in villages and towns of all grades; and unless you are to cut out of the counties all those places which really give many of them their character, you cannot perform the kind of operation which would leave agriculture cut off alone from all other kinds of industry. If you find a county in which there are numerous places historically important, as Royal burghs, the proper course would be to take the county as you find it. So that, without pursuing the discussion of this question, I think it right to say that while it is both technically and substantially open to consideration on the Schedules, the view I formerly expressed on this matter is not changed. I rather think that my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbartonshire, in comparing Ayrshire with Fifeshire, had not adverted to the fact that a change has been made as far as Ayrshire is concerned.

MR. ORR EWING: But not as regards Fifeshire.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): There was an intelligible reason in regard to Ayrshire, inasmuch as the original proposal involved the union of Argyllshire with the Island of Bute. But that proposal did not meet with approval to the requisite extent; and therefore what I may call a proposal to reinstate Kilmarnock in Ayrshire was made, with the result that, as far as Ayrshire is concerned, it will remain exactly as it was before. Now, my hon. Friend made some remarks, not strictly germane to the question, in regard to the manner in which particular counties had been treated. My hon. Friend complained that Ayrshire had not the requisite number of Members as compared with other counties. Now, I must point out to him that, as far as regards the non-borough part of Ayrshire, it has a population of something over 141,000, and for that it has two Members, while Fifeshire, with a population of 101,000, has only one Member. In the allocation of the new Members what has been done is strictly to follow the state of population, taking the largest first, and then coming downwards. If my hon. Friend had studied the statistics he would have seen that regard has been had to the subject of population. However, I will not pursue the argument on this matter now, because when the Select Committee have considered any proposals made by the hon. Member, will receive ample consideration, but the Government do not see that there is any necessity, either in the nature of the thing or in any precedent or general desire in Scotland for the extension of this system, that would cause it proper for them to propose such an extension.

Mr. BULLION said, that the two hon. Members opposite to appeared to speak of Stirlingshire as if with some knowledge. He claimed to have more knowledge of Stirlingshire than either of those hon. Gentlemen, and he said, without fear of contradiction, that the constituency or the electors in Stirlingshire were perfectly satisfied with the proposal of the Government which was to leave Stirlingshire as it stood in the Bill. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire, Mr. Orr, being took a paternal interest in the affairs of Stirlingshire. Mr. ORR (Lisac) I live there. He was aware of that, and it was very natural that he should take that paternal interest. But the hon. Member would eliminate from Stirlingshire all the small populous places.

Mr. ORR (Lisac) I did not say that. If he had not said so that day he had on many occasions previously and publicly. But he wanted to do that, for, by a re-arrangement of Stirlingshire, he proposed to relieve his own constituency of Dumbartonshire. Mr. ORR (Lisac) I have not proposed that. Now, he thought it was very desirable that the real object of hon. Gentlemen opposite in proposing a re-arrangement or re-grouping of the burghs should be well and thoroughly known. That object was nothing else than jerry-mandering; and the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire proposed, not on that occasion, but publicly and in the Committee Room of the House, to take from Stirlingshire, as a shire, all the small populous places in it, and re-group them with a few larger burghs. But, finding that the arrangement would not be entirely satisfactory, he also proposed to add to that group a populous place of his own district. And not that only, for it would not be sufficient to make the hon. Member secure; and accordingly he proposed to take out of Dumbartonshire many of the populous villages of that county, and add them to a new group of burghs. His hon. Friend had told the Committee that Dumbartonshire was one of the most rapidly-increasing counties in Scotland, so far as population was concerned, and in that statement his hon. Friend was not far from the truth. But the Dumbartonshire which he would leave was not that part of the county which was rapidly increasing in population. The part which was increasing in population was that composed of small villages, which the hon. Member would take out of the county altogether and group with the burghs. He had risen chiefly to say that the electors of Stirlingshire were perfectly satisfied with the present arrangement, and that nothing could be more unpopular, not only in Stirlingshire, but throughout Scotland, than the adoption of the principle which the hon. Member for Bute, Mr. Dalrymple, had proposed. He believed that if the Scotch Members were polled, they would, with one or two exceptions, vote against the proposal of the hon. Gentleman. He would also like to say that the announcement made that day by the right hon. Gentleman, Sir Charles W. Dilke, that the door was still open for reconsideration of the question whether places or burghs, not now grouped in Scotland, should be added to existing groups would cause considerable consternation, and he could not but regret that a statement so distinctly made had not been as distinctly withdrawn. For the explanation, it appeared to him, left the question in such a light that it would very much unsettle men's minds in Scotland with respect to this Bill.

Mr. PRESTON BRUCE said, with reference to what had been said about the over-representation of Fifeshire, he would content himself by saying that the constituencies in that county had been treated on the same principles as had been applied to all the other constituencies in the country. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) should have used words capable of being construed into an invitation for proposals to create new Parliamentary burghs. Not only was that totally inconsistent with what were understood to be the views of the Government, but they had it on record that the Lord Advocate himself considered any proposals of the kind inadmissible. A letter, read, he had no doubt, by all Scotch Members, had been published in the newspapers addressed to some Association in Dumbartonshire, and written by the Secretary to the Lord Advocate and by his directions, stating that, in the Lord Advocate's belief, the creation of new burghs, either to form new groups or to be added to existing groups, was outside the scope of the measure. Therefore, this subject of grouping had been discussed in Scotland on that basis, and the assumption had been that new burghs would not be created; that declaration of the Lord Advocate being taken as conclusive, so far as this matter was concerned. He felt certain that the Government could not intend to throw over their own official, the Lord Advocate, and to raise a question of this kind, when it was far too late to consider properly what new Parliamentary burghs should be created, and the forming of which would entirely upset the present arrangement.

Mr. DALRYMPLE said, that, after the discussion which had taken place, he was willing to withdraw his Amendment. He was not aware that at that time of day anyone proposed to produce fresh schemes of grouping in Scotland. He spoke for himself only when he said he was satisfied at the time with the answer obtained from the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), who had charge of the Bill, and he still remained satisfied, although they had had a somewhat different version of that answer from the Lord Advocate. He thought there was some satisfaction in hearing that the subject was still open for discussion on the Schedules; and he could only say it was not his intention to introduce large schemes of re-grouping, such as had been anticipated by hon. Gentlemen opposite. He repeated his satisfaction with the declaration made by the Government, and would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Mr. WARTON said, he gave the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) credit for perfect accuracy based upon the fullest knowledge in this matter; but he would ask him whether he was satisfied that the list in the second part of the first Schedule comprised all the counties of cities and towns in England?

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: I am satisfied that it is so.

Clause agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. R. N. FOWLER said, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would state what would be the Business taken to-morrow?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): We take to-morrow, first, the remainder of the Supplementary Civil Service Estimates, and then the Vote on Account. If there should be any time afterwards, we shall go on with the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer if there was any truth in a telegram which had just been received in regard to a further advance of Russian troops in Afghanistan?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I have no information since 3 o'clock to-day.

Tramways (Ireland) Provisional Order No. 1 of 1884. Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Labourers Act) (No. 1) of 1885.

INLAND REVENUE—INCOME TAX (IRELAND)—QUESTION

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE asked Her Majesty's Government, Why in Ireland, in calculating liability for income tax payable under Schedule B, it is, in lands let to tenants, calculated on rent actually paid, while on lands farmed by the owner it is calculated on ordnance value, when the owner can show from previous lettings that the letting value of such lands is considerably higher than the ordnance value?

LORD STURDELL, in reply, said, that the Income Tax under both Schedule A and Schedule B in Ireland was calculated upon the Poor Law valuation, known also as Griffith's, and called by the noble Lord "ordnance." The landowner was supposed to receive as rent the amount of the valuation, and he was taxed on that. The occupier was supposed to make as profit, in addition to the rent, one-third of that amount, and he was taxed on that—i.e., nominally on the whole valuation at one-third of the general rate of the tax.

These amounts were maxima, which could not be increased, and which were only reduced by way of remission in special cases. When land was in hand the landlord paid under both Schedules A and B) on figures calculated as thus explained. If, at the end of the year, he considered that his profit as occupier was less than the amount so calculated, he could appeal; and if he could put in figures to prove his case, the overcharge, under Schedule B, was repaid to him. In such figures on appeal—and this was the point to which the noble Lord was supposed to refer—the rent theoretically payable by him as occupier to himself as owner was put at the amount of the Poor Law valuation. This was obviously just, because that was the amount on which he was taxed as owner under Schedule A. If a larger allowance were made on the one side he ought, in equity, to pay the tax for a larger receipt on the other. Where the owner did not farm his own land, and the occupier applied for a remission, the actual rent paid was a fact which appeared in the accounts, and if it was larger than the valuation it was possible he might get a remission where the owner would not, if the land were in hand. But this was no hardship to the latter; in fact, it was the contrary, because he got a higher rent than the amount on which he was taxed. In short, the owner who had land in hand paid no more than was just and lawful, while on let land the occupier paid as much as could be properly claimed from him. Rents in all parts of Ireland except Ulster being even now sensibly, often considerably, in excess of the Poor Law valuation, landlords there habitually paid Income Tax on less than they received, and provision was made that in no case should they pay it on more than they received.

INDIA—THE BENGAL TENANCY BILL. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS, who had given Notice of his intention to put the following Question to the Secretary for India:—

Whether he will use his influence to cause the Bengal Tenancy Bill to be published and circulated, as amended by the Committee of the Council in India, before it is passed into law, so as to enable those interested in the measure, whether zamindars, middlemen, or ryots, to have an opportunity of becoming acquainted with its provisions?"

said, that he found that he stood somewhat in the position of the man who locked his stable door after his steed was stolen, because he had read in The Times of that morning a telegram to the effect that the Bill had been passed with little alteration, and that, though 250 zemindars and other proprietors of land protested against the measure, and the Viceroy received a deputation, he refused to delay the passing of the Bill. Thereupon the zemindars held a meeting and contributed a large sum of money to continue the agitation against the Bill. That showed a reason for bringing on the question two days ago. It appeared that the Under Secretary for India said in "another place" on Tuesday that there had been no haste; but the announcement to-day came upon those interested in the matter by surprise, and he trusted, therefore, that their Lordships would permit him to say a few words with regard to this measure, so as to explain the nature of the Question he was about to put to Her Majesty's Government in reference to it. In his view this Bengal Tenancy Bill was intended practically to extend to India the principles of the Irish Land Act. That was a fact. The history of this Bill was a somewhat curious one. A Bill on the subject was introduced in 1877 to enable the zemindars to collect their rents, such as was introduced into Parliament to enable Irish landlords, as it was stated ad nauseam, to collect their rents. But in 1883 another Bill appeared of a totally different character—a purely Irish Bill, having in it the principle of the three F's—namely, fixity of tenure, free sale, fair rent, as well as compensation for disturbance, and other points of similarity to the Irish Land Bill. In 1883-4 this Bill was referred to a Select Committee, and after various procedure, the Select Committee, composed of 11 Members, agreed to their Report by only three of a majority. The Report recommended various changes, and the Bill was not published or printed with these changes made in it till the 13th February. The object of himself and all those for whom he spoke was that some time should have been given—for it was now a matter that was past—for the consideration of the amended Bill, in which great and marked changes had been made. Instead of time being given the Bill had been rushed through. More time to consider it and the republication of the Bill in the vernacular were all that was asked for. But the Viceroy had to meet—and he was glad of it—the Ameer of Afghanistan on the 27th, and it was held that this Bill had to pass before the departure of the Viceroy. He could not but think that this matter had been followed up and pressed with undue—that was, unwise—haste. But the Bill would not become law until it received the sanction of the Secretary of State; and what he asked was, that the noble Lord would not give his assent to this Bill until there was a full opportunity of ascertaining what was the opinion of the public with regard to it both in India and in England.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH also complained that sufficient time had not been given for the consideration of the measure in its altered state. It should be remembered that the means of circulating information in India were not so good as in England. It seemed as if the Bill had been hurried through in order that the Viceroy might hurry off to the North-West Provinces to meet the Ameer of Afghanistan.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that before he went into the details, he thought it would be better for him to read copies of the telegrams which had passed between himself and the Viceroy since the discussion of Tuesday evening in the other House of Parliament. On that evening he telegraphed to the Viceroy as follows:—

"From Secretary of State, 10th March, 1885.

"Statement telegraphed by Durbhunga made in Parliament that you are pressing through Rent Bill without giving time for translation into vernacular; reason given that you must go to Simla. What shall I reply?"

He received the following reply:—

"From the Viceroy, dated and received 11th March, 1885.

"Your telegram 10th. Statement absolutely unfounded. Bill already twice translated into vernacular. Select Committee held 64 meetings. Of these, 28 held in Calcutta within last few months, Maharajah attended only seven. Committee consisted of 11 members, of whom only two go to Simla, and decided vernacular republication unnecessary because almost all alterations were excisions favourable to zemindars and not new clauses. After Bill reported fortnight elapsed before considered by Legislative Council. First motion in Council was for suspension by zemindar representative, which was lost by majority of 18 to 2. Two native members who do not go to Simla had voted before members of Executive Council were called upon to vote. Members representing ryots' interests voted in majority. Bill passed to-day without division, after seven days' debate.

He thought it was clear, from this, that not only had there not been haste in the passing of the Bill, but that the matter had received an extraordinary amount of deliberation and discussion. In 1877 there was a Bill introduced. That Bill was directed to giving more facilities for the recovery of rents; but it was considered it was impossible to deal with one branch of the subject only. The result was that it was thought desirable by the Viceroy of that time—not his noble Friend the Marquess of Ripon;—that there should be an inquiry into the whole subject of Bengal tenancy. In 1880 the Commission reported, their Report occupying about 500 pages. A Bill was brought forward in 1881. In March, 1882, the Indian Government sent home the Report of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, and the Report of a Commission formed upon it. On August 17, the matter was considered by the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington), and a despatch sent, stating the opinion of the Secretary of State in Council that the necessity for legislation had been established, and going into the matter, as would be seen from the Papers which would shortly be presented to Parliament. After the receipt of his noble Friend's despatch, the Bill was printed by the Legislative Department of the Government of India, and, in conformity with the views of Lord Hartington, a Bill was introduced into the Legislative Council on March 12, 1883, and referred to a Select Committee on the 15th, being then published in English and three vernacular languages. The Bill was then fully examined and criticized. An amended Bill was prepared, which was published in the early part of 1884. The Select Committee having expressed a wish for further information, reports, opinions and criticisms were obtained from a vast number of officials and other persons and published. With all these criticisms before them, he should have thought it might be imagined that the subject was ripe for some decision, some legislation. Upon the consideration of all this evidence, the Bengal Government again referred the matter to a Select Committee. On February 12, 1885, the Select Committee reported, stating that the measure was not so altered as to require to be republished, and recommending that it should be passed as amended.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: How many said that.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that he did not know, as he had not the numbers. The Select Committee consisted of six official and five non-official members, three Natives, and eight Europeans. The Government of India followed their recommendations. The important question was whether it was desirable to delay this legislation any further, and whether the alterations were of such a nature as to render it absolutely necessary there should be such delay. As he was informed, the alterations were not of a very serious or substantial character, and were, at all events, principally in the interests of the zemindars, who now came forward and complained of undue haste. So far as he could judge, the Government of India had acted perfectly right in not postponing this legislation for another Session, as the matter was pressing and had been under consideration a number of years. Information had reached him from India to the effect that the zemindars considered the legislation extremely unfair as regarded them, and that the ryots also looked upon the legislation as unfair towards them. Therefore, he thought, there was a strong presumption that the whole question had been treated in a fair and impartial manner. The noble Earl had spoken of the Bill as an attempt to introduce the three F's into India.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS observed, that he only said that it proceeded on the lines of the Irish legislation of Her Majesty's Government.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the Bill was prepared by gentlemen versed in Indian affairs, but who had nothing to do with Ireland. The Government had acted in the matter entirely upon Indian principles, and in accordance with Indian precedents. If the Indian legislation had any resemblance to Irish legislation it was merely a coincidence, as it was never intended to apply the same principles in countries so utterly dissimilar. The interference in India by the Courts between the zemindars and ryots was such that you could not import into it the observances of other countries. He had only to make one further observation in answer to a remark by the noble Earl that the Bill, although passed, was not yet law. He believed that the Bill would not come into operation for a certain time; but whenever it did operate, according to its own clauses, it would require no assent from the Crown, for an Act passed by the Legislative Council of India, and assented to by the Viceroy, took effect from the time of passing. Of course, it was open to the Secretary of State to advise Her Majesty to disallow the Bill. It would not be desirable that he should anticipate the result of a careful examination of the Bill when it came before him officially. At the same time he thought it his duty at once to state that this legislation had in principle the full approbation of Her Majesty's Government, and therefore it was extremely improbable that he should advise Her Majesty to disallow the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, that he might fairly claim that when he was in India he had taken special steps to afford the public the fullest opportunity of considering every measure that came before the Legislative Council. Therefore, it would be unfair towards the present Viceroy if, after the observations of the noble Earl (the Earl of Wemyss), he did not ask the House to allow him to express his entire approval of the course which his noble Friend (Lord Dufferin) had taken in passing the Bengal Tenancy Bill during the present sittings of the Council. The Bill had been before the Council for two whole years, and the question to which it related had been under the consideration of the public for a great deal longer. It had been taken up long before he went to India; one portion of it was considered in 1877, but it was found impossible to deal with that part alone. For that reason the Commission was issued to which reference had been made. When he went out to India that Commission was about to report or had just reported; he did nothing until he received from the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal his opinion upon the subject. Sir A. Eden's recommendations were then fully considered by the Government of India and the Bill of 1883 was brought in. After the Bill was published a great many observations were made upon it by those interested, and a Select Committee was appointed to consider the subject. As regarded the composition of that Committee he might mention that he took an unusual step, being anxious that the interests of the zemindars should be fully and completely represented. There happened to be two vacancies in the Legislative Council, and he requested the zemindars to recommend to him a gentleman to fill one of them. This they accordingly did, and the result was that the zemindars were very ably represented. The other vacancy he filled up by the appointment of the Maharajah of Durbhunga, one of the largest owners of land in the Province of Bengal. The Committee reported in 1884, making considerable changes in the Bill. The Bill was then reprinted, and from March to November, 1884, was before the public. If there was any subject which had been fully and thoroughly discussed, it was the Law of Landlord and Tenant in Bengal. The time had now in his opinion come when Lord Dufferin was perfectly justified in passing the Bill. The changes which had been made in the Bill were, as his noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) had explained, mainly in favour of the zemindars. Although not knowing the details of those changes, he was inclined to think that they were likely to be too much in favour of the landowners. He entirely concurred in the opinion expressed by his noble Friend the Secretary of State for India that Lord Dufferin was right in passing the Bill, as now it had been amply considered in all its bearings.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS remarked, that he did not in the least dispute that the discussion on this measure had lasted over many years. The point he raised was, that the changes made in the Bill by the late Committee were such that the Bill ought to have been reprinted and circulated before being passed. All that they asked for was to have an opportunity of seeing the Bill. As to the character of the Bill, he would not discuss it further except by stating that Sir Richard Garth, the Chief Justice, had said that he looked with horror and dismay upon this revolutionary measure.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY explained that he had received a copy of the Bill as amended by the Select Committee; what he had not yet received was a copy of the Bill as passed only a day or two ago by the Legislative Council.

EGYPT MILITARY EXPEDITION TO THE SUDAN)—VOTE OF THANKS TO THE TROOPS

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose that a vote of thanks be awarded by Parliament to General Lord Wolseley and the Forces under his command for the able manner in which the military expeditionary force was conducted for the intended rescue of the late General Gordon and his garrison in Khartoum? said, that he had observed that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War the Marquess of Hartington, in bringing forward the Supplementary Estimates in the other House, had made what he might term a merely parenthetical allusion to the conduct of our troops and the manner in which the Expeditionary Force had been handled, observing that no blame was to be attached in any way to the Military Force or to Lord Wolseley for having failed in the immediate object for which they had been sent out. On being twitted by an hon. Member with the small meed of praise he had bestowed, the noble Marquess had replied that such was not his intention, and that the Government were deeply sensible of the able and gallant manner in which Lord Wolseley and the Force under his command had acted. For his own part, he thought that if the Government were satisfied with the conduct of the Expedition, the Government ought, considering that the troops were about to go into what might be called summer cantonments, to show some recognition of their services by a direct Vote of Thanks from Parliament.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that a similar Question was to be put in the other House that evening, and his answer to the noble Earl would be the same as that given by the Secretary of State for War—namely, that, in the opinion of the Government, the Question was at present somewhat premature. He could assure the noble Earl that it was not from any want of appreciation of the gallant and magnificent services of Lord Wolseley and the officers and men under him that the Government had come to that conclusion. The courage and endurance showed by the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of every branch of the Service had elicited the warmest feeling of gratitude, not only in the minds of the Government, but, he might also say, of all their countrymen. He could assure the House that the Government were fully sensible of the services which had been rendered by our Forces in the Sudan.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he considered the reply of the noble Earl a most unsatisfactory one. ["Order!"] As he was called to Order, he would give Notice that on that day week he would bring forward a Resolution on the subject.

ELECTION OF SCOTCH REPRESENTATIVE PEERS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY asked the Lord Chancellor, Whether he can inform the House why a full report of the proceedings at Holyrood House on the 17th of February last, on the occasion of the assembly of the Scotch Peers by Royal Proclamation to elect two representatives in the place of the late Earls of Dundonald and Morton, has not been made to this House by the Lord Clerk Register; and whether the Lord Chancellor will call for this usual report to be forwarded from Edinburgh without further delay? He explained that he had been unable to be present at the election in consequence of the death of a near relative. Under these circumstances, he had proposed to exercise his vote by proxy, and had sent it by a noble Friend of his. But he learned from the public prints that a discussion took place as to whether that vote was valid or not. It was stated at the meeting that a full Report of the whole proceedings would, as usual, be sent to the House of Lords; but although three weeks had passed since the re-ascending of Parliament, he had not yet seen the Report.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the proper Return had been laid on the Table of the House that day. He was informed that it was earlier and not later than usual, considering the date of the election.

QUESTIONS.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (SCOT-LAND)—SCHOOL BOARD FOR LENZIE.

DR. CAMERON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether his attention has been called to a memorial from the inhabitants of Lenzie, praying that facilities be given them to erect Lenzie into a School Board district;

whether it is the fact that that portion of Lenzie which is in Cadder parish has to pay an education rate of 10d., and that which is in the School Board district of Kirkintilloch a rate of 7d. in the £, and that the public schools provided are so distant and so unsuitable for the requirements of the Lenzie population that a large number of the children have to be sent for education to Glasgow; whether Her Majesty's Inspector, Dr. Kerr, has reported that the alleged deficiency in public school accommodation does actually exist, and calls for immediate remedy; whether Cadder parish is willing to sanction the disjunction for educational purposes of that portion of Lenzie which lies within it; whether the difficulty in the way of submitting the question to a decision of the sheriff does not lie in the fact that no provision is made in the Scottish Education Act for the disjunction of portions of burghal School Board districts; and, whether he will introduce, or would support, if introduced, a short Bill to enable communities included in burghal as well as rural School Board districts to apply to the sheriff for disjunction?

MR. MUNDELLA: A Memorial has been received from the inhabitants of Lenzie to the effect stated in the Question of my hon. Friend, and the facts as set forth in the second paragraph appear to be correct. Dr. Kerr, Her Majesty's Inspector, reports that the public schools at Auchenloch are overcrowded, and those of Kirkintilloch are full. Kirkintilloch objects to the disjunction of Lenzie, while Cadder is willing on certain conditions. We have no power under the Act to separate portions of a parish and a burgh, and unite them under a school board of their own. We think it undesirable to multiply school board areas, and we should prefer that the recommendation of Dr. Kerr was acted upon, and a combination school by the parish and borough set up for Lenzie. We will endeavour to effect this, and secure for the inhabitants of Lenzie a school suitable to their requirements.

DR. CAMERON asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the inhabitants of Lenzie did not want combination?

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes Sir; but it would require legislation to separate Lenzie.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ROBERT GRAHAM, CLERK TO THE GUARDIANS, COOTEHILL.

Mr. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Robert Graham, clerk to the Guardians at Cootehill, gave his evidence on oath before Mr. Mathison, B.L., on 28th January 1885; what is the result of the inquiry he stated, on 8th instant, he had made; and, whether, taking into account the general conduct of Graham, and all the circumstances, he will allow him to hold his situation?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It appears that Mr. Graham's evidence before Mr. Mathison was not given on oath, but that it was verified next day by a declaration before a magistrate. Mr. Graham is the officer of the Cootehill Board of Guardians, and before coming to a decision on the case, the Local Government Board think it right to communicate with them and to invite an expression of their opinion on Mr. Graham's conduct. A letter in this sense was, I believe, sent to the Guardians yesterday.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND).

Mr. T. A. DICKSON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether in any Registration Bill to be brought in for the purpose of placing on the registers the great numbers of additional voters entitled to the franchise, provision will be made for the remuneration of clerks of unions, rate collectors, and other officials, for their greatly increased duties, and if the Bill will provide that the expense shall not fall upon the rate-payers?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): The matter to which the hon. Member refers in this Question is a very important one, and is at the present moment under the consideration of the Irish Government. I will communicate the result to the hon. Member at the earliest moment.

Mr. HEALY asked whether the Irish Government would follow the course adopted in England and Scotland by asking the Irish Revising Barristers as to the character of the Bill for Ireland?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he could not give any opinion on that matter. The Government were making the best inquiries they could.

HER MAJESTY'S PALACE OF WINDSOR.

Mr. BROADHURST asked the Junior Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is true that the redecoration of Her Majesty's private suite of rooms at Windsor Castle was let on contract last year to a Mr. Cooper of Windsor; whether it is true that the contractor then relet the loose gilt portion by sub-contract, at the lowest possible price, to a cheap shop in Soho (London), and that on the work being taken to its place for fixture, the Inspector of Palaces severely condemned it as a disgraceful work, only permitting it to be fixed on account of the immediate return of Her Majesty, and, on condition, that it was taken down and re-gilt; and, whether he will see that in the letting of future contracts, guarantees shall be demanded that the work be properly and efficiently done by competent skilled labour, and not hawked about the poorest neighbourhoods of London in search of the cheapest and most inefficient labour?

Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he regretted he was unable to give any information on the subject. It was not a matter for which the Treasury had any responsibility.

Mr. BROADHURST gave Notice that, on going into Committee of Supply on the Vote for the Lord Chamberlain's Office, he would call attention to the matter.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—MONAGHAN WORKHOUSE—DR. HALL, MEDICAL OFFICER.

Mr. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the language used by Dr. Hall, the medical officer of Monaghan Workhouse, reported in The Monaghan Standard of 7th February; whether this official, presiding over an Orange Lodge, is reported to have said—

"Some of them perhaps had read Parnell's utterances a few days ago in county Clare. He said, 'You are the descendants of the men whom Cromwell sent to hell or Connaught. He only succeeded in sending you as far as Connaught.' He (Dr. Hall) considered it was a pity they did not get sent a little further."

whether any repudiation by Dr. Hall of the sentiments attributed to him has appeared; and, if the use of such language by public officials is to be tolerated?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I have seen a letter from Dr. Hall, in which he explains that the language he used is not quite accurately represented in the newspaper report quoted in the Question. He states that his words did not point to the extreme alternative suggested, but that what he intended to convey was an expression of his opinion that it would have been for the good of the country if those who sympathized with the projects of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had gone across the Atlantic. Dr. Hall is not a public officer in the sense that his whole time is at the disposal of the public; and I do not think the incident calls for any action on the part of the Government.

MR. HEALY asked whether Dr. Hall did not allow a month to pass before he contradicted the report?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he had no information on the point.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—CAVAN CO. FREE FORCE.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the police who are supposed to protect James M'Cullough, of Drumkilla, county Cavan, delayed behind him drinking at the fair of Bailieboro', and did not overtake him till he had got three miles from the town; whether one of the policemen was so much under the influence of drink he rolled on the road; and, whether the expense of these policemen will be charged on the ratepayers of the locality?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: There is no foundation for any of the allegations in this Question. The police who are protecting James M'Cullough are men of exemplary character. They are part of the Free Force of the county, and are not charged on the locality.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—THE RECESS POLICE.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Mr. Healy

Were charges of drunkenness and assault brought against the Recess police by Thomas Lydon on the 31st October 1884; why was not a sworn inquiry granted, as demanded, and were the charges forwarded; did the police at Recess then bring two charges against Thomas Lydon, and were the cases dismissed; did the police then bring a charge against Thomas Lydon in connection with illicit whiskey, and was it dismissed on the merits; did the police appeal in the latter case, and did the Recorder of Galway attribute partiality to the Bench who dismissed the case, consisting as it did of two resident magistrates; was Lydon then convicted; and, will the Government obtain from the resident magistrates their opinion on the case, and consider the advisability of remitting the fine?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Thomas Lydon brought charges of assault and drunkenness against the police at Recess in a letter which he wrote to the District Inspector in November last. The District Inspector investigated the charges, and came to the conclusion that they were groundless. He so informed Lydon, and added that it was open to him, if he wished, to proceed against the police at Petty Sessions. Lydon did not do so, nor did he ask for a sworn inquiry, and the charges were forwarded to the County Inspector. Subsequently, the police brought two charges against Lydon—one for leaving his car on the road without a driver, and the other for furious driving. The first charge was withdrawn, and the second dismissed. Lydon was also charged with having illicit whiskey in his possession; but the Bench, on which there were two Resident Magistrates, dismissed the case on the merits. The Recorder of Galway afterwards reversed this decision, on appeal, and convicted Lydon, and I understand he expressed the opinion that the case was a very clear one. If Lydon desires a remission or mitigation of the penalty imposed, the proper course would be for him to address a Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant, and the facts of the case would then be investigated.

MR. HEALY asked whether there were not more appeals?

ISLANDS OF THE PACIFIC—ALLEGED CESSION OF ISLANDS

Mr. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to the following statement made by the late Governor General of Canada in The Nineteenth Century:—

"It should not be possible for Downing Street to negotiate with France about the abrogation of her fishing rights in Newfoundland without informing Canada of what is contemplated. It should not be possible for British Ministers to propose that France be given islands in the Pacific in lieu of rights in Newfoundland without consulting Australia."

whether the negotiations referred to by Lord Lorne are still pending, or are come to a conclusion; which are the islands in the Pacific that the Government proposed to give to France without consulting Australia; and, whether, before any Treaty is concluded, full information on the subject will be given to the Governments of the Australian Colonies and New Zealand and to the British Parliament?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: I have noticed the statement in question. The negotiations referred to are still pending. They relate to the Society Islands, part of the Tahiti group, and at a great distance from any part of Australia. They involve no cession of territory to France, but a possible waiver of rights under a declaration relating to those Islands in return for reciprocal concessions. There is no question of the conclusion of any Treaty. The interests of the Australian Colonies in these negotiations will not be lost sight of; but there is nothing which calls for any departure from the usual course of proceeding in such matters.

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—DUTY ON BEER

Mr. HICKS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in consideration of the very serious and continued reduction in the value of barley since the substitution of a Duty on Beer for the Malt Duty, a measure which was brought in professedly to benefit the farmers, he will make provision in the Budget for a reduction of the Duty on Beer brewed from malt and hops, to a sum representing the real equivalent of the Duty on Malt under the old system?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER Mr. CHILDESS: I am afraid that my only answer to the hon. Member must be that I cannot tell him or the House what will be in my Budget before I make my Financial Statement next month.

Mr. HICKS gave Notice that he would ask whether the right hon. Gentleman would state the number of quarters of barley returned in 1884 as having been sold below 32s. per quarter?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER Mr. CHILDESS: I cannot give that information; it is not in my power.

NAVY—ARMOURD VESSELS—ERROR IN RETURNS

SIR EDWARD J. REED asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, With reference to the Return of Her Majesty's "Ships Built and Building" lately presented by him to this House, with what object he has inserted, under the heading "Armoured Vessels," seventeen recently built vessels which are not armoured, and which were described as "Unarmoured Vessels" in the Return "Navy (Ships Built)," presented to Parliament by Command of Her Majesty in August last, and printed by Order of this House; and, whether the Diagram attached to his Return, which purports to compare the tonnage of "Armoured Ships" built by the present Board of Admiralty with that built by their predecessors has been so constructed as to comprise all, or any, of these seventeen unarmoured ships; and, if so, whether he will cause an amended Return and Diagram, to be forthwith presented, showing the correct amounts of armoured tonnage?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: I regret that the error to which the Question refers should have escaped observation. It will be corrected in an amended Return. I desire to add that the Return which has been presented to the House is intended to combine all the particulars which have hitherto been given in Returns moved for by the late Mr. Laird, the right hon. and gallant Member for the Wigtown Burghs, and by my Predecessors in the Office of Secretary to the Admiralty. In the Diagram attached to the Return the tonnage of "Armoured Ships" does not include any unarmoured ships, except for the year 1882-3, when the Polyphemus and Mersey were classed as armoured.

SIR EDWARD J. REED said, he should like to ask whether, in view of the great importance of the error, it had been traced to its source?

[No reply.]

SPAIN—COMMERCIAL NEGOTIATIONS —THE SPANISH ANTILLES.

MR. TOMLINSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is now prepared to state whether the Government intend to enter upon any negotiations for the purpose of relieving British trade with the Spanish Antilles from the adverse differential treatment to which it is now subjected?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir Robert Morier, who has returned to Madrid, has been instructed to bring forward this subject in the negotiations which he will enter upon with the Spanish Government during his stay in that capital.

CIVIL SERVICE APPOINTMENTS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in view of the appointment of a new Committee on Civil Service Expenditure, he will, in accordance with the spirit of the Report of a former Committee of this House, of which he was Chairman, order a suspension of all new appointments to Class I. and the Upper Division clerkships, particularly as the inquiry may show that there will be a redundancy of such appointments in various Departments; whether any temporary inconvenience occasioned by the suspension of new appointments might not readily be met by the transfer of men who are already declared to be redundant in certain Departments; whether he has been able to transfer any of the redundant clerks from the Customs to fill vacancies in Class I. or the Higher Division elsewhere; and, whether he is aware that, notwithstanding his statement and the recommendations of the Committee of which he was Chairman, and the fact of there being an existing redundancy in certain offices, the Civil Service Commissioners have just held an examination for new appointments to Class I. and the Upper Division?

Sir Thomas Brassey

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): The hon. Member can hardly have appreciated the meaning of the answer which I gave to him on the 7th of November last. I explained to him that until lately I had had nothing to do with the matters with which the Report of the Committee of 1873 dealt; and I pointed out to him that the recommendations of the Committee itself, even if they had been followed out, were not what the hon. Member's Question implied. As to the present position of the question, the appointment of the Committee on Civil Service Expenditure is resisted, and perhaps it will not be carried. But even if it is carried, I cannot assume that its inquiries will result in all appointments to superior clerkships being suspended, and it is quite clear to me that the present redundant Customs clerks are not competent to fill several offices which are or may become vacant. As to his third Question, no redundant clerks from the Customs have been appointed to fill vacancies in the first class. They passed examinations of a very inferior character to those which first-class clerks are required to pass.

SOUTH AFRICA—WHITE ADVENTURERS IN STELLALAND.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR (for Sir WILLIAM M'ARTHUR) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true, as reported in the Cape papers, that Mr. Rhodes, the Deputy Commissioner, promised the white adventurers in Stellaland that the titles to land contained in the register of the so-called Government of that territory would be recognised by England; and, if so, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to sanction grants of land without inquiry as to whether they were obtained from the natives by legal means or by violence?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I am unable to add anything to the information which is already in the possession of my hon. Friend in the Blue Books laid last year before Parliament. In July Mr. Mackenzie entered into the following undertaking (page 125, C. 4,194, August):—

"I ratify the claims to the farms which were drawn by lottery by the original volunteers under David Masson, or otherwise that farms of equal value or fair compensation be granted to those volunteers or the holders of their titles."

In September, Mr. Rhodes, who had succeeded Mr. Mackenzie, ratified this, and agreed page 123, C. 4, 213, (October) "that the land titles of Stellaland be recognized." Early in December, Sir Charles Warren announced to the Stellalanders that the settlement would be adhered to. Sir Hercules Robinson, a few days later, telegraphed that, in his opinion, the settlement of the 8th of September should be adhered to, and the Secretary of State, in reply, approved. The principle adopted, therefore, appears to be that, provided the White men can be confirmed in their present occupation on conditions equitable for the Natives, Her Majesty's Government do not, as at present advised, propose to interfere. They reserve, however, all final conclusions until they have the result of the investigation which, apparently, is now being conducted by Sir Charles Warren, as there may be cases in which it would be impossible to sanction the grant.

ZANZIBAR—SUCCESSION TO THE SOVEREIGNTY.

Mr. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government will lay upon the Table Papers relating to the succession to the Sovereignty of Zanzibar?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The subject of the succession has not been discussed by Her Majesty's Government. There are consequently no Papers to be laid.

Mr. BOURKE: Are there any Papers upon the subject which have come into the possession of the Government since they came into Office?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I am not aware of any, but I will inquire.

EGYPT—PRINCE BISMARCK—THE PAPERS

Mr. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government can lay upon the Table any Despatch supporting the statement of Prince Bismarck, that upon several occasions he had been asked to tender "advice or a hint" to the English Government as to how it should deal with Egypt, or as to what it might do in Egypt which would at the same time meet with the approval of Prince Bismarck?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government do not propose to lay any more Papers, whether of the time of the late or of the present Administration, relating to the controversy in question.

WEST AFRICAN CONFERENCE—THE PAPERS.

Mr. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Papers relating to the West African Conference will be laid upon the Table?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Despatches from Sir Edward Malet, giving the results of the Conference, were distributed yesterday. The remainder of the Papers will be laid as soon as the translations of the Protocols and accompanying Papers are completed. It is expected that they will be ready next week.

Mr. BOURKE: Cannot the Convention be laid on the Table?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: All Protocols and Papers will be in the hands of Members next week.

BRITISH MINISTERS ABROAD—THE EMBASSY AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

Mr. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, How much longer is this Country to be left unrepresented by an Ambassador at the Ottoman Porte?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir Edward Thornton will proceed to Constantinople as Her Majesty's Ambassador as soon as the requirements of the Public Service will permit of his leaving St Petersburg.

NAVY—THE ENGINEERS' COMMITTEE—THE REPORT.

Mr. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he will state the reason for the delay in coming to a conclusion on the Report of the Committee which was laid before the Lords Commissioners in November or December last; and when action on the Report may be expected?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The Report of the Committee on the Engineers has led to the consideration of many important questions of detail with reference to relative rank, retiring allowance, and uniform. It has not yet been possible to arrive at a conclusion on all these points.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (SCOTLAND) —EDUCATION IN THE HIGHLANDS—MR CRAIK'S REPORT.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether his attention has been directed to the following paragraph in Paper (C. 4,261, of 1884, page 4, written by Mr. Craik of the Scottish Education Department:—

"I may perhaps be permitted to refer to the regret expressed to me by several of those who take an interest in Education in the Highlands, that statements with regard to the Education Acts were admitted in evidence by the Commissioners without being subjected to the test of cross-examination, which would have been most useful in exposing their fallacies, and perhaps in explaining more fully to the people the advantages of making use of the opportunities which the Acts throw open ;"

whether he is aware that the sittings of the Crofters' Commission, referred to in the above paragraph, were advertised, and all the evidence taken in public; whether the inquiries made by Mr. Craik were conducted in private; whether he will order the notes (if any) taken by Mr. Craik at the time of his inquiries, to be published and laid upon the Table, giving dates, localities, and persons; and, whether, if this cannot be done, he will order the paragraph reflecting upon a public Commission, to be withdrawn and cancelled?

MR. MUNDILLA: Mr. Craik assures me that he had no intention of reflecting upon the Commission. He was instructed to inquire and report to the Department as to the best means of meeting the educational requirements of the crofters, and he naturally made himself acquainted with the views of those in the localities who are most interested, and have had most to do with educational work. I have myself heard similar expressions of regret that more evidence of the kind referred to was not taken by the Commission. I understand that some Members of the Commission have expressed their satisfaction with the Report. There are no notes of Mr. Craik's that can be laid on the Table of this House.

RAILWAYS INDIA — THE QUETTA RAILWAY.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he is now prepared to state what progress has been made with the Quetta Railway; whether the means of communication with Quetta by railway will be accelerated by means of works of a temporary character; and whether any works for a military railway will be undertaken in the direction of Candahar?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The despatch from the Government of India on the subject of this railway has now been received. The whole of the earthwork from Hurnai to Gurkai, 65 miles, with the exception of the heavy cutting at Mud Gorgo, and some other trifling portions, has been completed. More than half of the tunnel headings of the Chappar Rift have been driven through; material for most of the bridges has been collected; and the final portion of the line to Quetta has been planned and marked out. The line will probably be opened throughout for traffic in the course of 1887-8. I am not able to say how far it might be possible to accelerate the communications by means of works of a temporary character. There is no present intention of extending the line beyond Shebo.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked if the hon. Gentleman would inquire whether the works could be accelerated?

MR. J. K. CROSS said, that as soon as the tunnel was completed it might be possible to accelerate the other portion of the works. He would make inquiry.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—OLD-CASTLE PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. SHEIL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the ratepayers of the Union of Oldcastle, in the county of Meath, are burdened with the sum of £150 for the maintenance of an illegitimate and deserted child named James Farelly; that the magistrates of the Oldcastle Petty Sessions signed a warrant for the arrest of the mother of the said child, which they afterwards cancelled; that by so acting the magistrates enabled the putative father, a wealthy Protestant, to avoid the payment of maintenance for the child; whether the conduct of the magistrates was legal; and, whether redress will be given to the ratepayers of Oldcastle?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: A complaint similar to that described in this Question has been made by the Board of Guardians of Oldcastle Union to the Lord Chancellor, who, after investigating the circumstances, has arrived at the conclusion that the magistrates were perfectly right in recalling the warrant, which, on the face of it, was illegal. He adds that by so doing they did not in any way enable the person who by law was liable to pay for the maintenance of the child to avoid that payment.

ARMY—ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY. WOOLWICH CADETS.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Gentlemen Cadets of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich have, this term, been deprived of two small intermediate meals, to which they had previously been accustomed, whether this has been done from motives of economy or retrenchment, and, whether, since the interval between 7.55 a.m. for breakfast, and 2.15 p.m. for luncheon, is larger than is desirable for growing youths undergoing constant exertion, mentally and bodily, he will inquire whether the scale of charges already paid for board and education may not be sufficient to admit of a better arrangement?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Some variation has been made in the hours of the principal meals in the interests of the cadets themselves and on the recommendation of the medical officer. This has involved the abolition of two small meals, but the luncheon has been improved. It is not anticipated that any saving will result from the change. I may add that the cadets are understood to be pleased with the new arrangement.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked whether the noble Marquess did not think that the interval between 7.55 a.m. and 2.15 p.m. was too long for growing youths, who were constantly employed, to go without food.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The medical authorities are better able to judge of that than I am.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTIONS.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If, as President of the Local Government Board in Ireland, he will take steps to secure that, in the forthcoming Poor Law elections, the returning officers shall be required to perform their duties in an impartial manner; whether he will direct them either to furnish copies of the lists of electors in full to the candidates or their agents on receiving reasonable payment for same, or else permit them to copy the lists during office hours; and, as the claims to vote lodged by owners of property contain long and complicated details necessarily requiring time to examine in order to ascertain their correctness, whether he will direct the returning officers to give facilities for the inspection of same by the candidates and their agents before the scrutiny of votes is held?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Local Government Board have no reason to apprehend that the Returning Officers will not discharge their duties at the coming elections in an impartial manner, and they see no necessity to make special regulations to govern their proceedings, or to amend the General Order on the subject, which has been in force for many years. The Local Government Board have recently re-issued to Returning Officers their instructions as to the mode in which these elections are to be conducted.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked whether it was not a fact that during the past three or four years numerous complaints were made against the Returning Officers in the Unions of Baltinglass, Rathdrum, and Shillelagh by popular candidates, and that upon investigation the elections of several Conservative candidates were declared void; and whether the right hon. Gentleman considered that a satisfactory state of things to which he would give his sanction?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am aware that there have been numerous complaints. What I say is that there is no need for new regulations, and the old regulations, if properly carried out, are sufficient, and, by way of stimulating the memory of the Returning Officers, the Local Government Board have re-issued those regulations.

EPPING FOREST ACT, 1878—SALE OF LANDS.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has observed that it is intended to sell about four acres of Epping Forest to the Woodford Local Board; and, whether such sale is not in contravention of "The Epping Forest Act, 1878," s. 7, sub-section 2, which says—

"Subject to the provisions of this Act the Conservators shall not sell, demise, or otherwise alienate any part of the Forest?"

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had received information from the City authorities that this land was taken by the Woodford Local Board under the compulsory powers conferred upon them by the Public Health Act of 1882. The civic authorities, therefore, had no option in the matter.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — TIPPERARY GRAND JURY—BENEDINE BRIDGE, NENAGH.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Great Southern and Western Railway Company of Ireland agreed to give the Grand Jury of the county Tipperary a sum of £200, for the construction of a suitable approach to Benedine Bridge, near Nenagh, on the Company's Line from Nenagh to Bird Hill; whether said approach would run through the lands of Mr. George Bolton, Crown Solicitor for the county, and whether Mr. George Bolton subsequently received the sum of £200 from the Grand Jury; whether Mr. George Bolton had not, for his own convenience, agreed to construct the new approach at his own expense, if the Grand Jury allowed him to receive the £200; whether the presentment for the nominal sum of 2s. 6d. for the construction of said approach was taken out by Mr. Bolton's clerk and steward, William Clear, in the year 1878, and a portion of the approach laid out; whether the approach has not yet been made, and does Mr. Bolton, notwithstanding, still retain the £200; whether Mr. Bolton is solicitor to the Grand Jury; and, what course the Government will take in the matter?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have received a telegram from the secretary of the Grand Jury of Tipperary, in which he states that a presentment was made for 2s. 6d. by the Nenagh Grand Jury to legalize an alteration in a road through the Bolton property. The Railway Company contributed £200, which Mr. Bolton received. The works are nearly finished, and the old road is not interfered with. Mr. Bolton is solicitor to the Grand Jury. There is nothing in this which calls for the interference of Government.

ARMY—THE ROYAL ENGINEERS—MILITARY FOREMEN OF WORKS.

MR. CAUSTON asked the Secretary of State for War, If the Military Foremen of Works of the Royal Engineers, referred to in his reply to the honourable and learned Member for Oatham on 2nd March, will, when commissioned, perform the duties of Regimental Quartermaster or duties of a professional nature in the Royal Engineer Department?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is not contemplated that these quartermasters should perform regimental duty. The duties will be strictly professional in the Royal Engineer Department. The hon. Member may not be aware that the rank of quartermaster is conferred in several cases which do not involve regimental duty as such.

ARMY—QUARTERMASTERS.

MR. CAUSTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the statements of the disabilities of Army Quartermasters, which have been recently received in the War Office, had been previously seen, supported, and recommended by His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief or by the Adjutant General of the Army?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The statements respecting the position of the quartermasters have been under the consideration of various branches of the War Department, including, of course, the Military Departments; but it is contrary to official practice to publish the opinions given confidentially to the Secretary of State by his military advisers.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY—PHOTOGRAPHS OF PICTURES.

MR. TOMLINSON asked the Junior Lord of the Treasury, as representing the First Commissioner of Public Works, Whether he can state what were the arrangements under which Messrs. Braun and Co. of Germany, and Messrs. Goupil and Co. of Paris were allowed to photograph the pictures at the National Gallery; whether any English firm of photographers would be allowed the same facilities as to taking pictures from the walls or removing the glass, or otherwise, as were allowed to those firms, or either of them, or would be allowed the use of the front of the Gallery for any temporary building; whether any arrangement was made with Messrs. Braun and Co. or Messrs. Goupil and Co. as to the price at which the pictures were to be sold, or as to allowing any copies free of cost to any public institution; whether any payment was made by Messrs. Braun and Co. or Messrs. Goupil and Co. for the privileges accorded to them; and, whether he will lay upon the Table any Papers relating to the subject?

Mr HERBERT GLADSTONE was understood to say that the Office of Works, on the recommendation of the Trustees of the National Gallery, assented to the erection of the temporary building necessary for the photographing of these pictures, as they would in any similar case recommended by the Trustees. The question of the photographing was one for the consideration of the Trustees, over whom the Office of Works had no authority. The only papers in the Office of Works were the two letters asking and giving the above-mentioned permission.

FISHERIES (IRELAND)—TRAWLING.

Colonel NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been directed to that portion of the Report of the Royal Commission on Trawling which states that in-shore fishermen and fishing may be sometimes injured by trawling; if he is aware that trawling is prohibited in Dublin Bay, but has lately been allowed in Galway Bay; is he aware that the Galway fishermen are opposed to trawling, and, will he take steps to renew the former prohibition in Galway Bay?

Mr CAMPBELL BANNERMAN: I explained to the hon. and gallant Member in November last the circumstances in which, after a series of inquiries and experiments carried on for four years, it was decided in 1877 to allow trawling in Galway Bay. The Inspectors of Fisheries inform me that they have not since seen any reason to alter the decision then arrived at. I have not yet seen the Report of the Royal Commission on Trawling, which I understand has not yet been distributed. If the hon. and gallant Member desires it, I shall be happy to lay on the Table a copy of the Reports which led up to the result I have mentioned in 1877.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE IRELAND—THE NEW WORKS AT MEELICK.

Mr ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he is aware that the new cutting by the Board of Works between Victoria Lock and Hamilton Lock at Meelick went right through the way by which many people in the district had access to the chapel and post office at Meelick, and that now they have to go a round of nearly two miles for that purpose; and, whether the Board of Works will be directed to restore the way over the Shannon where it before existed, which the people claim as a right?

Mr. HIBBERT: I have looked into the matter with the aid of a map. There does not appear to have been any right of way. At the same time, it is possible that inconvenience may have been caused to the people of the district by the new works. Local inquiries will be made, and if it should be proved that any hardship is appreciable in amount or extent to a considerable number of people, steps will be taken to remedy it.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES—REPORTS OF THE REGISTRARS.

Mr E. STANHOPE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been called to the fact that the Reports of the Registrars of Friendly Societies are delivered many months after date, when the information contained in them is, in many respects, obsolete; and, if he will take steps to secure an earlier circulation of the Reports?

Mr. HIBBERT: The Reports of the Registrars of Friendly Societies are generally delivered many months after the close of the year to which they relate; but this can hardly be said to make them obsolete. New arrangements have been made, which will enable them to be brought out somewhat earlier in future. The Returns on which these Reports are based are by Statute not due until June, and often come in much later. These Returns have to be examined and abstracted before publication; and as the results are very voluminous, containing large masses of figures, it is therefore not possible to expedite publication beyond a certain point. A new arrangement, however, has been made, which it is hoped may facilitate matters.

MR. BROADHUCST asked, whether the delay was not mainly owing to the great want of sufficient labour in this very useful Department?

MR. HIBBERT said, he believed the delay rested mainly with the Friendly Societies themselves.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES, IRELAND— PROFESSOR D'ARCY THOMPSON.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the full amount of pension to which Professor D'Arcy Thompson would be entitled, if appointed Librarian, would be seventy-five pounds per annum; if, since the date of his appointment as Acting Librarian in 1876, the Irish Government have made twenty-nine appointments in the three Queen's Colleges, all entitled to full pensions, namely: two Presidencies; three Librarianships; one Registrarship; and twenty-three Professorships; and, whether, under these circumstances, the Government will persist in refusing Professor D'Arcy Thompson's reasonable claim after twenty-one years' service in the service of the Crown in Ireland?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: £75 is the salary of the office of Librarian in the Queen's College, Galway, and Professor Thompson receives that sum as Acting Librarian. The amount of his pension will depend upon the length of his service when he comes to retire. It is true that several appointments to which pensions are attached have been made in the Queen's Colleges since 1876, but that is not the point. The question is whether the Government should now create this new vested interest in connection with the Queen's Colleges; and, having regard to all the circumstances, they have no hesitation in coming to a conclusion in the negative.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the maximum Professor D'Arcy Thompson would be entitled to?

Mr. Hibbert

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I cannot say.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I beg to give Notice that, in consequence of the unsatisfactory answers of the right hon. Gentleman, I will call attention to the matter on another occasion.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — SUMMONS FOR TRESPASS IN HUNTING AT BAGENALSTOWN.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If the Bagenalstown magistrates allege as a reason for dismissing the summons of Mr. M'Grath against the huntsman Duffield that there was no evidence of wilful trespass; if so, was any witness called for Duffield; did he appear himself in support of this contention; or is it the fact that the prosecutor was the only witness in the case, and that he proved the trespass and the order to leave his holding, but that the Bench nevertheless said M'Grath had only a civil remedy?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): I have no precise information, but am willing to assume that M'Grath was the only witness examined, and that he proved that Duffield entered upon his lands while hunting, and that he ordered him to leave. Under these circumstances, I think the magistrates were right in holding that such a trespass was not wilful or malicious so as to constitute an offence punishable by summary conviction, but was the subject of a civil action.

MR. HEALY: Might I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman, as he has now given a legal opinion, is it his view that if a huntsman trespasses on the lands of a farmer he has no remedy but a civil action?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND: That is my opinion.

POOR LAW ELECTIONS (IRELAND).

MR. SMALL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Local Government Board in Ireland will permit returning officers at Poor Law elections to cause voting papers for non-resident voters to be sent to the houses of other persons without having received any instructions to that effect from the voters themselves, or even with such instructions; and, if in the latter case only, then in what form should such instructions be given, whether non-resident voters should not attend at the office of the returning officer, there receive a voting paper, and fill up same in the presence of the officer; and, whether the Local Government Board will permit returning officers to cause such voting papers in considerable numbers to be left at the offices of political agents, or at Orange Lodges, to be there filled up by the persons in charge of these establishments?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The instructions of the Local Government Board are that voting papers for non-resident voters and proxies are to be delivered at the respective places appointed by them in the electoral division or ward. If any case is brought to the notice of the Board in which the Returning Officer deviated from his instructions in this respect, the Board will be prepared to take due notice of the matter.

BOARD OF INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION IRELAND.

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any steps will be taken to remove the inequality in the Intermediate Education Board in Ireland, where there are three Catholic Members, and four who are not Catholic; whether one necessary result of the existing condition of things is that if a member, not a Catholic, is absent through illness or other causes, both sides are equal whereas if a Catholic is absent the result is four against two; whether this was not actually the case during a long time in consequence of the failing health of the late Lord O'Hagan; whether it is a fact that whereas there are a Protestant clergyman and a Presbyterian minister on the Board, there is no Roman Catholic clergyman; and, whether the great majority of the students examined, and the successful students, are Catholics from Catholic schools?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Board of Intermediate Education in Ireland is a mixed Board, consisting of three Roman Catholics, two Protestant Episcopalians, and two Presbyterians. The majority of the students examined, and of the successful students, are, I understand, Roman Catholics. Assum-
